ADVERTISEMENTS

CONCERNING THE

WORKS of Josephus.

I. Of the Jewish Antiquities.

THE Title alone of this History seems to recommend the same more than any Preface could do; inasmuch as, professing to deduce things from the Creation of the World, to reach as high as the Reign of Nero, and to derive the greatest part of its Relations from the Records of the Old Testament, it implies that no other can equal it, in Antiquity, in Continuance and in Authority.

But that which further renders it (after the Holy Scripture) preferable to all other Histories, is, That whereas those have no other ground-work but the Actions of Men, this represents to us the Actions of God himself. There is seen resplendent everywhere in it his Power, his Government, his Goodness and his Justice. His Power opens Seas, and divides Rivers, to give a dry passage to whole Armies, and causes the Walls of the strongest Cities to fall down without battery. His Government regulates all things, and gives such Laws as may be still'd the Fountain from which has been drawn whatever Wisdom there is in the World. His Goodness makes to fall from Heaven, and to issue from the bosom of Rocks. wherewith to satisfy the Hunger, and allay the Thirst of a great People in the driest Deserts. And all the Elements being at the Ministers of the Decrees which his Justice pronounces, the Water destroys by a Deluge those which it condemns, the Fire consumes them, the Air overthrows them by its Tempests, and the Earth opens it self to devour them. His Prophets foretell nothing, but they confirm the same by Miracles. They who command his Armies, undertake nothing but they achieve it. And the Leaders of his People, being fill'd with his Spirit, act like Angels rather than Men.

Moses alone may be a Proof of all this. Never did so many eminent Qualities meet together in one Person; Nor did God ever shew in any Man under the Old Law, since the Fall of the First, how high the perfection of a Creature may rise, whom he vouchsafes to accumulate with his favors. Wherefore, since a great part of this History may in some sort be said to be the Work of that incomparable Lawgiver, because the same is wholly taken out of him, it ought to be read not only with Esteem, but also with Respect; and the sequel to the end of what is contained in the Bible deserves no less, in regard it was dictated by the same Spirit of God which guided the Pen of Moses when he writ the five first Books of the Sacred History.

But moreover, what might not be said of those admirable Patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob; of David that great both King and Prophet, who deserv'd the unequal Elogium, of being a Man according to God's own Heart; of Jonathan, that most accomplish'd Prince, whose Soul the Scripture saith was inseparably ty'd to that of that holy King; of the illustrious Maccabees, whose Piety, equal to their Courage, effected an Union of the Supreme Power attending Royalty, with the most Sacred Functions of the High-Priesthood; and lastly of Joseph, of Joshua, of Gideon, and of divers others, who may pass for perfect Models of Vertue, Conduct and Valor. If the Heroes of Pagan Antiquity never achiev'd any thing comparable to these Heroes of God's People, whose Actions might pass for Fables, if it were not impiety to refuse credit to them, there is no reason to wonder, since those Heathens had only human Force; but the hands of those whom God chose to fight under his Command, were arm'd with his invincible help: and the Example of Deborah, shews that even a Woman may become, in a moment, a great General of an Army.

Now if the Favors wherewith God cherishes those that are his, ought to induce Monarchs not to trust but in his Assistance, the dreadful Punishments which he executes on those that lean on their own strength, oblige them to tremble; and the rejection of Saul, and divers other great Princes, instructs them, by the terrible representation of their Fall, to have recourse to God, that they may escape the like Misfortunes.

ADVERTISEMENTS concerning the

Yet not only Princes, but Princeſſes alſo may find in this Book Examples both to avoid and to imitate. Queen Jezebel is a diſmal one both of Impiety and Punishment. And Queen Eſther is a rare one of all the Perſections, and of all the Rewards which can render the Ver- tue and Felicity of a great and holy Princeſſe admir'd.

If great Perſonages find ſo great Examples here to lead them to avoid Vice, and embrace Vertue, there is no Perſon of any Condition whatſoever, but may profit likewise by ſo uſeful a Book. 'Tis of general benefit for all, ſo proper to imprint a reſpect of the Divine Moſteſty, by the view of ſo many effects of his infinite Power, and of his adorable Providence, that his Heart muſt be very hard that is not affected therewith.

And how can Chriſtians but be mov'd with ſuch a holy reſpect, ſince the ſame Hiſtory teaches us, that thoſe illuſtrious and ſo celebrated Conquerors, Cyrus, Darius and Alexander, though Idolaters, could not forbear having a Veneration for the Maſteſty and the Ceremonies of that Temple which was but a Figure of the Chriſtian Church.

But if this Hiſtory be ſo excellent in it ſelf, it muſt be confeſs'd that no man was ſo fit to write it, as he that gave it both to his own Age and to Poſterity. For who could be better inform'd of the Cuſtoms and Manners of the Jews, than a Jew? Who could be better inſtructed of all the Ceremonies and Obſervations of the Law, than a Prieſt? Who could better relate the Events of ſo many Wars, than a great Captain? And who could better comprehend things, and make judicious Reflections upon them, than a man of great Quality, and a great States-man? Now all theſe Qualifications center in Joſephus. He was a Jew by Birth. He was not only a Prieſt, but of the ſiſt of the four and twenty Races of the Prieſts, who held the chief rank amongſt thoſe of their Nation. He was deſcended from the Aſimonæan Kings. His great Exploits in War had made him admir'd even by the Romans. And the ſeveral great Employments, of which he ſo worthily acquitted himſelf, leave no room to doubt of his Experience in Affairs.

Laſtly, His Life written by himſelf, join'd with his Hiſtory of the Jewiſh Wars, make him ſufficiently known. And as for his manner of writing, I think it needleſs to commend it, ſince this Work manifeſts it ſo excellent every where; particularly in the Nineteenth Book, where he relates the Aſſions and Death of the Emperor Caligula, which no Roman Author has done ſo accurately; I think I may ſay, without fear, that there is not in Tacitus any Hiſtory which ſurpaſſes that eloquent and judicious Narration. I know ſome will wonder, that after having mention'd the greateſt Miracles, he diminuiſhes the belief of them, by ſaying, That he leaves every man at liberty to have ſuch Opinion thereof as he thinks fit. But in my Judgment he does it only on this account, That having compos'd this Hiſtory chiefly for the Greeks and Romans, as 'tis eaſie to gather, by his writing the ſame in Greek, and not in Hebrew, he fear'd their incredulity would render it ſuſpected to them, if he affirm'd poſitively the truth of things which ſeem'd to them impoſſible.

But whatever Reason induc'd him to uſe that Caution, I pretend not to defend him either in thoſe places, or any others, where he is not conformable to the Bible. This alone is the Divine Fountain of written Truths, which cannot be ſought elſewhere without hazard of Error; and one cannot excuſe himſelf from condemning whatever is found contrary thereunto. I do it with all my Heart; and there is no Perſon but ought to do it, in order to read this excellent Hiſtory with Satisfaction, and without Scruple.

Neither yet do I pretend to juſtifie this Author, in ſome places where he ſpeaks of the ſeveral ſorts of Government; nor as to ſome other particular Sentiments, which no body is oblig'd to follow. Nor do I engage my ſelf in any matter of Criticiſm, the conſeſts whereof I leave to ſuch as are exercis'd in that ſort of ſtudy.

If in ſome places, as amongſt others, in the deſcription of the Tabernacle, and of the Table of Show-bread, ſome difference be found between this Translation and the Greek, the cauſe thereof is, that thoſe paſſages are ſo corrupted in the Greek Text, that all I could do, was to bring them into the condition wherein they are.

II. Of the Hiſtory of the Jewiſh War againſt the Romans, &c.

If, the Hiſtory of the Jews, advances its Author into the rank of the beſt Hiſtorians, 'tis plain that in that of their War againſt the Romans, he has ſurpaſs'd himſelf. Several reaſons have concurr'd to render this Hiſtory a Maſter-piece; the greateſt of the Subject; the Sentiments excited in his breaſt, by the ruin of his Country; and the ſhare he had in the moſt conſiderable Events of that bloody War. For what other Subjects can equal this great Siege, which manifeſted to all the Earth, that one City alone would have been the Rock of the Roman Glory, had not God, for puniſhment of its ſins, overthrow it by the ſtorms of his wrath? What ſentiments of Grief can be more lively, than thoſe of a Jew, and of a Prieſt, who ſaw ſubverted the Laws of his own Nation, whereof no other was ever ſo jealous, and that manifeſt cent Temple, the object of his Devotion and of his Zeal, reduc'd to Aſhes? And what greater Intereſt can an Hiſtorian have in his Work, than to be oblig'd to bring into it the principal Aſſions of his own Life; and to labor for his own Glory, by an unflattering advancement of that of the Conquerors; and by acquitting himſelf at the ſame time of what he ow'd to the Generoſity of thoſe two excellent Princes Veſpaſian and Titus, to whom the honour of having finiſh'd this great War was due.

But ſo far as there are ſo many remarkable Occurrences in this Hiſtory, I think to do the Readers a pleaſure, in preſenting them here with an Abſtraſt thereof, from which general Idea they may afterwards proceed to the particulars depending thereupon. It is divided into ſeven Books.

The firſt Book, and the ſecond, to the twenty eighth Chapter, are an abridgment of the Jewiſh Hiſtory, from Antiochus Epiphanes King of Syria (who ſpoil'd the Temple, and went about to abolish Religion) to Florus, Governour of Judea, whoſe Avarice and Cruelty were the chief occaſion of that War which they maintain'd againſt the Romans. This abridgment is ſo delightful, that Joſephus ſeems to have deſign'd to ſhow that he could, like excellent Painters, repreſent the ſame objects in different manners, with ſo much Art, that it ſhould be hard to know to which to give the Preference. For whereas theſe Hiſtories are ſometimes interrupted by the Narration of things hapned at the ſame time, they are here written in a continued ſeries, and give the Readers the pleaſure to behold in one Table, what they ſaw before ſeparately in ſeveral. From the twenty eighth Chapter of the ſecond Book to the end, Joſephus relates what paſs'd in conſequence of the Troubles rais'd by Florus, till the defeat of the Roman Army commanded by Ceſtius Gallus, Governour of Syria.

In the beginning of the third Book, Joſephus ſhews the Conſecration of the Emperor Nero upon this ill ſucceſs of his Arms, which was likely to be follow'd with a revolt of all the Eaſt; and how caſting his Eyes on all ſides, he found only Veſpaſian fit to bear the weight of ſo important a War, and accordingly gave him the Conduct thereof. He relates afterwards in what manner this great Captain, accompany'd with Titus his Son, enter'd into Galilee, whereof our Author himſelf was Governour, and beſieg'd him in Jotapat; where, after the greateſt reſiſtance imaginable, he was taken and led Priſoner to Veſpaſian: and how Titus took drivers other Places, and perform'd Aſſions of incredible Valor.

The fourth Book brings in Veſpaſian conquering the reſt of Galilee; the Jews beginning to tumultuate in Jeruſalem, the Factious, who took the Name of Zealots, becoming Maſters of the Temple under the Conduct of John of Giſcal, Ananus the High-Prieſt ſtirring up the People to beſiege them there; the Idumæans coming to their aſſiſtance, exerciſing horrible Cruelties, and afterwards retiring; Veſpaſian taking ſundry Places in Judea, blocking up Jeruſalem, in order to beſiege it; and forbearing that deſign, by reaſon of the Troubles riſen in the Empire, before and after the death of the Emperors Nero, Golba and Otho; Simon, Son of Giotas, another Head of the Factious, receiv'd by the People into Jeruſalem; Vitellius, who had ſiz'd upon the Empire after Otho's death, rendering himſelf odious and contemptible for his Cruelty and Debauchery; the Army commanded by Veſpaſian, declaring him Emperor: And laſtly, Vitellius aſſaſſinated at Rome, after the defeat of his Forces, by Antonius Primus, who had embrac'd Veſpaſian's Party.

The fifth Book relates how a third Faction, of which Eleazar was Head, was form'd in Jeruſalem; That afterwards thoſe three Factions were again reduc'd to two, and in what manner they made War one againſt another. It contains alſo the Deſcription of Jeruſalem, of the Towers Hippicos, Phazael and Mariamme, of the Caſtle Antonia, of the Temple, of the High Prieſt, and of ſundry other remarkable things; the Siege of that great City form'd by Titus; the incredible Works, and prodigious Exploits of Valor done on both ſides; the grievous Famine wherewith the City was afflicted, and the ſtrange Cruelties of the Factious.

The ſixth Book repreſents the horrid Miſeries wherewith Jeruſalem was reduc'd; the continuation of the Siege with the ſame ardor as before; and how, after many Fights, Titus having forc'd the firſt and ſecond Wall of the City, took and ruin'd the Caſtle of Antonia, and aſſaulted the Temple which was burnt, notwithstanding all this Prince could do to prevent it; and how at laſt he became Maſter of all the reſt.

In the ſeventh and laſt of theſe Books, 'tis ſhew'd how Titus caus'd Jeruſalem to be deſtroj'd, ſaving only the Towers Hippicos, Phazael and Mariamme: In what manner he commended and rewarded his Army; what Spectacles he gave to the Nations of Syria; what horrible Perſections were exercis'd upon the Jews in ſeveral Cities; with what incredible Joy the Emperor Veſpaſian and Titus, who was declar'd Cæſar, were receiv'd into Rome; what a magnificent Triumph they made; how the Caſtles of Herodion, Macheron and Maſſada, the only Places remaining to the Jews in Judea, were taken; and how thoſe that defended the laſt, all kill'd themſelves with their Wives and Children.

This is in general what this History of the Jewish War against the Romans contains. And there are no Ornaments wherewith this great Person has not enrich'd it. He has omitted no occasion of embellishing it, by elegant Descriptions of Provinces, Lakes, Rivers, Fountains, Mountains, several Rarities and Buildings, whose Magnificence would seem fabulous, if what he relates thereof could be call'd in doubt, when we see no Person found that has dar'd to contradict him, though the Excellence of his History, rais'd no small Envy against him.

It may be said with Truth, that whether he speaks of the Romans Military Discipline, or whether he represents Battels, Tempests, Shipwracks, a Famine or a Triumph, every thing is so lively set forth, that he charms the Attention of his Readers. And I fear not to add that no other, not excepting even Tacitus himself, has excell'd more in Orations; they are so noble, strong and persuasive, always restrain'd within their own Subject, and proportion'd both to the Persons to speak, and to those that are spoken unto.

Moreover, can the Judgment and Faithfulness of this Historian be too much commended, for the Moderation which he uses between the Praises defer'd by the Romans for finishing so great a War, and those due to the Jews for having withstood the same, although vanquish'd at last, with invincible courage? so that neither his Gratitude for the Obligations he had to Vespasian and Titus, nor his love for his Country, bias'd him contrary to Justice more on the one side than the other.

But that which I account most estimable in him, is, that he never fails upon any occasion to praise Vertue, to reprehend Vice, and to make excellent reflections upon the admirable Providence of God, and upon the fear which we ought to have of his dreadful Judgments.

It may be boldly affirm'd, That never was seen a greater Example thereof, than the ruin of that unhappy Nation, of that proud City, and of that venerable Temple; since although the Romans were Masters of the World, and that this Siege was the work of one of the greatest Princes they glory to have had for Emperors, the power of this victorious People, and the heroic Valour of Titus, would have in vain undertaken this design, if God had not chosen them to be the Executioners of his Justice. The blood of his Son shed, the most horrid of all Crimes, was the only true cause of the ruin of that unhappy City. The heavy hand of God upon that wretched People, caus'd that how terrible forever the War was that assailed them without, it was yet much more dreadful within, by the cruelty of those unnatural Jews, who more like Devils than Men, destroy'd by the Sword and the Famine, of which they were the Authors, 1100000 Persons; and reduc'd the remainder to that pass, that they could hope for no safety but from their Enemies, by casting themselves into the Arms of the Romans. Such prodigious effects of vengeance for the death of a God, might pass for incredible with those who have not the happiness to be enlighten'd with the light of the Gospel, if they were not related by a Man of that very same Nation, as considerable as Josephus was, for his Birth, for his Quality of Priest, and for his Vertue. And methinks 'tis visible, that God minding to make use of his Testimony to authorize such important Truths, preserv'd him by a Miracle, when after the taking of Josphat, of forty which were retir'd with him into a Cave, the lot being cast so often to know who should be slain first, he only and one other remain'd alive.

This shews that this Historian is to be consider'd with a different respect from all others, since whereas they relate only human Events although dependent on the Orders of the Supreme Providence, it appears that God cast his Eye upon him to make him subservient to the greatest of his Designs.

For we must not only consider the destruction of the Jews as the most dreadful effect that ever was of Gods Justice, and as the most dismal Image of the vengeance which he will exercise at the last day against the Reprobate; we must also behold it as one of the most illustrious proofs which it hath pleas'd him to give Men of the Divinity of his Son; inasmuch as this prodigious Event had been foretold by our Saviour in precise and intelligible terms. He had said to his Disciples shewing them the Temple of Jerusalem, That all those goodly buildings should be so destroy'd, that there should not be left one stone upon another, S. Matth. 24. v. 2. S. Mark 13. ver. 2. S. Luke 19. ver. 44. And also, That when they should see Jerusalem encompass'd with Armies, they should know that its desolation was at hand, S. Luke 21. ver. 20.

He had mention'd particularly the dreadful circumstances of this desolation. He had said to them, Wo to those that shall be with Child, or give suck in those days; for there shall be great distress in the Land, and Wrath upon this People. And they shall fall by the edge of the Sword, and shall be led away captive into all Nations, and Jerusalem shall be trodden down by the Gentiles, S. Luke 21. v. 23, 24.

And lastly he had declar'd, that the accomplishment of these Prophecies was ready to come to pass; That the time was drawing nigh that their house should be left unto them desolate: and that even such as were then living should see it, Verily I say unto you, All these things shall come upon this Generation, S. Matth. 23. ver. 38, & 39.

ALL

WORKS of JOSEPHUS.

All these things had been foretold by our Saviour, and written by the Evangelists before the revolt of the Jews, and at that time when there was not yet the least appearance of so strange a Revolution.

Now inasmuch as Prophecy is the greatest of Miracles, and the most powerful way whereby God Almighty authorizes his Doctrine, this Prophecy of Jesus Christ, to which no other is comparable, may be justly accounted the chief and most irrefragable evidence to Mankind of his Divine Birth and Mission. For as no other Prophecy was ever more clear, so neither was any more punctually accomplish'd. Jerusalem was destroy'd to the ground by a Army that besieged it; there remain'd not the least footstep of that proud Temple, the wonder of the Universe, and the object of the Jews vanity; and the Calamities which ruin'd them, answer'd precisely to that dreadful Prediction of our Saviour.

But to the end so great an Event might serve as well for the Instruction of those that were to be born in after-times, as for those that were Spectators of it, it was necessary, as I have said, that the History should be written by an irreproachable Witness. To which purpose 'twas fit the Writer should be a Jew, and not a Christian, lest he might be suspected to have accommodated the Events to the Prophecies. 'Twas fit he should be a Person of Quality, to the end he might be fully inform'd of all things. 'Twas fit he should see with his own Eyes the wonderful things which he was to relate, to the end he might be capable of credit. And lastly 'twas fit he should be a Man, whose Eloquence and Judgment might be suitable to the greatness of such a Subject.

All which Qualifications, so necessary to render this History complete in all points, meet so perfectly in Josephus, that 'tis evident God Almighty chose him expressly to persuade all reasonable persons of the Truth of this marvellous Occurrence.

'Tis certain, that having contributed in this manner to the Confirmation of the Gospel, it appears not that he made any benefit thereof for himself, or that he had any share in the blessings so plentifully poured down in his time upon all the Earth. But if there be reason to commiserate his unhappiness in this point, there is some also to bless the Providence of God, who has made his blindness serve to our Advantage; since the things he writes concerning his own Nation, are, in respect of the incredulous, incomparably of more force for Confirmation of the Christian Religion, than if he had embrac'd Christianity; so that we may apply to him in particular what the Apostle saith of all the Jews.

III. Josephus's Answer to Appion.

The next of the Works of Josephus, besides his Life written by himself, is an Answer in two Books to what Appion and some others had written against his History of the Jews, against the Antiquity of their Race, against the Purity of their Laws, and against the Conduct of Moses. Nothing can be more solid than this Answer, wherein Josephus proves invincibly the Antiquity of his Nation by the Egyptian, Chaldean, Phenician, and even by the Greek Historians themselves. He shews that all which Appion and those other Authors have allud'd to the disadvantage of the Jews, are ridiculous Fables, as well as the plurality of their Gods; and he excellently sets forth the greatness of the Actions of Moses, and the sanctity of the Laws which God gave the Jews by his Intervention.

IV. The Martyrdom of the Maccabees.

The Martyrdom of the Maccabees follows next. 'Tis a piece which Erasmus, so famous among the Learned, calls a Masterpiece of Eloquence; and I confess I understand not, why having with reason so advantageous an Opinion of it, he paraphras'd it, and not translated it. Never was Copy more different from its Original. 'Tis hardly any of its principal Lineaments; and, if I mistake not, nothing can more advance the Reputation of Josephus, than to see that so able a Man intending to embellish his Work, has, on the contrary, so much diminish'd the beauty of it, and thereby shew'd how much Josephus is to be esteem'd for writing, not after the manner of most of the Greeks in a long-winded style, but closely and compendiously, as affecting to say nothing but what is necessary. And I cannot sufficiently wonder, that no person hitherto has made a Translation of it from the Greek either into Latin or French, at least to my knowledge. For Genebrard, instead of Translating Josephus, has only Translated Erasmus. For my part I have faithfully adhered to the original Greek, without following that Paraphrase of Erasmus any where which invents Names that are neither in Josephus, nor the Bible, for the Mother of the Maccabees. It should seem Josephus did not write this famous Martyrdom, authoriz'd by the Holy Scripture, but to prove the truth of a discourse which he makes in the beginning, to shew that Reason is the Mistress of Passions; and he attributes to it a power over them, which there would be reason to wonder at, if it were strange that a Jew should be ignorant that this power belongs only to the Grace of Jesus Christ. He is contented to declare that he means only a Reason accompany'd with Justice and Piety.

V. The Embassy of Philo to C. Caligula the Roman Emperor.

This is a brief Account of all the Works of Josephus. Now because Philo, although a Jew as well as he, writ also in Greek upon part of the same Subject; but handles the same rather as a Philosopher, than an Historian; and because none amongst all his Writings is so esteem'd as that of his Embassy to the Emperor C. Caligula; of whom Josephus speaks particularly in the 10th Chapter of the 18th Book of the Jewish Antiquities, I conceiv'd that this Piece having so great Affinity therewith, it would not be amiss to shew by a Translation of it, the different manner of writing of these two great Persons: That of Josephus is undoubtedly more compendious, and has nothing of the Asiatic Style; so that he expresses that in few words, which Philo doth sometimes in as many Lines. The History of that Emperor may be made up from the Writings of these two famous Authors, inasmuch as Philo relates as particularly and eloquently the Actions of his Life, as Josephus has written nobly and excellently the passages of his Death. Both the one and the other were so extraordinary, that 'tis an advantage there remains such Images thereof to Posterity, to animate good Princes to merit by their Virtue as great Affection for their Memory, as People have horror for those who have shew'd themselves unworthy of the rank which they held in the World.

It remains only to add, That as this Volume comprehends all the ancient holy History, so the Readers are desir'd to peruse it not only for Divertisement or Curiosity, but also with an aim to profit by the useful Considerations for which it affords so much matter. And that whereas the old Translation of Doctor Lodge was not undeservedly complain'd of on many accounts; much Pains hath been taken in this Edition to amend it, as the Reader will easily find by comparing it with the former. If it be not so complete as could be wish'd, the Reader is desir'd to accept candidly what has been done for his Satisfaction; and to consider, that though an old repair'd Building can hardly have all the Beauty, yet it may have all the Conveniency of a new Fabric.

An Explication of the Coins and Measures mention'd in this History.

S*Arb* was the measure containing about some seven quarts English.
The Epba contained three Sarbs.
The Coré or Homer contained ten Epbas, that is to say, thirty Sarbs, and was the same measure both in dry and liquid things.
The Log contained a French measure.
The Hin contained twelve Logs.
The Bath contained as much as the Epba.
The Carb, was a kind of Pitcher, containing such a quantity as a young Maid might well carry.
The common Sicle contained the weight of four Ounces, whether it were of Gold, Silver, or any other Metal.
The sacred or holy Sicle weighed half an Ounce of any Metal whatsoever.
The common Sicle of Silver was valued at about one Shilling of our Money.
The holy Sicle of Silver was valued at about two Shillings.
The common Drachm was the eighth part of an Ounce.
The sacred Drachm was the fourth part of an Ounce.
The Pound weighed twelve Ounces.

The Jacred Talent contained one hundred pounds. Furthermore Note, That when Jephthah mentions the Olympiads, without any specification of the years therein contained, he ordinarily means the space of four years compleat.

The Stadium, Stade, or Furlong, according to the Greeks account, (which I suppose Jephthah most respected in this History) is either of 600 Foot as the Olympique, that is, of 120 Paces; or as the Pyrrhique, which contained 1000 Foot, that is, 200 Paces.

The LIFE of FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS,

The Son of MATTHIAS, Written by himself.

FORASMUCH as I derive my Original, by a long series of Ancestors, ^{Joseph's Li-} from the Sacerdotal Race, I may, with some reason, value my self upon ^{ness.}
the Nobleness of my Birth; since, as every Nation places the Grandeur of a Family in some certain marks of Honour that accompany it, so amongst us 'tis one of the most signal to have the administration of Holy things.
But I am not only descended of the stock of the Priests; I am also of the First of the Four and twenty Families of which it consists, and whose Dignity is eminent above the rest. To which I may add, That, by my Mothers side, I reckon Kings amongst my Ancestors, For the Branch of the Asmoneans, from whom the descended,
C for a long time exercised both the High Priesthood and Princely Power among our Nation.
In this manner stands the order of the last of my Predecessors. My great Grandfathers Grandfather Simon, surnamed Pessilus, the Stutterer, lived at such time as Hir- cannus was High Priest, the first of that Name, and the Son of Simon the High Priest.
This Simon Pessilus had Nine Sons: the one of which was Matthias, surnamed Applias.
This Matthias took to Wife the Daughter of the High Priest Jonathan, by whom he had one Son, who was Matthias, surnamed Curtus, who was born in the first year of Hir- cannus's Priesthood. Matthias begat Joseph in the Ninth year of Alexander's Government; and of Joseph came Matthias in the Tenth year of the Reign of Archelaus; and Matthias begat me in the First year of the Empire of Caius Caesar. I likewise have D Three Sons, mine eldest is Hircannus, who was born in the Fourth; my next Jussus, who was born in the Seventh; and Agrippa my last, who was born in the Ninth year of Ves- pasians Empire. This Genealogy of mine do I in this manner propose, according as I have found it written in the Publick Registers, to the end to confound the Calumnies of my Enemies.

My Father Matthias was considerable for his Extraction, but more for his Justice and Authority in Jerusalem, which is the Metropolis of our Country. My bringing up, during my tender years, was with Matthias, who was my Brother by the same Father and Mother; with whom I happily profited in all kind of Science, having a good Memory, and a quick Apprehension: so that, being yet a Child of Fourteen years of E Age, I was praised by all Men in regard of the good Affection I had to Learning; and the Priests and Noblest Citizens vouchsaf'd to ask my Opinion of things that concerned our Laws and Ordinances. About the Age of Sixteen years, my desire was to have a search and insight into the Sects of our Nation, which are Three: The first of the Pharisees, which is the chiefest: The second of the Sadducees: And the third of the Essenes. And this I did, to the end I might choose the better of the Three, when I understand them all. For which cause, with great Austerities and Labours, I passed thorow them all: and not content with this Experience, after I had heard that a certain man called Banus lived in the Desert, clothing himself with that which the Trees brought forth, and feeding on no other kind of meat, but what they freely yielded, F and walking himself oftentimes by day and night in cold water to keep himself chaste,
I began to imitate his course of Life: and after I had lived with him for the space of Three years, and satisfied my desires, I returned to the City at the Age of Nineteen years.

At this time I began to engage my self in the exercise of a civil Life, following the Sect of the Pharisees, which very nearly resembled that Sect among the Grecians, who are called Stoick. After I was Six and Twenty years old, it was my fortune to repair to Rome upon this occasion. Whilst Felix governed Judea, certain Priests, my familiars, Men of much Honour, and more Vertue, were, upon some slight occasion, bound and sent to Rome by his commandment, to answer what should be objected against G them in Caesar's presence. Whereupon being desirous to do them service, and having special intelligence, that the Torments wherewith they were Martyred, lessened not their Piety, but that they lived contentedly on Figs and Nuts: for this cause I departed for Rome, and was encountered with many great and grievous hazards by Sea. For the Ship, wherein I sailed, was wrecked in the midst of the Adriatick Sea, and about six hundred of us were forced to swim all Night long; and at Day-break, by God's Providence, a Cyrenean Ship came in sight, and both I and certain others, to the number of Four-score, out-swimming the rest, were taken up into it, and saved. After I had in this sort escaped, I came to Dicaeopolis, which the Italians call at this day Puteoli, and grew acquainted with Aliturus a Jew born, who was a Comedian, and in good reputation with Nero; by whose means insinuating my self into the Emperors Poppa's knowledge, I determined to beseech her to procure the liberty of those Priests with all expedition, which she accordingly did; and being gratified likewise by her with many great gifts, I returned into my Country. There I found the Commonwealth much disquieted with Factions and Troubles, and divers too prone and ready to Rebel, and withdraw their Allegiance from the Romans. I informed my self to repress the seditious, and exhorted them to change their Opinions, representing, before their Eyes, the quality of those, against whom they enterprized War, with whom they could neither compare in experience of War, nor in good Fortune; For this cause I added them, not to hazard the overthrow of themselves, their Children, and their Country, by their rashness and rage. To this effect I spake to them, and instantly intreated them to desist from their unhappy Resolution, for that I foresaw that the end of this War would prove to our utter Ruine, but I prevailed nothing with them. The fury of desperate and dissolute men prevailed above reason; for which cause fearing left by K continual enforcing of one thing, I should grow into hatred and suspicion amongst them, as if I favoured their Enemies, and they should put me to death; seeing that the Port of Antonia was already seized upon by the seditious, I retired my self into the Sanctuary. From whence, after Manabem, and the chiefest Revolters were put to death, I came out again, and joined my self with the Priests, and chiefest Pharisees; whom I found surprized with great fear, when they saw the People in Arms, and uncertain what to do, wanting the means to pacify these mutinies. But apparently perceiving the danger, both I and the Pharisees feigned our selves of their Mind, and counselled them to contain themselves in Peace, and let the Roman Forces depart, in hope, that Gessius would, with all Expedition, draw out great Forces, and chastise these Peace-breakers. But as soon as he arrived, and fought with them, he was overcome, and a great number of his men slain; whereupon followed the utter ruine of our whole Nation. For such as desired the War, were puffed up with that Victory, and conceived assured hope, that in the end they should overcome the Romans. Besides, this ensuing occasion presented it self: The Inhabitants of the Cities that border upon Syria, laid hands on those Jews that dwelt among them, and slew them, with their Wives and Children, without any just cause or crime committed by them. For they had not conspired any ways, or intended to revolt from the Romans, or to use any Hostility, or any secret Conspiracy against any of those, with whom they were conversant. But amongst all the rest, the Citizens of Scythopolis, exceeded all other in Impiety and Wickedness. For being besieged by certain of the Jews, they enforced those Jews that inhabited amongst them to take Arms, and fight against those of their own Nation (which is expressly prohibited by our Laws) and having overcome, by their Assistance, they, by a detestable perfidiousness, forgot the Obligation they had, the Faith which they had engaged to them, and slew every one of them, to the number of many Thousands. The like misfortune also fell upon those Jews that inhabited Damascus. But of this we have more amply spoken in those our Books, which we have written of the Wars of the Jews: and at this present I make mention hereof, only to signify to the Reader, that our Nation became engaged in War with the Romans, not out of voluntary intent and purpose, but in great part by necessity and constraint.

After that Gessius was overcome (as is before declared) the chiefest men of Jerusalem perceiving that the Seditious were strongly armed and provided, they began to fear lest if they should be found disarmed, they should suddenly be overthrown by their Enemies (as in effect it fell out afterwards) and hearing that all Galilee was not as yet wholly revolted from the Romans; but that a part thereof as yet remained in Peace, they sent me with two other Priests, Joazar and Judas, who were both virtuous and honourable men, to persuade the mutinous to lay down their Arms, and to let them know that it was more advantageous for the Nation, that such Men as were in Authority and Reputation, should have the keeping thereof. The resolution that was taken by them was, that they had them always ready upon all occasions, but that they expected until they were certified, what the Romans intended to do.

With

A With this Commission, and the like Instructions, I repaired into Galilee: where I found the Sepphorites were ready to come to a Battel with the Galileans, for that these latter had threatened to ravage their Country, in regard of their League of Friendship with the Romans, contracted and ratified by Senius Gallus, Governour of Syria. But I delivered them from that fear, and appealed the Common People by permitting them to send at all times when they pleased, their Hostages to Gessius, who lay at Dora a City of Phoenicia. I found likewise that the Inhabitants of Tiberias were already in Arms upon this occasion: There were in that City three different Factions, the one of the Nobility, whose chief was Julius Capella, to whom were joined Herod the Son of Marius, Herod the Son of Gamal, and Compelus the Son of Compelus. For Crispus the Brother of Compelus, who in times past had been made Governor of the City for Agrippa, surnamed the Great, was in his own possessions on the other side of Jordan. All these, I say, were of opinion to remain under the Romans Authority, and to obey their King. But Pistus alone of the Nobility, would no ways accord to this advice, by the persuasion of his Son Justus. The second Faction was of the common sort, who concluded upon War. Justus, Son of Pistus, who was the Ringleader of the third Faction, carried himself very doubtfully touching the War; yet notwithstanding he secretly thirsted after Innovation, hoping that by a change he should encrease his Power. Presenting himself therefore in the midst of the Multitude, he endeavoured to persuade them that their City was always one of the chief of Galilee; and that during the days of Herod the Tetrarch, who founded the fame, it was the chiefest City, whose pleasure it was that the City of Sepphoris should yield obedience to that of Tiberias. That they had not lost that preeminence in the time of King Agrippa the Father, but had continued the same, till Felix obtained the Government of Judea. But for the present times they had been given by Nero to the younger Agrippa, they had fallen from and lost their Superiority. For the City of Sepphoris obtained the Sovereignty of Galilee, after that he acknowledged the Roman Government, which had removed the Treasure of the Charters and the Receipts of the Kings Money. By these words, and others of like nature against King Agrippa, he incited the People to Rebellion, signifying to them, That an opportunity invited them to take Arms, to the end that being associated with the Galileans, they might recover the advantages which they had lost unjustly. To which purpose, all the Province would willingly join with them, through the hatred they bare the Sepphorites, on whom they would revenge themselves with great power, because they continued in their Allegiance, which they promised to the Romans.

By these words he won the Peoples Hearts to him: for he was a Man very eloquent, and by his subtilty and politick discourse, easily overthrew all that which his Adversaries produced against him. He was also skilful enough in the Greek Language, to attempt the writing of the History of those Transactions, to the end to disguise the truth thereof. But in the process of this discourse, I will shew more particularly what his ill designs were, and how by his and his Brothers means, he wanted little of utterly overthrowing his Country. When therefore this Justus had persuaded the Citizens of Tiberias to take Arms, and had constrained divers Men likewise, who were of the contrary Opinion, to do the like, he issued out with them, and burnt the Villages of the Gadarenes and Hippenians, that are situate in the Confines of Tiberias and Scythopolis. In this estate was Tiberias: And as for Gisphala, their Affairs were brought to this pass: John the Son of Levi seeing some of the Citizens resolved upon a Revolt from the Romans, laboured to restrain them, and required them to continue in their Allegiance: but notwithstanding all his persuasion and diligence, he could not contain them. For the Nations round about them, as the Gadarenes, Gubarenes and Tyrians, assembled a great Army; and with the same assailed Gisphala, and took it by force: and after they had consumed by Fire and utterly destroyed the same, they returned home. John being much displeased with this act, armed all those that were with him, and set upon the above-named Nations; and having obtained the Victory, he re-edified Gisphala in better fort than it was before, inclosing it with a Wall, to the intent it might be the better fortified against future Invasions.

But those of Gamala persevered in their faith towards the Romans, as I shall now declare. Philip the Son of Jacim, who governed under King Agrippa, escaping beyond all Opinion, from the Royal Palace of Jerusalem at such a time as it was besieged, fell into another great danger, to wit, to be slain by Manabim, and those Seditious that were with him: but certain Babylonians his Kinmen being at that time in Jerusalem, hindered the Revolters from executing their purpose at that time. When therefore Philip had lay hid there for the space of four days, on the fifth he fled away disguised in a false hair, for fear he should be discovered. And as soon as he arrived in a Village, which was of his own possession, situate near Gamala, he sent for certain of his Subjects to repair unto Him. But God, for Philip's greater good, crossed the scope of his intent, which otherwise had been the ruin of many: for being surprized by a sudden Fever, he committed certain Letters of his written to Agrippa and Bernice, who were yet but young, to one of his Freed-men, commanding him to deliver them to Varus, who was put in trust, by the King and Queen, to administer the Affairs of that Kingdom, whilst they were gone to Beryth to meet with Gessius Varus receiving Philip's Letters, and understanding that he was escap'd, was sorry for it, because he thought the King and Queen would have less use of him after Philip was arriv'd. He therefore made the People believe that his Freed-man was a Traytor, and brought them forg'd Letters, it being certain that Philip was in Jerusalem with the Jews, who were revolted against the Romans: and so, he commanded him to be executed. Philip being ignorant of the cause why his Freed-man did not return, sent another with Letters, to the intent he might discover what was become of his first Messenger, and for what cause he stayed so long. But Varus accusing his second Messenger also after the same manner commanded him to be executed, as he had done the first. The Syrians that inhabit Cæsarea, had puffed him up, by telling him that Agrippa should be put to death by the Romans, for the Rebellion of the Jews, and that he who was Royally descended, should possess his Government. And indeed Varus was of the Blood-Royal, deriving his Pedigree from Sobemus King of Libanus. For these causes, he retained Philip's Letters, hoping by these means that the King should have no knowledge thereof; and he set watch in every passage, for fear lest any man should flee, and certify the King of what had happened; and to give the Syrians the better content who dwelt in Cæsarea, he put divers of those Jews that dwelt among them to death. He intended also to undertake a War against the Jews of Bethanania, who were called Babylonian Jews, by confederating himself with the Trachonites of Barthanaea. For which cause, he sent for twelve of the Jews of most estimation amongst the Inhabitants of Cæsarea, he enjoined them to repair to Ecbatane, and signify to those of their Nation there, that Varus understanding that they pretended to take Arms against their King, and scarcely believing it, had sent them thither, to persuade them to lay down their Arms. And that this should be a certain proof, by which they might perfectly clear their Innocence, that seventy of the chiefest of them should be sent to him. These twelve arriving in Ecbatane, and being entertained by those of their Nation, found that they neither imagined nor intended any commotion: for which cause, they persuaded them to send their seventy men; which they did, little suspecting what would happen.

As soon therefore as these, with the other twelve Ambassadors, came to Cæsarea, Varus having notice of their coming, met them on the way with the Kings Forces, and slew them, together with the aforesaid Ambassadors, and took his way towards the Jews of Ecbatane. But one of the seventy who had escap'd, resorted thither with all Expedition, preventing Varus, and certified the rest what had happened. Whereupon, they incessantly fell to Arms, and with their Wives and Children retired themselves to the Fort of Gamala, abandoning their Villages, with all their Goods, and great numbers of Cattel. When Philip had Tidings hereof, he repaired also to the Fort of Gamala. The People rejoicing at his coming, exhorted him to take the Sovereignty, and to make War against Varus, and the Syrians of Cæsarea. For they had Intelligence that the King was slain. But Philip, to moderate their impetuosity, recounted to them what benefits the King had bestowed on them; and of what power the Romans were, against whom it was but a folly for them to take Arms; and in the end, he persuaded them to Peace. In the mean time, the King understanding that Varus was determined to kill all the Jews that were in Cæsarea, with their Wives and Children, all in one day, he sent Equus Medius to succeed him, as it hath been, by us, declared in another place. And Philip kept the Fort of Gamala, and the Countrey thereabouts, in their Fidelity and Loyalty to the Romans. As soon as I arrived in Galilee, and learned all Occurrences that had happened; by those who reported the same to me, I presently signified the whole matter by Letters, to the Council at Jerusalem, desiring to know what their pleasure was I should do. They gave me this answer, that I should remain where I was, and retain my Collegues that I had with me, if they thought good to take charge of Galilee. But they, after they had gathered great Sums of Money for the Tithes and Tithes that were due to them, resolved with themselves to return to their own Houses. But for this I entreated them to remain with me, till such time as we had settled Affairs, they willingly consented unto me. I therefore departed with them to the City of Sepphoris, and came into a Borough called Bethmais, distant from Tiberias some four Furlongs, and from thence I sent a Messenger to the Council of Tiberias, desiring the chiefest among the People, to come and speak with me; They came, accompanied with Justus; I told them that I was sent Ambassador Varus unjustly executed him that brought the Letters. Varus's tyranny inciting the Countrey. Varus's cruelty to conceal his power and tyranny.

Varus killed the seventy Jews with the Ambassadors. The Jews receive themselves into the Fort of Gamala, and thence rebuffed Philip also.

Gamala still faithful to the Romans.

Joseph, by the commandment of the Council, remaineth in Galilee.

A Ambassador to them, with my Collegues, by the Commonalty of Jerusalem, to persuade them to desace that Palace that was erected by Herod the Tetrach, where in divers figures of living Creatures were painted; for that our Law forbade such things; and I exhorted them to suffer us to set about that Execution as soon as possible.

Capella, and those of his Party, did for a long time refuse to consent therunto: but in the end, we press'd them so much, that they condescended. Now whilst we debated this matter, Jesus the Son of Saphias (of whom we have spoken heretofore, declaring how he was the Chief of the Faction of Sailors and poor men) took with him certain Galileans, and set fire on the Palace, in hope to get great Riches thereby (for that there were certain Roofs of the House covered with Gold) and they pillag'd many things against our Consent. After we had thus conferred with Capella, and the chiefest Tiberians, we retired from Bethmais into the higher Galilee. In the mean time, Jesus's Men slew all the Greeks that remained there, and all who before the War had been their Enemies. Which when I was certified of, I was much displeased, and went down to Tiberias, to secure the King's Moveables, for fear they should be carried away by the Robbers; and having recovered divers Candlesticks of Corinthian work, rich Tables, and no small quantity of massive Silver, I resolved with my self to reserve it to the King's use. Calling therefore ten of the chiefest Senators, and Capella, Son of Antillus, to me, I delivered the Vessels into their Hands, charging them to deliver the same to no Man but my self.

From thence, with mine Associates, I went to John at Gischala, to know what his Mind and Resolution was, and I presently discover'd, that he affected Innovation and Tyranny. For he desired me to grant him Liberty to Transport Cæsar's Wheat that was stored up in the Villages of higher Galilee, telling me, that he would bestow the price of the same, in re-edifying and repairing the Walls of his City. But I perceiving his drift, denied him that Liberty. For I thought that that Wholly would either serve the Romans, or the Province, the care of which was committed to my Hands by the City of Jerusalem. When therefore he could get nothing at my hands, he addressed to my Companions, of whom not foreseeing those Troubles that were likely to come, and greedy of Rewards, he obtained a Liberty to dispose of all the Corn that was in the Province, in that I my self was unable to contradict them both. After this, John used another subtlety: for he said, that those Jews, who inhabited Cæsarea Philippi, being by the Command of their King, restrain'd within their Walls, and wanting Virgin Oyl, desired to buy the same of him, for fear lest contrary to their Custom, they should be compelled to use that of the Greeks. This he said, not out of respect to Religion or Devotion, but for his filthy lucre's sake. For knowing that among the Cæsareans, two Sextaries were sold for a Drachm, and that at Gischala eighty Sextaries were sold for four Drachms, he sent all the Oyl that was in that Town to them, pretending my Permission. I dar'd not withstand the same, lest the People should stone me to death. By this craft, John gathered a great Sum of Money.

From this place, I dismissed my Companions back to Jerusalem, employing my self wholly afterwards in preparing Arms, and fortifying Cities. In the mean time, calling the stoutest Libertines before me, and having in vain exhorted them to quit their Arms, I persuaded the People to pay them Contribution, which was more advantageous for them, than to suffer their Countrey to be spoiled, by their Excursions. And thus having taken their Oaths, I dismiss'd them, on condition that they should not come into our Region, except they were called, or wanted their due pay, nor spoil either the Lands of the Romans, or the Inhabitants of the Countrey. But above all things, my Care was to keep Galilee in Peace. To which purpose, I got seventy pledges of their Loyalty, chosen out amongst their Nobility under pretext of Friendship. I made them my Companions and Fellow-Judges, and decreed many things according to their Opinions, having especial care, lest through rashness I should injure Justice, or for Rewards stain mine incorrupt Honour. I was now thirty years old; and though a Man who bristles himself from unlawful Affections, can hardly escape the poysoned sting of Detraction, especially if great Authority be annexed to his green years; yet none ever durst say, that I suffered Violence to be done to any Woman, or received a Bribe from any Man; yea, I refused those Tithes, which in right of Priesthood I might have received. Yet after the Conquest of the Syrians, I took part of the Spoil, which, I freely confels, I sent to Jerusalem to my Kinsmen. And though at two times I forcibly overcame the Sepphorites, the Tiberians four times, and the Gadarenes once, and had brought John under my Subjection, who had oftentimes sought to entrap me; yet could I not endure to revenge my self on him, or any of the above-named People, as in the sequel H of this Story I will make manifest.

The Galileans Faith and Love towards Joseph.
 For which cause I suppose, that God, who is the Tryer, and Searcher of all Hearts, both delivered me at this time out of the hands of myne Enemies, and afterwards many times from several Dangers and Misfortunes, as hereafter shall appear. But so great was the Fidelity and Benevolence of the common People of Galilee towards me, that their Cities being overthrown, and their Families led into Captivity, they were left toucht with their own Calamities, than concern'd for my Preservation. Which when John perceived, he began to envy me. And he writ to me, that I would give him Licence, for his Health-sake, to bathe himself in the hot Baths of Tiberias: I suspecting no Treason, willingly granted him that which he demanded. Moreover, I wrote to those, to whom I had committed the Trust and Administration of the City, to prepare him a Lodging, and to furnish him, and all his Followers, with things necessary for Diet and Entertainment. In the mean space, I pass't my time in a certain Village of Galilee, called Cana. But after that John came to Tiberias, he persuaded the Townsmen to forget their Faith and Duty to me, and revolt unto him; many of them lent a willing ear to his Entreaties, especially such as were prone to change, and desirous of dissention, and in particular Justus, and his Father Pithus, willingly entertained this occasion to revolt from my Obedience, and to submit themselves to John; yet was this Conspiracy of theirs prevented by my speedy access. For a certain Messenger came to me from Silo, whom I had formerly preferred to the Government of Tiberias, who certified me of the Citizens intent, and exhorted me in all haste to repair thither, otherwise the City would shortly fall into another mans hands. As soon as I had perused Silo's Letters, I travelled all Night with two hundred chosen Men; and sending a Messenger before me, to signify my approach to the Citizens, I neither lost time nor way: and in the Morning when I drew near the City, the People came out to meet me, and amongst the rest, John; who after he had saluted me with a suspicious Countenance, fearing lest his Treason being discovered, he should come in danger of his Life, he speedily retired himself into his Lodging. When I came to the great Piazza, and had dismiss'd all my Train but one Servant, and retained only ten armed Soldiers with me, I began to represent to the Tiberians, from a certain high place, from whence I might be heard, how important it was for them to remain faithful, since otherwise I could no longer trust them, and they would one day repent that they had fallen from their Duty.

The Galileans requir'd that they may invade Tiberias.

John exhorteth himself to Joseph.

Scarcely had I spoken this, but one of my Friends advertis'd me to descend, telling me that this was no time to reconcile the Tiberians, or to persuade them, but rather to seek mine own Security, and how I might escape mine Enemies. That John having learned that I was destitute of Followers, had sent a Thousand of his chosen Soldiers to kill me; that they were at hand, and ready to commit the Murder; which they had done, had I not speedily leapt down with the help of my Servant Jacob, and Herod the Tiberian, who carried me to the Lake; where finding a Bark by chance, and putting forth to Sea, I escaped, contrary to mine Enemies Expectation, and came to Taricheas.

As soon as the Inhabitants of that City understood how perfidiously and trayterously the Tiberians had dealt with me, they were much displeased, and betaking themselves to their Weapons, persuaded me to lead them forth against them, telling me, that they would revenge the injury that was offered unto their Governor, of which they sent Advice thorow all Galilee. Hereupon a great number of armed Galileans came to me, and persuaded me to attack Tiberias, and destroy it, and sell the Inhabitants, with their whole Families, under the Spear. The like did my Friends, who escap'd with me out of the City, persuade me. But I, in no sort, would admit their Advice, out of fear to revive a Civil War, and judging it best to accommodate the matter. To which end, I shew'd them, that such revenge would be prejudicial to themselves also, if the Romans, at their coming, should find them in Civil Discords. By this Discourse, at length, the Galileans Rage was appeased.

But when John saw that he had failed of his purpose, he began to fear for himself, and taking with him those armed Men that he had about him, he left Tiberias, and went to Gischala, from whence he wrote Letters to me, excusing the Fact, as if he had been no ways guilty thereof, and desiring me not to suspect him; and he confirmed his words with execrable Oaths, to the end to get more Credit to them. But the Galileans who were gathered in great Multitudes from all parts of the Region,

Agion, knowing that he was a wicked and perfidious Man, press'd me to lead them forth against him, promising me to ruin both him, Gischala, and all his Country. After I gave them Thanks for their Love towards me, and promised them, that mine Offices of Love should be answerable to their Kindness. But I pray'd them to refrain themselves, and to allow me to appease this Trouble without effusion of Blood.

This Request of mine the Galileans granted: Whereupon we presently went to Sephoris. But the Townsmen, who were resolv'd to continue faithful towards the Romans, fearing my approach, endeavour'd to divert me elsewhere. To which purpose, sending a Messenger to Jesus the Captain of Tiberias, B Thieves, that kept upon the Confines of Ptolemais, they promised him a great Summ of Money, if with his Army of eight hundred Men, he would make War against me. He, allur'd by their Promises, resolv'd to surprize me unawares; to which end, he desir'd me, by a Messenger, to grant him leave to come and salute me; which when he had obtained, for that I was wholly ignorant of his Treason, he took with him a Troop of his Thieves, and hasten'd speedily towards me; yet failed he of his purposed Treason; for when he was not far off from me, a certain Fugitive of his Troop discovered his intent towards me. Which when I heard, I went out into the Market-place, feigning that I knew nothing of his sacred Fraud, being attended with a multitude of armed Galileans, and among them with certain Tiberians. I sent abroad certain parties to guard the High-ways, and commanded the Keepers of the Gates, that they should only suffer Jesus to enter with the foremost of his Company, and exclude the rest: and if they attempted to break in by force, they should beat them off. Jesus entering with a few, was requir'd, by me, presently to lay down his Weapons, except he desir'd to be slain; he, seeing himself invironed with armed Souldiers, obeyed. Whereupon, they that follow'd him, and were excluded, perceiving that their Captain was apprehended, suddenly betook themselves to flight; and leading Jesus apart, I told him I was not ignorant of those Treasons which he intended against me, nor by whose Provocations he attempted the same. Yet I told him that I would pardon him, if so be by changing his manners, he would be faithful to me hereafter. He promised me all that I demanded, and I dismissed him with his Weapons; yet threatn'd to punish the Sephorites, except hereafter they desisted from their Treasons. About the same time there came to me two Noblemen, who were Subjects to the King of Trachonitis, bringing with them both Horsemen, Armor and Money: whom when the Jews would have constrain'd to be circumcised, if so be they would remain amongst them; I would not permit them to be troublesome to the Trachonites, alledging, that every Man ought to serve God according to his own Mind, and not by other Mens Impulsion: and that it was not to be suffer'd, that they, who for their Security fled unto us, should repent themselves of the trust they put in us.

E And thus having persuaded the Multitude, I freely and abundantly furnished these Men with all things necessary.

In the mean space, Agrippa sent out his Forces under the Conduct of Ejonus Modius, to take the Castle Magdala by force; which for that they durst not assault, they beset the ways, and only troubled Ganala by placing Forces upon the Avenues. But Ebatus Decadareus, who had the Government of the great Plain, hearing that I was come to a certain Village called Simonias, situate on the Confines of Galilee, and distant from the same some sixty furlongs, took with him by Night an hundred Horse that attended him, and about two hundred Footmen, with certain Inhabitants of the City of Gaba their Associates, whom he conducted by Night, and beset the Borough where I was. Against whom, after I had drawn forth a valiant Band of Men, Ebatus labour'd all he could, to toul us into the Field, for that he trusted very much in his Horsemen: but I would not give him that advantage; considering we were but Foot-men, and resolv'd to fight in the place where we were, and accordingly Ebatus charged us for a while very valiantly. At length, perceiving that he had no use of his Horsemen in that place, he found a Retreat, and departed back again with lost labour to Caba, having only lost three Men in the Battel. But I presently pursued him with two thousand Men: and when I came to Besara, which is situate on the Confines of Ptolemais, some twenty furlongs from Gaba, where Ebatus encamp'd at that time; I beset all the Passages with Corps of Guard, whereby we might be more secure from the Exursions of our Enemies, till we had carried out the Wheat, whereof there there was a great quantity stored up in that Place, which was gathered out of the Townships thereabout, belonging to Queen Bernice: and loading divers Camels and Asks, which to that end I had brought with me, I sent the same into Galilee. Having finished this business, I offered Eubrius Battle: and whereas he detracted the same, being terrified by our boldness, I took my course to encounter with Neopolitans, who (as it was reported) was in the Territory of the Tiberians, and foraged there. This Neopolitans was a Captain of Horsemen, and had undertaken to defend Scythopolis against their Enemies. I hinder'd him from doing any wrong in the Country belonging to the Tiberians, and provided for the Security of Galilee.

John Maligeth Joseph's good Success.

But John the Son of Levi, who (as I said) lived at Gischali, after he heard that all things fell out fortunately with me, that I was loved by the People, and feared by mine Enemies, he consider'd my good Fortune as an obstacle to his own, and being filled with no small Envy, and greater hope to hinder my good Success, if so be he could bring me in hatred with the People; he solicited those of Tiberias and Sephoris, and the Gabarenians, to revolt to him, which Cities are the chiefest in Galilee. For he told them, that unless his Conduct, they should be more happily govern'd. But amongst the rest, the Sephorites gave least ear unto him, and neglecting us both, only held for the Romans.

*The Gabaren-ians reveal upon
sions.*

As for the Tiberians, they would not consent to Rebel; yet promised him some Friendship. But the Gabarenians wholly addicted themselves to John, by the means of one Simon, a principal Citizen, who was John's Friend. Yet did they not openly declare for him, because they feared the Galileans, whose good will towards me they were long time assur'd of, but privily they sought other means to entrap me.

*The Debauch-

And truly I fell into great danger upon this occasion. For when certain Debauchment (being audacious young Men) had Intelligence that Ptolomy's Wife the King's Stewardess, was traveling along the great Plain with a great Equipage, out of the King's Country into the Roman Government, they suddenly set upon her, and putting the Woman to flight, they seized on all the Baggage which she carried with her. When done, they came to Taricheas, where I then was, with four Mules laden with Apparel, and Household-stuff of divers sorts; among which were divers silver Vessels, and five hundred pieces of Gold. Intending therefore to recover these things for Ptolomy, as being a Jew (because our Law permiteth not to take any from out of our own Nation, though they be our Enemies) I told those that brought the Goods, that the same should be kept to be sold, and the price bestowed upon repairing the Walls of Jerusalem. This motion of mine, the young men interpreted very hardly, because they were depriv'd of the prey which they hoped for. For which cause, dispersing themselves in the Streets of Tiberias, they spread a Rumor, that I design'd to betray the Country to the Romans, and that I only feigned that the Prey was destined to repair the Walls of Jerusalem; but the truth was, I kept the same, to the intent to restore it to Ptolomy. In which matter they were not deceived. For after the departure of the young Men, I call'd to me two chief Citizens, Daffian and Janneus the Sons of Levi, true Friends to the King, and commanded them, to take the Household-stuff, and convey it to the King, threatening them with Death, if they revealed this secret to any Man.

*Joseph labour-eth to restore

But when the rumor was spread thorow Galilee, that I would deliver the Province into the hands of the Romans, all the People were incens'd against me, and resolv'd to destroy me. They of Taricheas also giving credit to the young Men's feigned Speeches, persuaded my Guard, and the rest of the Soldiers, to take a time whilst I was asleep, and come to the Horse-race; there to consult with others how to effect their design. At the appointed place, they found many others assembled; and all of them determin'd with one Consent, to treat me as a Traytor, to the Common-wealth. But he that most of all incited them to this, was Jesus the Son of Saphias, who at that time was a principal Judge in Tiberias, a Man given over to all Wickedness, and born to breed Troubles and Sedition.

Joseph

Saphias, con-

This Man, holding the Law of Moses in his hand, in the midst of the Assembly, spake thus with a loud Voice: If (said he) you be touch'd with no care of your selves, yet at least contemn not these Sacred Laws, which that perfidious Joseph your Governor, hath not feared to violate, and for so great a Crime cannot be too severely punish'd.

After

A After he had thus spoken, and saw he was approved by the acclamations of the People, he took some armed men with him, and repaired to the House where I lodg'd, with intent to put me to death. I suspecting nothing of all this Tumult, and tired with labor, was at rest; when suddenly Simon, one of my Guard, who at that time only remained with me, seeing this furious Troop of people, came and awakened me; and certifying me of the imminent peril, he counsel'd me rather generously to kill my self, than shamefully die by mine Enemies hands. I recommended my self to God, and putting on a black Garment to disguise me, and having only my Sword by my side, I went forth, and pass'd thro' the midst of these people, and I went strait to the Hippodrome by a by way. There falling prostrate on my Face, in view of all the people, I water'd the earth with my tears, B to move all men that beheld me to compassion. And when I perceived the people begin to melt, I labour'd all I could, to divide them in opinion, before the armed Soldiers returned from my house. I confess'd that I had kept the booty for which I was accus'd, but I desir'd them to hear to what use I had reserv'd it; after which, if they pleas'd, they might kill me. Hereupon the multitude commanded me to speak; and the armed men being returned back at the same time, and beholding me, would have fallen upon me to murder me: But they were restrain'd by the peoples exclamations; and they suppos'd that after I had confess'd that I design'd to restore the booty to the King, I should pass for a Traytor, and they might kill me without opposition.

Now silence being made to hear me, I spake thus: If in your opinion I deserve death C I refuse not to die: Yet permit me, before my death, to certify you of the whole truth: When I observed that this City was most commodious and fit to entertain strangers, and that many forsaking their own Countries, came to dwell here, and were willing to partake with you in all sorts of Fortune; I resolv'd to employ this Money to build you Walls to your City, for which being thus destin'd to do you good, your indignation is provoked against me. Upon these words, the Taricheans and strangers cried out, that I deserv'd thanks, and wish'd me to be of good courage. But the Galileans and Tiberians continued in their animosity, so that they fell to dissent betwixt themselves, the one threatening me with punishment; the other, contrariwise, willing me to assure my self of security. But after I had promised the Tiberians, and those of other Cities, that I would build their Walls, where it was convenient, they credited my words, the multitude sepa- D rated, and I, beyond all expectation, having escap'd so great a peril, with certain of my Friends, and some twenty Soldiers, returned to my house.

But once again the Authors of this Sedition, fearing lest they should be punished for their offence, begit my Lodging with six hundred armed men, intending to consume it with fire. Of whose arrival, as soon as I had intelligence, imagining with my self that it would be much dishonour for me to flee, I resolv'd to use valor and courage against them. For which cause, commanding the Gates to be shut, I required them from the top of the house, to send in some of them to me, to receive that Money, for which they had been drawn into this Mutiny: Whereby they might have no further cause to be incens'd against E me. Which done, laying hold of one of the most troublesome Fellows, that with the rest came into me, I caus'd him to be beaten with many grievous strokes, and his hand to be cut off, and hung about his neck; and thus handled, we thrust him out of doors, to return to those that had sent him. So bold an action made them wonderfully afraid, and suspecting I had a great number of armed Souldiers in my house, they suddenly all of them fled away: And thus by my resolution and address I escap'd this second danger. Yet wanted there not some, who incited the people once more against me; saying, that the two Lords, who fled to me for refuge, ought not to live, except they submitted themselves to their Laws and Customs, from whom they required protection. They likewise accus'd them, that they were of the Roman Faction and Prisoners; and presently the people be- F gan to mutiny, being deceived by their words, who labour'd to flatter them.

*Another Se-

When I heard, I once more informed the people, that they ought not to persecute those who resorted unto them for succor: that the poisoning they spoke of, was a Fancy, and a Chimera, and that the Romans would not vainly nourish so many thousands of Soldiers, if they pretended to make away their Enemies with poison. Being by these words somewhat pacified, they had scarcely withdrawn themselves awhile, but that by certain outcasts and wicked men, they were incited against the two Lords, so that with Weapons they went to their Lodging, intending to Murder them. Which when I heard, I was afraid, that if this wickedness should be committed, no man hereafter would dare to trust his Life in my hand. For which cause, being assisted by divers others, I presently resort- G ed to their Lodging, and shut up the Gates: and cutting a Trench betwixt it and the Lake, I call'd for a Bark, and entering into the same with them, I conducted them to the Confines of the Hippenians: And furnishing them with Money to buy them Horses, be- cause cause they could not transport their own with them in their flight, I dismissed them, desiring them to bear their present misfortune with a constant mind. But indeed it troubled me, that I was once more forced to expose those men in the Enemies Country, who had committed themselves to my trust: Yet thinking, that if it should so fall out, that they fell into the Romans Hands, they would be safer, than if by suffering them to remain in my Country, I should see them oppressed: I adventured them thus. Yet were they saved, and the King pardon'd them. And this was the end of this Tumult.

But they of Tiberias wrote to the King, desiring him to send a Garrison into their Country, on which condition they would submit to him. As soon as I knew of it, I went to them, and they desired me that I would build them those Walls which I had promised them: For they had already heard that Tarichea was environed with Walls. Whereunto I condescended, and gathering Materials, I set the Workmen to their Task. But some three days after, departing from Tiberias toward Tarichea, which was thirty stades distant from thence, by chance a Troop of Roman Horsemen were discovered, not far from the City, which the Inhabitants believ'd were the Kings Army: Whereupon they presently began to utter many things in honour of the King, and more in my reproach. And presently a certain friend posted to me, and told me what their mind was, and how they intended to revolt from me. Which when I understood, I was wondrously troubled: For I had sent back my men of War from Tarichea to their houses, because the next day was the Sabbath: For I would by no means; that the Citizens of Tarichea should be charged or troubled with entertaining Soldiers. And at all times, when I remained in that City, I took no care of the guard of mine own person, having had often proof of the affection of the Inhabitants towards me. Being therefore at that time attended only with seven Soldiers, and a few of my Friends, I knew not what to determine. For I thought it not fit to call back my Forces, because the day was well nigh past; and although they should have been with me the next morning, yet they might not have taken Arms, because our Law forbids the same, how great soever the occasion be that is offered. And although I should have drawn forth the Taricheans, and the strangers that were retired thither, and under hope of prey, have led them forth, yet I saw that they were feeble to resist the Enemy. On the other side, I already perceived, that if I stayed over-long, the Army which was sent by the King, being already entered the City, would have excluded me. I therefore determined to use this stratagem: I presently set a Guard at the gates of the City, consisting of my most trusty Friends, suffering no man to pass out of them: and assembling the chief of every Family, I commanded them to launch their Boats into the Lake, and to follow me with the Masters of their Ships. After which, both I and my Friends, and seven other Soldiers, betook us to a Bark, and sailed toward Tiberias. But when the Tiberians saw that no Forces were come from the King, and that the whole Lake was covered with Barks, amazed, and fearing the ruin of their City, for that they supposed the Ships to be full of Soldiers, they changed their Sentiments. And laying by their Weapons, themselves with their Wives and Children came forth to meet me, and receiv'd me with joyful acclamations (for they thought I had had no notice of their intents) beseeching me that for the safety of their City, I would enter the same. But I drawing near the City, commanded the Masters of the Barks to cast Anchor far off the shore, lest the Townsmen might perceive that the Ships were empty: And I myself drawing near with mine own Bark to them, reproached them, that contrary to their Oaths, they had been so foolishly induced to revolt. After which, I promised them pardon, if so be they would deliver me ten of their chiefest Nobility: Which when they had incontinently performed, I shipt them in a Bark, and sent them Prisoners to Tarichea. Then I demanded ten more, and I continu'd to use the same artifice, till I had by little and little got all the Senate of Tiberias, and many of the chiefest Citizens, and sent them thither.

At length, the rest of the multitude, perceiving in how great danger they were, they besought me that I would punish the chief Author of this Conspiracy, who was called Clytus, a bold and rash young man: I was unresolv'd what to do, being loth to kill one of my own Nation, and yet it was expedient to punish him; wherefore I commanded Levi, one of my Guard, to seize on him, and cut off his hand. Levi was not daring, for that he was alone, to enter into to huge a multitude; I for fear lest his Cowardise should be discovered by the Tiberians, called Clytus unto me, and said unto him:

Ungrateful and perfidious man, as thou art, since thou deservest to lose both thy hands, I charge thee to become thine own Executioner, lest through delay thou procure thy further punishment. And whereas with many prayers he besought me to grant him one of his hands, I hardly condescended. At length, of his own accord, for fear he should lose both, he took a Knife, and cut off his left hand: And thus was this Tumult appeased.

As soon as I returned to Tarichea, and the Tiberians understood what stratagem I had used with them, they were all amazed, seeing how I had punished their ingratitude and disobedience without any bloodshed. Afterwards I sent for such of the people of Tiberias as were in Prison, amongst whom was Justus and his Father Piflus, and invited them to sup with me: And during the repast, I told them that I was not ignorant, that the Roman Army excelled all Men of the World in power and force: Notwithstanding, that I kept myself silent, in respect of the Seditious that were round about, and I counselled them that they also would do the like in expectation of better days; and yet that in the mean time they would not think amis of my Government, because no other could treat them better. I reminded Justus also, that before I came from Jerusalem, the Galileans had cut off his Brothers hands, accusing him to have forged false Letters before the War; and that after Philip's departure, the Gamelites, being at odds with the Babylonians, slew Cares, Philip's own Kinsman; whereas I had moderately punished his Brother-in-law Jesus, who had married his Sister. After this discourse during supper time, I set Justus and his Friends, early in the Morning, at liberty. But before this came to pass, it hapned that Philip the Son of Jacim departed from the Fort of Gamala upon this occasion: As soon as he understood that Varius was revolted from King Agrippa, and that Modius Equus, who was his Friend, was sent to succeed him, he certified him of his Estate by his Letters: which when he had received, he highly rejoiced at Philip's safety, and sent those Letters to the King and Queen, who lived at Berytus. Whereupon the King understanding the false rumor that ran touching Philip, that he was the Chieftain of the Jews Army, who undertook the War against the Romans; sent certain Horsemen to Philip to bring him to his presence: before whom he no sooner arrived, but he embraced him very kindly, and shewed him to the Roman Captains, telling them, that that was Philip of whom it was commonly reported, that he was in Rebellion against the Romans. After which, he sent him with a party of Horsemen, in all diligence to the Fort of Gamala; to draw his household servants from thence, and re-establish the Babylonians in Baranea, and travel, to his uttermost power, that the Subjects might be continued in obedience and peace. After Philip had received this commandment from the King, he halted to perform the same.

But one Joseph a pretended Physitian or Treacle-seller, gathering together a sort of bold young Men, and inciting the Nobility of Gamala, perswaded the People to fall from the King, and take Arms, for recovery of their former liberty. Having thus drawn many to his party, he fell to killing of all those that durst contradict him. Amongst these, died Cares, Jesus his Kinsman, and the Sister of Justus the Tiberian, as we have heretofore declared. After this, they requested me by Letters, that I would send them aid, and Labourers to build Walls for their Town. To both which Requests of theirs, I easily condescended. About this time the Country of Gaulonitis, as far as the Borough of Solyma, rebelled against Agrippa. I also inclosed with Walls Seleucia and Sogon, which were two strong places unaccessible, and fortified by Nature: I did the like also by Jemina, Ameritha and Charabe, a Borough of higher Galilee, although they were situated among the Rocks. I fortified in like sort Tarichea also, and Tiberias, and Sepphoris, Cities of Galilee; and the Cave of the Arbaliens, Beisobe, Selemen, Jatapa, Capharath, Comogogona, Nepappa, and the Mountain Irabyrim. In which places I stor'd up great plenty of Corn, and laid up much of Armor and Munition for defence.

Mean-while, John the Son of Levi, increased his hatred daily more and more towards me, being greatly grieved to see my prosperity: And whereas he was fully resolved to rid me of my Life, after he had encompassed his Country Gisfala with Walls, he sent Simon his Brother with an hundred Soldiers to Jerusalem, to Simon the Son of Gamaliel, desiring him to labour the matter in such sort with the City, that my Authority might be disannulled, and that John, by common consent might be ordained Governour of Galilee in my place. This Simon was born in Jerusalem, Noble in Birth, and in Sect a Pharisee (which Sect of all other, is most strictly observant in the Laws of our Country) a Man of excellent wisdom, who, by his counsel, was able to repair the decaying Ruins of his Country, and who of long time had made use of John's Friendship, because he was at that time mine Enemy.

This Man, solicited by the intercession of his Friends, perswaded the High-Priest Ananus, and Jesus the Son of Gamala, and other of his Faction, to stop my increasing honors, before I attain'd to a higher degree of power. For it should be very advantageous for them also, if I were removed from the Government of Galilee. Further, he told Ananus, and the rest, that they were not to delay the matter, lest upon discovery of their counsel, I should attack the City with an Army. Ananus the High-Priest replied, That it could not easily be done, for that divers Priests and Governours of the People bare witness for me, that I behaved my self honestly in that Government; and that it was ill done to bring an Accusation against a Man, who could not be charged with any Misdemeanor. When Simon heard what Ananias said, he pray'd him, and the rest, at least, to speak nothing thereof, nor to make his motion known: for he himself would undertake the Execution of it. And calling unto him the Brother of John, he charged him to tell his Brother that the way to accomplish his design, was to send Presents to Ananias. For (said he) they will work so much with him, that they will make him change his opinion. In the end, Simon obtained that which he long time sought after. For Ananias and his Adherents being corrupted with Money, accorded to remove me from the Government of Galilee, without the consent or allowance of any other of the Citizens. For which cause they thought good to fend certain persons Noble in Birth, and no ways inferior to one another in Learning, whereof two were of the common sort, and Pharisees: the one called Jonathas, the other Ananias; the third was Jozarus of the Tribe of Levi, who was also a Pharisee, and of the race of the Priests. To these they joined Simon, who was also defended of the High-Priests, and the youngest of them all. These they commanded to call together a Council of the Galileans, and demand of them, why they loved me so well? If they answered that it was because I was of Jerusalem, they should say that Jerusalem was their Country likewise. But if they said it was because of my knowledge in the Law, they were willing to say, that they understood the same as well as I. If they said it was in regard I was a Priest that they loved me, they should likewise aver, that two of them were Priests. Being thus Instructed, and receiving forty thousand Silver drachms of the Publick Treasure, with their Fellow and Collegue Jonathas, they set forwards.

And for that at the very same time a certain man called Jesus of Galilee, was come to Jerusalem with a band of six hundred Soldiers, they sent for him, and hired him, and gave him three Months Pay, commanding him to follow Jonathas and his Companions, and to do as they should command them: And to these they adjoined three hundred Citizens, whom they hired with Rewards. With this preparation the Legates set forward, being accompanied with Simon, John's Brother, who had one hundred Soldiers with him, with Commission from those that sent them, that if I willingly laid down Arms, they should fend me alive to Jerusalem: And if I resisted, by their Authority, they might lawfully kill me. They had Letters also directed to John, which incited him to make War against me. Moreover, they charged the Sephorites, Gabrites and Tiberians, to maintain John against me. After I had intelligence hereof, by my Fathers Letters, who had notice thereof by Jesus the Son of Gumala, one of those who were present at the deliberation, and who intirely loved me. I was much grieved, seeing with how much ingratitude my Countrymen requited me, and of malice had decreed my death; and for that my Father invited me by most affectionate Letters to draw my self homeward, telling me how much he desired to see me, who was his Son, before he left this Life. I imparted these things to my Friends, and certified them, that within three days I would forsake their Country, and retire my self into mine own. Whereupon they were surprized with great sadness, and besought me with tears, that I would not forsake them; for that they should be utterly overthrowen, if so be they were left destitute of my conduct. But whereas they could by no means perswade me, and the care of mine own security prevailed very much with me; the Galileans fearing lest I should leave them, and by that means the Thieves should be encouraged to set upon them, they sent Messengers thorow all Galilee, to signify unto them the resolution of my departure. Whereupon divers understanding the News, resorted unto me from all parts, bringing with them their Wives and Children: not so much, as I suppose, for the sorrow they conceived at my departure, as the fear that they had for themselves. For they perswaded themselves, that if I remained among them, there could no mischief befall them. They assembled therefore in a great Plain, called Asochim, where I remained.

That night in my sleep I had a strange dream. For lying in my Bed, and being wholly disconsolate and troubled with the News I had received, methought a certain Man from above spake unto me after this manner: *Comfort thy self, and fear not. For the distress in which thou art, shall be the cause to make thee great and happy, beyond thine expectation. For not only these things shall turn to a fortunate Issue, but also many other. Be not thou therefore dismayed, but remember the advice that I give thee to make War against the Romans. After this dream, I awak'd; and as I prepared to go down into the Plain, the people of Galilee, with their Wives and Children, humbling themselves to the Earth, and weeping, besought me that I would not leave them for a Prey to their Enemies; or abandon their Country to their Discretion. But seeing that I made small reckoning of their Prayers, they uttered a thousand Curses against the people of Jerusalem, that envied them the peace and happiness which they enjoyed under my conduct.*

After

A After I had heard these words, and seen the desolation of the People, my heart was melted with Compassion, and I resolv'd in my self, that in respect of so great a multitude, my Life could not be better hazarded than for their Preservation: I therefore gave my consent to remain with them, and gave order that five thousand of the best Soldiers, with fit Provisions, should attend me: as for the rest, I sent them back to their own Houses. When these five thousand presented themselves, I join'd them to the other three thousand that I had with me, and drew out with them fourscore Horsemen, and marched on towards Chabalon, a Borough upon the marches of Ptolemais, where I undertook to prepare them for the Battle, expecting some assault from Placidus, who was come with two Companies of Footmen, and one of Horsemen, sent by Cestius Gallus to burn the Country-towns of Galilee, and other little Boroughs that border on Ptolemais. And for that he was entrenched before the City of Ptolemais, I encamped my Army like-wise not far from the Borough Chabalon, some sixty stades off: and divers times drew I out my Forces to bid him Battle, but there pass'd nothing but Skirmishes. For Placidus, perceiving my forwardness to fight, was dismay'd thereby, and retired himself: yet he departed not from Ptolemais.

About this time came Jonathan, with the other Ambassadors, who (as we have heretofore declared) were sent by Simon, and the High Priest Ananias; they labour'd to entrap me by Policy, for that they durst not assail me in open field. To which purpose they writ a Letter to me to this effect: Jonathan and the Ambassadors with him, who were sent by those of Jerusalem, to Joseph, Greeting. The chief Men of Jerusalem being informed, that John of Gischala hath oftentimes sought to betray you, we are sent to repress his Malice, and to exhort him hereafter to submit himself unto you. And being desirous to confer with you, touching what concerneth the publick good, we pray you to resort to us as soon as you can, with some few Attendants, because the Borough is not able to entertain many. To this effect they writ to me, hoping that one of these two things would fall out: either that coming dismay'd, I should be easily surprized by them; or else bringing with me a great Company, I should be condemn'd for an Enemy to my Country. The Messenger that brought me this Letter, was a valiant young Man, mounted on Horse-back, and had in times past born Arms for the King. The time at which he came to me, was two hours within night, when I was banqueting with my Friends, and the chief Governors of Galilee. After that, one of my Household Servants had certified me, that a certain Jew on Horse-back was come to speak with me, I commanded he should be brought in; who saluted me but coldly, and delivering me the Letter, said unto me, They that are come from Jerusalem, send you this Letter: give them a speedy answer: For I am commanded to make a speedy return: Myself that sat at the Table with me, were amazed at the Soldiers Insolence. But for my self, I willed him to sit down and sup with us: but he refusing the same, I open'd the Letter without the observation of any present, and having seen what it contain'd, I folded it up again, and held it in my hand, in such manner as I had received it, and began to talk with my Friends of other Affairs: and not long after rising from Supper, and dismissing the rest to their repose, I only retained with me some of my most intimate Friends, and gave order that the Soldier should receive twenty drachms to bear the charges of his Voyage. He having received the same, and giving me thanks, I perceived well that he lov'd Money, and consequently might easily be wrought upon with it. Whereupon I said unto him, if thou wilt drink with me, thou shalt have a drachm for every glass thou drinkest. To this the Soldier assented willingly, and having drunk good store of Wine, to get the more Money, he became drunk; so that he was unable any longer to conceal his Secrets: but of his own accord he declared the Treason that was prepared, and how the Sentence of death was given by them against me. Which when I understood, I answer'd them to this effect: Joseph to Jonathan, and those that accompany him, Health. I am very glad to hear that you are arrived in Galilee in good health, especially because I may now deliver into your hands the government of the Affairs thereof, to the end (according as I have long time desired) I may return into my Country. I am willing not only to come to you at Xalloni, but to any further place also, though you should not send for me. But you will please to pardon me, though I come not at this present: for I am now at Chabalon, to attend Placidus, who pretendeth to invade Galilee. Report you therefore unto me, after you shall have read these my Letters. Farewell.

After I had written this answer, and deliver'd it to the Soldier to carry it to them, I sent with him thirty of my most approved Friends of Galilee, commanding them to salute the Deputies, without any further speech of any business whatsoever: I assign'd also to each of these, one of my most resolute and best Soldiers, to watch carefully if any of those I sent should confer with Jonathan's Men. They therefore set forward on their way; and Jonathan and the other seeing their first purpose failed them, they sent me another Letter to this effect: Jonathan and his Company to Joseph, Health. We commend you that within three days, you make your appearance before us, without any of your Soldiers, in the Borough of Gabara, to the end we may take Cognizance of the Crimes whereof you have accus'd John. As soon as they had writen this, and received those Gallileans whom I had sent, they went to Japha, which is the greatest Town of Galilee, fenced with strong Walls, and peopled with many Inhabitants. The People of that City, with their Wives, and Children, came forth to meet them, exclaiming against them with loud cries; and charging them to return back, and not to deprive them of the good Governor they had, Jonathan and his Companions, though displeas'd with their words, yet durst not make any open shew of their displeasure, but without returning them any answer, they resorted to other Towns, where they met with no less peremptory Exclamations from the Multitude, who protested plainly, that they would have no other Governor but Joseph. Whereupon Jonathan with his Followers departed without any further speech; and went to Sepharis, the greatest City of Galilee. The Inhabitants there likewise assailed to the Romans, went forth to meet them; but they said nothing at all concerning me. Departing from Sepharis, they went to Ascham, where the Citizens sung the same Song that the Japhians did. Wherupon they being unable to contain their displeasure, commanded their Soldiers to beat with their Tympanons those that exclaimed against them, and desir'd me for their Governor. And when they drew near Gabara, John came out to meet them, accompanied with 3000 Soldiers; and I having intelligence by their Letters, that they were resolv'd to make War against me, departed from Chablon, accompanied with 3000 Soldiers; and having committed the Camp to the charge of one of my trustiest Friends, I went to Jotapata, because I would be within forty stades of them, and sent them this Letter: If your Will be that I must needs come unto you, there are in Galilee two hundred and four Cities and Boroughs, I will meet you in any one of them, which you please, except Gabara and Gischala: for that the one is the place of John's Nativity, and the other is Confederate with him.

After Jonathan had received this answer, he replied no more, but sought means to entrap me. John was of the opinion to write to all the Cities and Boroughs of Galilee, supposing that without question there were one or two in them that were mine Enemies, whom they might incense against me, as against their common Enemy. He gave order also, that this his Resolution should be sent to Jerusalem, to the end that those of the City understanding that I was adjudged an Enemy by the Galileans, might in like sort confirm that their decree by their Opinion. For he said, that by this means it would come to pass, that the Galileans, who were well affected towards me, would forsake me, for the fear they stood in of them. This Advice of John's greatly pleas'd them all, and was presently brought unto me about the third hour of the Night, by one Sachabas, who flying from them, came and brought me the News, and particularly related to me their intent. For which cause, perceiving that the time requir'd no longer delay, I commanded Jacob, who was one of my most assured and trusty Servants, to take two hundred Men with him, and to beset the ways between Gabara and Galilee, and to send me those Passengers whom he should take, and especially those that carried Letters. I sent Jeremy also, who was one of my Friends, to the marches of Galilee, with six hundred Men at Arms, to keep the passages that way toward Jerusalem, commanding him to seize on all those that carried Letters, and to commit the Men to Prison, and to send me their Packets.

After I had in this sort instructed those whom I sent, I commanded the Galileans the next day following to take their Arms, and to furnish themselves with Victuals for three days, and to attend me at the Borough of Gabaroth. Those Soldiers that I had, I distributed into four Companies, and kept those with me, in whom I repos'd most confidence, for the guard of my Person; and having appointed Captains over them, and commanded them to be careful, I charged them to suffer no unknown Soldier to enter in among them. The next day I came to Gabaroth, at the fifth hour of the day, where I found all the fields about the City full of armed Galileans, who resorted thither to assist me, according as I had commanded them. Thither also came a multitude of other Men from other Boroughs. As soon as I came amongst them, and was ready to speak to them, all of them began to cry out, calling me their Benefactor, and the Maintainer of their Country. After I had solemnly given them thanks for this favor they shew'd me, I charged them to do no wrong, nor attempt any spoil in the Countrey, but to encamp amidst the fields, contenting themselves with that Provision they had brought with them, because I was desirous to extinguish these Troubles without effusion of blood. It hapn'd the same day, that Jonathan's Messengers and Letters fell into their hands, who had the guard of the passages by my appointment; and according to my direction, the Men were put in Custody, as I gave order; and finding the Letters that were brought me, to be full of nothing but slanders and lies writen by the Ambassadors; I said not a word to any Man, but

A but thought it best policy to march towards them. But Jonathan's Soldiers having intelligence of my coming, retir'd, and with them John also, to Jesus's Houle, which was a great Tower, nothing different from a Cittadel, in which they lodg'd a good number of Soldiers, and lock'd up all the other Gates save one; expecting that I should come that way, to salute them. In a word, they had commanded their Soldiers, that when I should enter, they should suffer no Man else to enter with me, but exclude all the rest. For they made no other account, but that by this means they might easily seize on me. But they were deceiv'd of their hopes: For having notice beforehand of their intent, as soon as I came thither, I entered into a Lodging that was right over against theirs, and feign'd that I went to take my rest. Whereupon Jonathan's Soldiers supposing that I was indeed a sleep, and safe, went forth in all haste into the Plain, and labour'd to disuade my Soldiers from their fidelity, because of my ill Government. But all things fell out contrary to what they hop'd: for as soon as they were discovered, the Galileans gave a great shout, testifying the good will they bore to me their Governor, and they blamed the Ambassadors, that without any cause of Injury, they were come to disturb the Publick Peace, and requir'd them to be gone, for that they would admit no other Governor. When these things were signified unto me, I made no doubt to adventure my self forth among them, to hear what these Ambassadors had to say against me. Upon my arrival, the whole Troop shouted for joy, and applauded me with a loud Voice, giving me thanks for my just and peaceable Government.

C Jonathan and his Adherents hearing this, were afraid, lest the Galileans should set upon them, and they should be in danger of their Lives; and so they began to bethink themselves how they might escape. But perceiving that they could not retire, because I requir'd them instantly to stay, they were so confounded, that they seem'd out of their senses. I therefore commanded the People to cease their shouting, and planted the Soldiers of greatest trust in every passage, to prevent John from charging them unawares. After this, I exhorted the People to betake them to their Weapons, to the end that if the Enemy should suddenly assail them, they might not be put into disorder. This done, I first of all began to rip up to Jonathan and his Followers, what Letters they had writen, and how they had certified me, that they were sent by the Inhabitants of Jerusalem, to make an end of those differences that were between me and John, and how they had requir'd me to come unto them. Afterwards in the sequel of my discourse, I produc'd their Letters in open view, to the end they might not deny any thing, seeing themselves convicted by their own hand-writing; and spake thus, addressing my speech to Jonathan.

If being accus'd by John, I should produce two or three witnesses that were men of reputation, to testify the sincerity of my action, is it not evident that you, O Jonathan, and you his Colleagues, could not but acknowledge mine Innocency, and acquit me of that whereof I am accus'd? But to the intent you may know that I have faithfully governed the estate of Galilee, I am not contented to produce three witnesses, but I produce all these whom you see before you. Enquire of them how I have lived, and whether I have governed this Country in all honesty and justice? E I adjure you all therefore, who are my Followers and Friends of Galilee, that you hide nothing of the truth; but that before these men, as if they were Judges, you declare if I have done any thing that is contrary to right.

After I had spoke after this manner, all of them, with one accord, called me their Benefactor and Defender, and gave testimony of my foresaid Government, and exhorted me to continue the same hereafter. And all of them affirmed by Oath, that I had carefully prevented lest any Woman should be violated, or any Man by my means drawn into any injury or inconvenience. This done, I publicly read the two Letters in the presence of all the Galileans, which were taken from Jonathan's Messengers, by those who were appointed by me to beset the ways, and were by them sent to me; which Letters were full of injuries and falsehoods, accusing me that I had behaved my self rather like a Tyrant, than a Governor, towards them: besides that, there were divers other things in them writen and urg'd very falsely. These Letters (said I) were voluntarily offered me by those that carried the same. For I was unwilling that mine Adversaries should know that I had beset the ways, lest they should forbear to write hereafter.

The People having heard this, were displeas'd and animated against Jonathan and his Followers, and press'd on to murther them; as they had surely done, had I not pacified the displeasure of the Galileans. As for the Ambassadors that accompanied Jonathan, I told them all, that I pardoned whatsoever was past, providing they would change their demeanor, and upon their return into their Country, truly report unto those who had sent them, how all things had past under my Government. This they promis'd, and I dismissed them; notwithstanding that I knew they would perform nothing of that which they had promised. But the whole multitude continuing their fury against them, defired me to give them leave to punish with all rigor those who had committed this scandalous act. But I laboured all I could to persuade them to lay no hands upon them, knowing full well that whatsoever Mutiny it be, it cannot but breed prejudice to the Commonwealth. This notwithstanding, the multitude would by no means be satisfied, but all of them ran in crowds with great fury to the Lodging, where Jonathan and the Ambassadors were. Whereupon seeing that it was impossible to restrain their fury, I incontinently betook me to my Horse, and commanded the People to follow me to Sogai a Borough of the Arabians, distant from thence some twenty stades. By this means I brought to pass, that the beginning of a Civil War might not be imputed to me.

When I arrived at Sogai, I made a halt, and admonish'd my Followers not to give way to their forward displeasures, nor entertain any desire of revenge; and I commanded them to choose out an hundred of the chiefest and eldest amongst them, who should repair to the City of Jerusalem, and there complain unto the People against those that had kindled Sedition in their Province. And I said unto them, If the People be favourable and listen to your discourse, you shall persuade them to write unto me, that by their authority I remain in Galilee; and that John and his Followers depart from hence. After I had given them this charge, and that they were furnished with all things necessary for their Journey, with all expedition on the third day I dispatched them, and sent five hundred armed Men with them. I writ also to my Friends in Samaria, so to provide for their passage, that they might finish their Journey in all security. For Samaria was already in subjection to the Romans; and it behoved my Men, of necessity, in order to make a short Journey, to pass that way. For, from Galilee, by this means a man may in three days arrive at Jerusalem. Furthermore, I conducted the Ambassadors my self as far as the Frontiers of Galilee, setting Guards upon the ways, to the end that none might easily know of their departure. Which done, I sojourned for a certain time at Japha.

But Jonathan and his Companions having failed of their purpose intended against me, dismissed John to Gisbala: as for themselves they went to Tiberias, hoping to bring the same under their obedience; for that Jesus, who was President at that time, had written to them, and promised them to persuade the People to entertain them, and to take their part if they came: in which hope they retired thither. Sylas, who (as I declared) was left by me as Agent in Tiberias, certified me of all this by his Letters, advising me to return in all diligence; in doing which, I was brought in danger of my Life, upon this occasion that ensueth; Jonathan and his Followers being come to Tiberias, persuaded divers who were mine Enemies to revolt from me; but after they were certified that I was there in Person, they were afraid, and came unto me; and saluting me, told me, that they reputed me happy, in that I had so wisely behaved my self in Galilee; and they rejoiced all in appearance, that I was returned with honor; telling me that they participated in that honor as being their Fellow-Citizen. And they protested to me that the friendship which I bore them, was more considerable to them than that of John; and desired me to return, promising very shortly to deliver John into my hands; and these speeches of theirs they seconded with dreadful Oaths, which made me think that I had no cause to disbelieve them. Furthermore, they prayed me to take up my Lodging in another place, because the Sabbath being near, it were an inconvenience that the City of Tiberias should be drawn into trouble on that day. I, who suspected nothing, repaired to Tarichea, leaving notwithstanding certain of my Friends behind me in Tiberias, who might curiously observe what the common talk was of me: and all along the way betwixt Tarichea and Tiberias, I laid certain Men in wait, who from one to another might certify me of that which was discovered by the People. The next day therefore they all assembled in the Proseucha or Oratory, which was a large house, wherein they prayed, and capable of a great Multitude. When Jonathan was entered into this place, he durst not openly speak to them of a revolt, but only told them that their City had need of a better Governor. But the President Jesus, without dissembling, spake plainly after this manner unto them; *I were better for you (my Friends) that you were subject to four Men of Nobility and great Wisdom, than to one: and thereupon he pointed to Jonathan and his Collegues. Jesus stood up, and praised this advice, and drew some of the People to his Opinion. But the greater part assented not, and there had presently followed a mutiny, had not the Assembly been dismissed, by reason it was mid-day, which is the ordinary hour amongst them to take their repast. Thus did Jonathan's Comforts remit the determination of the matter until the next day, retiring themselves without any good done. Which being reported to me, I resolved with my self the next morning to repair to the City of Tiberias; and accordingly arriving there very early I found the People already assembled in the place of Prayer; but they knew not the cause why they were assembled. Jonathan and his Collegues seeing me there, contrary to their expectation, were very much troubled, and* bethought

A bethought themselves of this subtilty. They told the Multitude that a certain Friend of theirs had inform'd them, that he had discovered certain Roman Horsemen upon the Frontiers of that Territory, some thirty stades from the City, in a place call'd Homonas. Whereupon they cry'd out, that they ought not to endure their Country to be pillag'd by the Enemy in their sight. They used this Speech, supposing that under pretext of rescuing the Country, they might send me abroad, and so remain Masters of the City, by getting the affection of the Inhabitants to my prejudice.

Now although I knew very well their intent, yet I gave ear to them, lest I should bring the Tiberians into an Opinion, that I was negligent and careless of their security. I therefore rode out, and came to the place of which they had spoken, where finding no footstep B or appearance of an Enemy, I returned speedily without delay to Tiberias. When I came there, I found the whole Council assembled with a Multitude of People, and Jonathan making against me a very vehement Inveective, that I made no account to relieve them in their Wars, and studied nothing but mine own Pleasure. And whilst they spake these words, they produced four Letters; as written unto them by those who live upon the Marches of Galilee, requiring succor of them; for that the Roman Horsemen and Footmen would within three days forage and spoil their Country. The Tiberians hearing these Allegations, and supposing them true, cryed out, saying, That it behoved them not in that manner to delay time, but to go and succor their Country-men invironed with great dangers. Whereupon I answer'd, That I was ready to obey them, and promis'd to march forth against the Enemy with all expedition. Now I knew well the pretence of Jonathan, and declar'd my Opinion, that since those Letters said, that the Romans gather'd head in divers places, it was requisite to divide our Power into five Companies, appointing every one of them a Chieftain over them, each of the Ambassadors to command one. For it is an honour for good Men not only to give council, but also when need requireth, to be first in action; and it lay not in my power to lead any more than one Company. This my advice was pleasing to all the People, who presently constrain'd these Men to march out to the War: whereby it came to pass, that they were greatly confuted to see that they could not finish that which they had imagined, because I crossed all their Enterprizes. Hereupon, one of their Party call'd Ananias, a wicked and subtle Man, counsel'd the People to celebrate a solemn Fast the next day, and gave direction at the same hour, that all of them should gather together in that place without Arms, to testify before God, that without his succors and assistance, they were able to do nothing. He spake this, not for any Piety that was in him, but to the end to surprize both me and my Followers unarm'd. To this advice of his I was constrain'd to condescend, to the end it might appear that I contemned not that which had so great an appearance of Religion. As soon therefore as we retired every one to our several Lodgings, Jonathan and his Collegues writ to John, to resort unto them early in the morning with his men of War, and all the Power he could make; for that they might easily lay hands on me, and accomplish that which they had so long time long'd for. He receiving this Letter, willingly E obey'd. The next day I commanded two of my stoutest and faithfulest Soldiers to hide their short Swords under their Gowns, and to attend me, to the end that if in any fort we were assailed by the Enemy, we might defend our selves. I put on my Curats all, and girt my Sword by my side, in such sort, as no man might perceive the same, and came with them to the place of Prayer.

But Jesus, as soon as I was entered with my Friends, having the guard of the gate, would not permit the rest of my Followers to enter with me: and as we were ready to begin our Prayers, according to the custom of the Country, Jesus rising up, demanded of me, What was become of the Household-stuff that was taken out of the King's Palace when it was burnt? and where the bullock of silver was? and with whom I had left the same? all which he mention'd, that he might delay the time till John's approach. I answer'd, That I had put the same into the hands of Capella, and ten of the chief Nobility of Tiberias, and wiled him to ask them whether it were true that I spake? He did so, and they confessed, that they had it. But what (said he) is become of those twenty pieces of Gold, that you receiv'd by the sale of a certain weight of Massive Silver? I answer'd him, That I had deliver'd the same to the Ambassadors, to defray their charges in their Voyage towards Jerusalem. Hereupon Jonathan and his Collegues said, That I had done amiss, in employing the Publick Treasure to the use of those Ambassadors. The People being displeas'd with this malice: And when I saw that a Commotion was likely to arise, I thought best to animate the People the more against them; I said, That if I had done amiss in furnishing the Ambassadors out of the common stock, they should need to take no further displeasure for that; for, said I, I will repay those twenty pieces of Gold out of mine own Purse. Hereupon the People were incensed the more against them, because they manifestly discover'd what hatred they wrongfully bare unto me. Jesus fearing lest some Disturbance might arise, commanded the People to depart, and only the Council to stay, for that it was impossible to examine matters discreetly, where so much trouble and turmoil was. The People cryed out, That they would not leave me alone among them. Whereupon there came one to Jesus, who secretly informed him, that John with his armed Men was at hand. Jonathan being unable to contain and conceal his joy, and God so providing for the conservation of my Life (since otherwise, John and his Followers had certainly destroy'd me.) Forbear (said he) ye Tiberians, to enquire of the twenty pieces of Gold, Joseph meriteth not punishment for this matter; but because he affected the Tyranny, and by his words hath deceived the People of Galilee, and gotten the Sovereignty to himself. As he spake these words, he and those of his Faction offer'd to lay hands on me, intending to murder me. But those two, whom I had with me, perceiving their intent, drew their Swords, threatening those who attempted to offer me violence. The People likewise gather'd stones to cast at Jonathan; and pull'd me away violently from mine Enemies. As I was getting away, I saw John coming with his Troops; whereupon crossing down a private way that led me to the Lake, I got into a Boat, and went by water to Tarichea, avoiding this danger beyond all hope.

There immediately I sent for the chiefest Men of Galilee, and told them, how contrary to all right, I had almost been murder'd by Jonathan and the Tiberians. The Galileans were highly incens'd against me, and conjur'd me, without delay, to make War against them; or if I list not my self, to suffer them with all expedition to cut off both John and Jonathan, with all their Followers. I restrain'd them the best I could, and represented to them that it was best to expect till such time as we knew what News our Ambassadors, that were gone to Jerusalem, would bring. To the end to do nothing without their approbation and consent; and by these means I persuaded them. But John seeing that at that time his design had no success, return'd back again to Gisbal.

Some few days after, our Ambassadors return'd from Jerusalem, and certifi'd us that the People of Jerusalem were much displeas'd with Ananias the High Priest, and Simon the Son of Gamaliel, that without their consent, they had sent Deputies into Galilee, to dispose of the Government there; and their displeasure was so great, that they were ready to set their Houses on fire. They brought me also Letters, by which the Governors of Jerusalem, upon the instant Request that the People made to them, confirm'd me in the Government of Galilee, and commanded Jonathan and his Associates to return back again with all expedition. After I had receiv'd these Letters, I repair'd to the Borough of Arbela, where I assembled the Galileans; before whom I commanded the Ambassadors to report how much the People of Jerusalem were displeas'd at those things which Jonathan had done against me; and how they confirm'd me in the Government of this Country, and recall'd Jonathan and his Confederates back again to Jerusalem. After this, I sent them that Letter that was directed to them, commanding the Messenger to observe very carefully both their Actions and Countenance. They were greatly troubled, and sent for John, and those of the Council of Tiberias, with the Governor of Gabara, and consulted with them what was best to do. The Tiberians Opinion was, that Jonathan and his Colleagues should continue to take care of Affairs, and not forsake the City which had put it self into their hands, especially, because I would attack them: for that I had so threatened them, they were not alham'd to feign and imagin. This advice not only pleas'd John, but he further gave this counsel, that two of the Ambassadors should be sent from them to the People of Jerusalem, to accuse me that I had unjustly govern'd Galilee; which they might very easily persuade the People to believe, both in regard of their Authority, as also for that the common People are by nature variable and inconstant. This counsel that John gave, was allow'd by them all: and it was thought fit that Jonathan and Ananias should in Person repair to Jerusalem, and the other two remain at Tiberias; and for their Convey they gave them an hundred armed Soldiers.

The Tiberians after this provided for the reparation of their Walls, gave commandment to all the Citizens to take Arms, and sent for some supplies to John, who was at Gisbal, to strengthen their Garrison, if they should any time be assaulted by me. Jonathan travelling onwards of his Journey, came to Dabaritta, a City situated upon the uttermost Borders of Galilee in a great Plain; there he met about Midnight with some of my Troops that kept the Watch, who commanded them to lay by their Arms, and kept them Prisoners, as I had commanded them. Hereof Levi, who had the charge of this Quarter, certifi'd me by his Letters. I dissembled the matter for two days, sent Letters

A to the Tiberians, by which I counsel'd them, to lay their Arms aside, and dismiss every one to his own dwelling place. But they returned me an injurious answer; for they supposed that Jonathan and his Train were already arrived in Jerusalem. But I setting light by their Injuries, resolv'd to use Cunning, rather than Force: for I thought it a dangerous matter to kindle a Civil War. Being therefore willing to draw them out of their walls, I chose out ten thousand of my best Soldiers, whom I distributed into three Bands, and lodged one Company of them secretly at Dora, in ambush. I placed another thousand in a certain Borough situate in a mountainous place, some four stades from Tiberias; commanding them, that as soon as I gave them a watch-word of sign, they should break forth: as for my self, I drew into the open field, and there quarter'd.

B Which when the Tiberians saw, they made continual Excursions towards me, using many bitter and injurious Taunts against me: and so great Folly possess'd them, that they laid a Coffin in the open Plain, and going round about the same, they scornfully seem'd to lament me, as dead, whilst in the mean time I took pleasure to laugh at their follies.

But being desirous to surprize by some policy Simon and Jozar the two other Colleagues, I sent to desire them that they would march forth a little without their walls, attended by their Friends, and a Guard for their Security; for that I was minded to confer with them upon a Peace, and to share the Government with them. Simon blinded with Ambition, was so weak as to come forth with all expedition; but Jozar suspecting some stratagem, would not adventure without the Walls. As soon as I saw Simon,

C I went out to meet him, and embraced him kindly, giving him thanks for that he was come down; and after walking along with him, as if I intended to communicate something with him in secret, I withdrew him from his Friends; and laying hands on him, deliver'd him to my Friends to lead him into the Borough, and gave a sign to my Soldiers to come forth, and with them I assaulted the City of Tiberias. There was a sharp skirmish on both sides, and the Tiberians had well nigh gotten the Victory: for my Soldiers began to flie; but perceiving how the matter went, I animated those of my Company, and gave a valiant onset on the Tiberians, who almost had the better, and chased them into their City, and sent another Company by the Lake, to set fire on those Houses which they should first light upon. Hereupon the Tiberians thinking their City was

D taken by force, cast down their Weapons for fear, and pray'd me to have compassion on their Wives and Children, and to pardon their City. Accordingly, being moved with compassion, I restrain'd the fury of my Soldiers; and because it was late, I founded a Retreat, both to spare the City, and relieve my wearied and wounded Soldiers. I sent for Simon to come and sup with me, and comforted him in his misfortune, promising him to send him to Jerusalem with all safety, and to furnish him for his ordinary expenses with all things necessary. The next day, with ten thousand Soldiers, I entered into Tiberias, and having assembled the chiefest Citizens in the Hippodrome, I commanded them to discover to me who had been the Authors of that Rebellion. They satisfied me, and I laid hands on them, and bound them, and sent them incontinently to Jotapata. As for Jonathan and his Consorts, I gave them Money for their charges, and sent them back to Jerusalem with Simon and Jozar, and five hundred Soldiers for their Guard. Hereupon the Tiberians re-assembled themselves before me, beseeching me to pardon their misdeeds, promising me to recompence by their future fidelity their former defection: and desiring me to restore those Goods to the Citizens, which in way of pillage were taken from them. Whereupon I gave command, that all the prey should be brought and laid before me; and whereas the Soldiers delayed to perform the same, I espying one of those Soldiers that stood by me, better appalled than he was wont to be, asked him where he had gotten that Garment: who, confessing that he had taken it in the spoil of the City, I caus'd him to be well-cudgel'd, and threatened a worse punishment to all those that would not restore what they had taken away. By which means, recovering a great part of the prey together, I gave every Citizen that which belong'd to him.

In this place I cannot forbear to reprehend Justus, and others, for foul dealing. For having spoken of this business in their Histories, they are not alham'd to gratify their passion and hatred by delivering it to Posterity otherwise than indeed it was. In which they differ nothing from Counterfeiters of Evidences, and Razers of Records, but that these Men are more encourag'd by Impunity. For Justus, to the end he might seem to employ his time well, undertaking to set down the events of this War, hath belyed me in many things, and hath been no less guilty of falsities in matters relating to his own Country. For which cause, I am necessarily enforced in this place to discover that which hitherto I have concealed, and to prove that which he hath falsely testified of me: neither is it to be wondered at, that I have so long deferred it.

For,

The Tiberians sent very bitterly against Joseph.

For whosever writes a History, though oblig'd to speak the Truth; yet is not bound to inveigh against the wicked for too vehemently; not for that they are worthy of this favour, but that he may keep himself within the bounds of Prudence and Moderation.

Tell me therefore Justus (for thou desirest to be held for the man of greatest credit amongst all other Historians) tell me, I pray thee, in familiarity (for I must so talk with thee as if thou wert present before me) how I and the Galileans were the Authors of that Rebellion, which thy Country began both against the Romans, and their King. For before I was chosen Governor of Galilee by the People of Jerusalem, both thou and all the Tiberians were not only up in Arms, but had already made War against those of Decapolis in Syria. Thy self hadst burnt thy Villages, and one of thy Servants dyed in that encounter. Yet I not I alone witness this, but it is extant also in writing in the Records of the Emperor Vespasian, how the Inhabitants of Decapolis supplicated Vespasian then in the City of Ptolemais, that thou mightest be punished, as the Author of their mischiefs: and assuredly thou hadst been punished by the Emperor, had not Agrippa, who received Commission to execute thee, upon the instant request of his Sister Bernice, spared thy Life, and kept thee bound in Prison for a long time. But the sequel of thy actions sufficiently shews what the rest of thy Life hath been, and how thou didst cause thy Country to rebel against the Romans: whereof I will produce hereafter most evident Arguments, and for thy cause will I urge somewhat against those other Tiberians, and will make it plain to such as shall read these Histories, that thou hast been no friend to Rome, nor faithful to thy King. And I first instance in the greatest Cities of Galilee, Sephoris and Tiberias, in which thou Justus wert born. The former is situate in the heart of Galilee, having round about it a number of Villages, and being easily able to make a revolt at pleasure; yet notwithstanding the Citizens thereof resolved to observe their faith to the Romans, and would not receive me, nor take Arms for the Jews. And through the fear they had of me, the Inhabitants surpris'd me by their artifices, and oblig'd me to encompass their City with a Wall: and that done, they willingly entertained a Garrison which was sent them from Cestius Gallus, who was General of the Roman Legions in Syria, and deny'd me entrance, because at that time he had a great power, and terris'd the Country round about. Then, when our great City of Jerusalem was besieged, and the Temple common to all our Nation, was in danger to fall into the Enemies hands, the Sephorites sent no Succors, to the end it might not be said that they took Arms against the Romans: But thy Country, Justus, being situate upon the Lake of Genazareth distant from Hippos thirty stades, from Gadara sixty, from Scythopolis sixscore, in a Country obedient to the King, having not any City of the Jews round about it, might have very easily kept their faith to the Romans, if they had pleas'd. For both the City and People were furnished with Munition in all abundance. But as thou sayest, I was the cause at that time. And who afterwards? For thou knowest that before the siege of Jerusalem, I was in the Romans hands; and that Jotapata was taken by force, and divers other Castles; and that a great number of Galileans had been lost in divers Battels. At that time shouldst thou have delivered thy self of that fear thou hadst of me, laying thine Arms aside, and presenting thy self to the King and the Romans, if thou tookest Arms not of thine own accord, but enforced. But the truth is, you expelled Vespasian's coming, even until such time as he begirt your City with a siege, and then laid you your Arms aside for fear of danger: yea, even then had your City been overthrow, except the King in excuse of your folly, had obtained your pardon at Vespasian's hands. It was not therefore my fault, but your own, that you behaved your selves like Enemies to the Roman Empire. Do not you remember how often I obtained the victory against you, and how seldom you could complain of Bloodshed? But you falling at dissention one with another, became the instruments of your own ruine; and not for the love you bare either to the King, or the Romans, but of your own malice you slew an hundred eighty five Citizens, at such a time as I was besieged by the Romans in Jotapata. May more, is it not true, that during the said siege of Jerusalem, there were more than two thousand Tiberians slain, or taken Prisoners? But perhaps thou wilt alledge, that at that time thou wert no Enemy, because thou wert fled to the King; but I tell thee that thou fleddest thither for the fear thou hadst of me. I am a wicked man, as thou sayest: but what art thou? whom King Agrippa delivered from punishment, at such time as thou wert condemned by Vespasian to lose thy head; whom he made Prisoner twice, and as many times past the sentence of Banishment against; and once commanded to be thine own Murderer, spared thy Life upon the importunate solicitation of his sister Bernice. And after so many Crimes committed by thee, having entertained thee for his Secretary, when he found thy corruption in that office, he banished thee from his Presence.

But

Tiberias the first Country, Sephoris and Tiberias two chief Cities of Galilee.

Justus condemned to death.

A But I will say no more of these matters; notwithstanding I wonder at thine impudence, that hast openly protested, that thou hast written more exactly and perfectly of this matter than any man; whereas thou art utterly ignorant of those things that were done in Galilee. For at that time thou wert at Berytum with the King, and knewest not what the Romans suffered at the siege of Jotapata, seeing thou didst not follow us. Neither couldst thou be able to learn how I behaved my self therein, for that there was not one of those that helped me to defend it left alive to give thee certain intelligence. Thou wilt perhaps say, that thou hast carefully described that which hapned during the siege of Jerusalem. And how is this possible? For thou wert neither Agent nor Spectator in that War; neither hast thou read the Commentaries of Vespasian. Which I clearly affirm, because thou hast written clean contrary to that which is contained therein. And if thou art so confident, that thy History is truer than others, why didst thou not publish it during the Lives of Vespasian and Titus, who were the Generals of that War; or during the Life of King Agrippa, and his Relations who were all of them very expert in the Greek Tongue? For thou hast kept it written by thee above twenty years, and mightest have produced witnesses of thine exact diligence before them, who were privy to all things. But now when they are dead, and thou thinkest that no man liveth that may reprove thee, thou hast taken the boldness to publish thy Work. I have used no such Policy in my Books, but presented them to the Emperors themselves, who were Eye-witnesses and actors thereof: For I knew in mine own Soul that I had set down all things truly; Whereupon I obtained my expected approbation. Moreover, I communicated the same History with divers others, whereof some of them were present in the War, as was King Agrippa, and some of his kindred. And Titus the Emperor himself was so desirous that Posterity should learn the truth of that History out of these Books, that he placed them in his Library, and caused them to be published, being subscribed with his own hand. As for King Agrippa, he sent me seventy two Epistles, testifying the truth of my Books, whereof two are subjoin'd, to the end, that the truth may appear thereby. King Agrippa to his dear friend Joseph, Health: I have with great contentment read the Book, wherein thou seemest in my Opinion to have handled this matter more exactly, than any other. For which cause I pray thee send me the rest. Farewell my Friend. King Agrippa to Joseph his dear Friend, Health: I perceive by thy writings that thou needest no information from me, how matters passed from the beginning: yet when we meet next, I will between me and thee tell thee certain things which thou knowest not. Thus was he a witness of the truth of my History: not flattering me, for it became him not; neither deriving me, for far was it from so noble a mind to be subject to so servile a folly; but only to this end, that the truth of my writings might be commended to the Reader by his Testimony. And thus much have I thought good to set down by way of answer to Justus.

Now as soon as I had pacified these troubles in Tiberias, and had established a council of such as were well affected towards me, I bethought my self of what concerned me to do in respect of John. All they of Galilee were of the Opinion, that I should gather together all the forces of my Government and march against John, and do Justice upon him, as he that had been the Author of all this mischief. But for mine own part, I mistook their counsels, because my desire was to extinguish these Troubles without bloodshed; and for that cause I joynd them with all diligence possible, to learn the names of all those who served under him: which being done, I published a Proclamation, by which I promised safety and pardon to all those, that should forsake John, assigning them the term of twenty days, to determine of that which seemed best for their own security; and I threatened to set fire on their Houses, and confiscate their goods, except they quitted their Arms. They hearing these things, were greatly troubled, and forsok John; and after they had laid down their Arms, they came unto me to the number of four thousand: so that only about fifteen hundred Men remained with John, either of Citizens, or Strangers of Tyre. When John perceived that he was circumvented by this policy, he ever after remained quiet in his Country in great fear.

At that time the Sephorites grew so bold, that they took Arms in confidence of the strength of their walls, and for that they saw me distracted with other business. They sent to Cestius Gallus Governor of Syria, praying him to repair to them with all expedition, and take possession of their City, or lend them a Garrison at least. Gallus promised to come to them, but he set down no certain time of his approach. Whereof when I was advertis'd, I took the Men of War I had, and marched against the Sephorites, and took their City by force. The Galileans very glad of this opportunity, and supposing the time was come wherein they might satisfy the insatiable hatred they bare against that City, omitting nothing that might wholly ruin the City, with all the Inhabitants. They set fire on the Houses which they found desolate; for all the Inhabitants were fled away for fear, and retired into a Fortrefs. They plundered the Town.

Manifest Testimonies of the truth of Joseph's History.

The first Epistle.

The second Epistle.

Joseph's protestation to his friends, to leave him to do as he pleased.

Four thousand of John's followers forsake him and follow Joseph.

Sephoris spoiled.

Town, and left nothing unspoiled; neither was there any kind of misery which they inflicted not on their Countrymen. Which when I saw, I was much grieved, and commanded them to give over; telling them it was impicity in them, to shew themselves so savage towards their Countrymen. And seeing that neither by any prayer or command I could draw them to obedience; for that their animosity was so violent, I commanded those that were about me, and whom I most trusted, to spread a rumor that the Romans were entering on the other side of the City with a great Army. All which I did, to the end that by this rumor, I might restrain the fury of the Galileans, and save the City of Sephoris. And this policy took good effect; For when they heard this news they were afraid, and forsook their pillage, to trust to their heels, because I who was their General did the like. For I made a shew, that I believed the rumor to be true, as well as they: and by this stratagem the City Sephoris was saved beyond all hope.

Tiberias in danger of ruin.

Tiberias also hardly escaped from being spoiled by the Galileans, through this occasion which entueth: The chiefest of their Council writ to the King, to desire him to come and take possession of their City. The King promised to satisfy them very shortly, and deliver his Letters to one of his chamber, called Crispus a Jew born, to carry the same to the Tiberian. The Galileans took this messenger on the way, and brought him unto me: Which when the common People understood, of meer spleen they fell to Arms, and the next day divers of them assembled themselves from all parts, and came to the City of Ajach, where I made my abode, and made great exclamations, calling the Tiberians Traitors, and the Kings Friends, and demanding of me liberty to repair to Tiberias, and raze it to the ground, being as much displeased against the Tiberians, as they were against the Sephorites.

Jephthah consulted with himself.

Which when I heard, I stood in great doubt how to deliver the Tiberians from that displeasure, which the Galileans had conceived against them: for I could not deny him that the Tiberians had written and sent for the King: For the answer which he made them, did evidently exprest the same. Having a long while debated the matter with my self, I said unto them; I know as well as you that the Tiberians have offended; neither will I hinder you from spoiling their City, but you must proceed to the Execution thereof with some prudence. For the Tiberians alone do not betray the publick liberty, but others also, who are more accounted of in the Country of Galilee. Stay therefore until such time as I am thoroughly informed, who they be that are Authors of this Treason; and then you shall have them all under your hands, with all such you particularly think worthy punishment. By this discourse I appeased the People, who departed from me contented. As for the Messenger that was sent by the King, I caused him to be imprisoned, having respect to an urgent necessity of mine own, which constrained me to depart out of the Kingdom within a little while. And calling Crispus secretly unto me, I charged him to make the Souldier Drunk, who had the charge of him, to the end that he might in all security flee back to the King. Thus Tiberias being ready to be destroyed the second time, by my Government and Providence, avoided a great and fatal danger.

Justus departs to command Galilee.

At the same time Justus, the Son of Pistus, fled to the King without my knowledge; the cause of which flight, I will orderly exprest. As soon as the Romans had begun the War against the Jews, the Tiberians concluded to obey the King, and in no sort to rebel against the Romans. But Justus persuaded them to take Arms, thirsting after alteration, and hoping to usurp the Government of Galilee, and of his own Country: But his hope failed him; for the Galileans being enviously bent against the Tiberians, for those injuries that had suffered at their hands before the War, would not allow Justus to be their Governor. My self also, whom the People of Jerusalem put in trust with the Government of Galilee, was oftentimes so much moved, that I failed little of killing Justus; so intolerable was his perfidiousness. He therefore fearing least my displeasure should shorten his days, went to the King, supposing that he might live more freely and securely with him.

Jephthah afflicted the Walls of Sephoris.

The Sephorites beyond their expectation having escaped this first danger, writ to Cessus Gallus the second time; desiring him to come to them, to the end he might seize their City; or else send them Forces to withstand the Incurfions of their Enemies. And they wrought so much, that Gallus sent them a Body of Horsemen, and after them Footmen, who came by Night, and were received into their City. But seeing that the Country round about was but in poor Estate by reason of the Romans Horsemen, I drew my Forces together, and came to Garizim, where I encamped some twenty stades from Sephoris; and by night I approached the same, and set Ladders to the wall, with which I entered a great number of my Souldiers, and became Master of the better part of the City; from whence notwithstanding we were afterwards constrained to retire, because we knew not all the ways, killing before our departure twelve Roman Footmen and two Horsemen,

A men, with some Sephorites; with the loss of one of ours. Afterwards we fought hardily between us and their Horsemen in open field, we fought for a long time with disadvantage: For the Romans having invironed me on all sides, my Rearward, through the fear they conceived, began to retire. In this Skirmish I lost one of my Guards called Japhis, who in times past had served in the very same place under the King: After this, the Kings Forces both of Horse and Foot came thither, under the Government of Silas Capitan of the Guard, who encamping some five stades off from Julius, beset the Highways that lead towards Cana with Men of War; and the Fort of Gamala; to hinder the Inhabitants from receiving any Commodities from the Country of Galilee, and to cut off all business.

As soon as I received News hereof, I sent out two thousand Souldiers under the command of Jereny, who lodging themselves within a stade of Julius, near the River Jordan, offered nothing else but light skirmishes, until such time as I had gathered three thousand Souldiers more; and came to them: The next day, having waited an Ambush in a certain Trench near the enclosure of their Camp, I stole out the Kings Souldiers to skirmish, having first forewarned my Souldiers to seign a flight: all they that drew their Enemies as far as the Ambush; which they cunningly executed. Thus Silas supposing that our Men fled for Cowardice, set forward to follow them as far as he could; but they that lay in Ambush charged him on the back, and discomfited his Army; and presently turning, and making head against them, constrained the Kings Forces to return to their heels; and I should have got a signal Victory, had not Fortune crossed my success. For the Horse whercon I rode, falling into a certain Bog, cast me on the ground; whereby my hand being put out of joint about the wrist, I was carried to the house of Cepharom. My Souldiers hearing thereof, and fearing lest some worse misfortune had befallen me, than indeed there had, restrained themselves from pursuing the Enemy any further. Having therefore sent for Physicians, and caused my self to be dressed, I stayed there for that day; and being seized with a Fever, I was carried by Night to Tarichea, according to the advice of my Physicians.

Silas and his Souldiers having News of my accident, recovered their courages; and understanding that we kept but slender watch in our Camp, they laid an Ambush by Night on this side Jordan, with their Horsemen; and as soon as the day appeared, he invited out our Souldiers to fight, who willingly consented thereunto; and being come into the Plain, they perceived the Men that lay in Ambush; by whom they were put to flight, and six of our Men were slain. But they pursued their Victory no further: For having News that certain Troops were coming from Tarichea to Julius, they were afraid, and returned back.

Not long after, Vespasian arrived at Tyre, accompanied with King Agrippa. Against whom the Tyrians began to utter many Reproaches, telling Vespasian; that the King was an Enemy both to the Tyrians and the Romans; and that Philip his General, had betrayed the Kings Palace and the Roman Army in Jerusalem, and that by the Kings Commission: Which when Vespasian understood, he reproved this impudent Boldness of the Tyrians, for blaming a King of that power, and a friend to the Romans; and advised the King to send Philip to Rome, to give account of his Actions. But notwithstanding that Philip was sent thither, yet he presented not himself before Nero; for finding him extremely busied with Troubles and Civil Wars, he return'd to the King without doing any thing. When Vespasian was arriv'd at Ptolemais, the Inhabitants of Decapolis accused Justus the Tiberian, for burning their Boroughs. Vespasian therefore delivered him bound to the King, as being his Subject, that he might be punished. And the King before that time, unwitting to Vespasian, kept him Prisoner, as it hath been heretofore declared. The Sephorites also resort to Vespasian to salute him, and received a Garrison both with them, with their Commander Placidus, against whom I made War, until such time as Vespasian arriv'd at Galilee; of which arrival I have amply spoken in my Books of the Wars of the Jews; how he came, how he fought against me, the first time near the City of Tarichea; how I departed from thence to Jotapata; how I fell into the hands of the Romans; how I was afterwards set at liberty; and in a word, all my actions and fortunes during the Wars of the Jews, and the siege of the City of Jerusalem. But now it seemeth necessary that I describe other things exploited by me, during my life-time in other places, than in the Wars of the Jews. After the Siege of Jotapata was ended, I was Prisoner with the Romans, and kept very carefully; notwithstanding Vespasian did me much honour. For by his commandment I married a Virgin, that was one of those that had been taken captive in Cesarea. But she remain'd not long with me; for after I was set at liberty, and that I follow'd Vespasian to Alexandria, she left me. After which, I married another Wife in Alexandria, from whence I was sent to Titus to the siege of Jerusalem, where I was oftentimes in danger of death. For the Jews labour'd what they could to destroy me:

that Titus put between the Ro-

me; and the Romans supposing that as often as the lot of Arms was not favourable to them, it was by my Treason, cry'd out continually to the Emperor to execute me for a Traitor. But Titus well experienc'd in the Chances of War, pacified the violence which his Souldiers intended against me, by his silence. And after the City of Jerusalem was taken, Titus often solicited me to take what I lik'd among the Ruins of Jerusalem, promising to give it me. But I making small account of any thing after the Ruin of my Country, pray'd him only to give me the liberty of some Persons, and the Sacred Bible, which I receiv'd for a great Consolation in my Miseries. All which he graciously granted me. Not long after, having beg'd my Brother, and fifty other of my Friends, they were given me; and I was refus'd in nothing. Entering into the Temple by Titus's Permission, I found a great number of Prisoners shut up therein; and all those Women and Children of my Friends and Familiars, whom I knew, I deliver'd, to the number of 1900; without paying any Ransom; and I restor'd them to their former free Condition. Being sent with Cerealis and a thousand Horse into the City of Ticoa by the Emperor Titus, to see if the place were fit for a Camp: in returning from thence, I saw divers Prisoners Crucifi'd, amongst which, were three of my Familiars; whereat I was griev'd in my Soul, and I came and signifi'd the same to Titus with Tears: who incontinently commanded that they should be taken down, and as carefully drest and cured as might be; two of which dyed, notwithstanding the utmost diligence of the Physitians, and the third surviv'd.

After Titus had appeas'd the Troubles of Judea, conceiving with himself, that the Possessions which I had about Jerusalem, would yield me but little profit, by reason of the Roman Garrison that should be placed there, he gave me Lands at a greater distance; and intending to embark himself for Rome, he took me with him in his own Ship, and did me great honour. As soon as we came to Rome, Vespasian had great care of me; for he lodg'd me in his own House, where he liv'd before he was Emperor, and honour'd me with the Title of a Citizen of Rome, and gave me an annual Pension; and as long as he lived, continued his good Affection towards me, omitting no kind of bounty which he might use towards me. Whereupon I was so much envied, that I came in danger thereby to lose my Life. For a certain Jew called Jonathan, having stirr'd up a Sedition in Cyrene, and gathered about him some two thousand Inhabitants of the Country, who were all severely punish'd; and himself being sent bound by the Governor of that Country, to the Emperor, he accus'd me that I had sent him Arms and Money. But Vespasian knew his falshood, and caus'd his Head to be cut off. After this, my Enemies objected divers Crimes against me, in regard that I was in good Reputation; but God deliver'd me from them all. Moreover, I received in gift from Vespasian, an ample possession in Judea; and about the same time I forsook my Wife, because her manners pleas'd me not, although she was the Mother of my three Children; of whom two are deceased, and the third, called Hircanus, is yet alive. After this, I married a Wife that was born in Candy, by Nation a Jew, and by Birth Noble, and one of the greatest Reputation amongst the Inhabitants, endow'd with as laudable manners, as any other Woman whatsoever. By her I had two Sons, Justus, who was the eldest, and Simon, who was also surnam'd Agrippa. Thus far touching my domestical Affairs. To which I must add, that I have always continu'd to be honor'd with the good-will of the Emperors. For after Vespasian's death, Titus, who succeeded him in the Empire, continued the same favor which his Father had shew'd me. For although I was oftentimes accus'd, yet were not my Adversaries believ'd. Domitian, who succeeded him, augmented my Honors. For he punish'd those Jews that accus'd me, and gave order that the Eunuch and slave whom I kept to teach my Son, and by whom I was accus'd, should be punish'd. He granted me Exemption also from all the Tributes of Judea, which is one of the greatest Honors that a Man can receive. And as for Domitia, the Emperor's Wife, she always continued her good Affection towards me. Behold here the short Recital of my whole Life; whereby let each Man conjecture of my Manners. As for you, O thrice excellent Epaphroditus, after I have dedicated to you the Continuation of my Antiquities, I will forbear to say more thereof.

c. The Preface of Josephus.

THET who apply themselves to write History, have not all one and the same intent and motive, but oftentimes very different causes of their labours. For some are led to this study, by a desire to shew their Eloquence, and to gain Reputation: Others do it, to oblige the persons whose actions they relate; and they strive to the uttermost to please them. Others engage upon it, because having born a part in the Events which they describe, they are willing that the Publick should have knowledge of the same. Lastly, others employ themselves this way, for that they cannot suffer, that things worthy to be known by all the World, should remain buried in silence. Now of these forenamed causes, the two last are these that incited me to write. For on the one side, in regard I was an Actor in the War against the Romans, and a Witness of the Actions which pass'd therein, and also know what were the several Events thereof, I conceiv'd my self oblig'd, and, in a manner, forc'd to write the History of the same, to the end to manifest the unfaithfulness of those, who having written concerning this Subject before me, have disguis'd and perverted the Truth. And on the other side, I have reason to believe that the Greeks will be well pleas'd with this Work, because it will afford them an Account of the Antiquity of our Nation, and the Form of our Common-wealth, Translated out of Hebrew into their own Tongue. When I began the History of the foresaid War, I purpos'd to lay open to the World, How and whence the Jews had their first original; What alterations in Fortune they had fall'n into; By what Law-maker they had been instructed in Piety, and incited to the exercise of Vertue; What Wars they sustained through several Ages; and finally, How, against their Will, they became engag'd in this last against the Romans. But for that this Subject was too ample and copious, to be treated only in passing, I thought fit to make a separate Work after it, and accordingly set upon this Treatise. Afterwards (as it usually happeneth to those that attempt matters of great difficulty) I fell into a certain Stupidity, which made me very backward to resolve upon the Translation of so long a History, into a Foreign Language. Yet some there were, who instant'd with a desire of Knowledge, animated me to this action; and especially Epaphroditus, a man enamour'd of all Learning, and particularly History; which is not to be wonder'd at, since himself hath had very considerable Employments, and experienc'd several Accidents of Fortune; in all which he hath shew'd a marvellous magnanimity of courage, with an unmoveable resolution to follow Vertue. Being thus perswaded by him, who is accustomed to encourage those whom he perceives dispos'd to perform things profitable and honest; and (which is more) being ashamed in my self, that I should rather take delight to follow idleness, than addit my self to so laudable an exercise, I resum'd my Work, and with so much the greater cheerfulness, when I consider'd with my self, that our Ancestors never made any difficulty to communicate matters of this nature to strangers; and that the most famous among the Greeks, have been curious to understand what pass'd among us. For Psolomus King of Egypt, the second of the Name (highly affection'd to good Letters, and desirous to store and gather Books at incredible charge) caus'd our Laws and Customs, and Manners of living, to be Translated into the Greek Tongue. And our High Priest Eleazar (who was not second in Vertue to any other whatsoever) thought not fit to deny deny this satisfaction to that Prince, as he would without doubt have done, had it not been the ordinary course of our Ancestors, not to conceal from other men, such things as are good and laudable. For which cause I have held it a matter no ways undecent for me, to follow the goodness and generosity of that worthy High Priest; and the rather, for that even at this day I suppose many are no less well affected to good Letters, than that great King. Yet the Copy of all the Holy Scripture was not given him; but those Translators who were sent unto him to Alexandria, did only communicate that unto him which belongs to our Law. But the things that are found written in the Sacred Books of Holy Scripture, are innumerable; being the History of five thousand years; in which divers extraordinary Events and Revolutions, sundry great Wars, and many glorious Actions done by excellent Captains are described. In sum, if any one have a desire to read this History, he shall principally learn and observe, That all things fall out happily, and beyond their expectation, to those men who observe the Will of God, and are afraid to transgress his Commandments; and that God hath prepared for such the crown and reward of Felicity; as on the contrary, that they who depart from the diligent observance thereof, instead of succeeding in their designs (how just soever the same may seem to themselves) fall into all sort of misfortunes, and into miseries without recovery. For which cause I exhort all those that shall read these Books, to conform themselves to the Will of God, and to observe in Moses our excellent Law-giver, how worthily he hath spoken of his Divine Nature; how he hath manifested that all his Works are proportionable to his infinite Greatness; and how his whole Narration thereof is pure and free from the vanity of Fables, whereunto all other Histories are polluted. For the Antiquity alone of his History secures him from the suspicion, that one might entertain of his having mingled any thing fabulous in his writings; inasmuch as he was born more than two thousand years ago, which is a continuance of Ages, to which the Poets neither durst refer the original of their Gods; neither the deeds or laws of Men, whereof they make mention. But in pursuit of our History, the sequel of our Discourse shall declare all things exactly, and in the order which is observed in the Sacred Books. For in compiling this Work, I have promised neither to add nor to pretermitt any thing: And for that all whatsoever we shall declare, doth almost wholly depend on the knowledge which the wisdom of our Law-maker Moses hath given us thereof; it is necessary before all other things, that I speak somewhat of himself; lest perhaps any man should wonder, that in a History wherein it may seem that I ought to relate nothing but Actions past, and Precepts concerning manners, nevertheless I intermix so many things which concern the knowledge of Nature. We ought therefore to know, that Moses thought it most especially necessary, for him that will either virtuously dispose his own Life, or impose Laws to other men, to begin with the knowledge of God; and after having attentively consider'd all his Works, to strive as much as in him lieth, to imitate his most perfect example, and follow him with all diligence. For it is impossible, that a Law-giver being void of this contemplation, should have good sense; or that his writings should be of any moment to induce them unto virtue, who should receive those Laws, except before all things they learn, that God who is the Father, and Lord of all, and that seeth all, giveth happy life unto those that follow him; and contrariwise invironeth them with great Calamities, who forsake the way of virtue and righteousness. Moses therefore intending to instruct his Citizens in this doctrine, began not his Ordinances with the Treatise of Contracts and Covenants, which we practise one with another, as other Law-givers are accustomed to do, but he hath raised their minds to the knowledge of God, taught them in what manner this World was made by him, and shew'd them that the principal work among all those things which God made in the World, is Man. And after that he had made them capable of things concerning Piety, then might he more easily persuade them in the rest. Whereas other Law-givers, addicting themselves unto Fables, have in their Discourse imposed on their gods the infamy of sins committed by men, and by that means have brought to pass, that the wicked sort are yet more wicked, and addicted to evil doing. But our admirable Law-giver, after having declared that God is in himself all virtue pure and unspotted, he shew'd that men also ought to endeavor to imitate the same; and on those things neither conceive nor believe those things, he inflicted a grievous and inevitable punishment. Therefore the Reader therefore to examine our Writings according to these Rules: for to those that consider after this manner, nothing shall seem either absurd or unworthy the Majesty of God, or of his love to men; by reason that all things have their disposition conformable to the universal nature, which our Law-giver hath declared sometimes obscurely, sometimes in convenient Allegories gravely; and elsewhere expressing that manifestly, and publishing that in plain words, which ought openly to be made known. The causes whereof, if any man would search, he might find need of a most deep and philosophical contemplation; which I overlook at this present, not staying longer thereon: but if God shall give me time, I will enforce my self to compose it in a Volume, as soon as I shall have finished this Work. For this present then I will apply my self, to relate those things which have been done, beginning at the Creation of the World, according as Moses hath taught us, and I have found written in the Holy Scriptures.

C H A P. I.

The Creation of the World. Adam and Eve disobey the Command of God, and are driven out of the earthly Paradise.

I N the beginning God created Heaven and Earth. Now the Earth, not being subject to sight, but covered with thick darkness, and traversed with an Air coming from high; E God commanded that there should be Light; and after the Light was made, having considered the universal matter, he separated the Light from the Darkness, and named the Darkness Night, and the Light Day; calling the Morning the beginning of the Day, and the Evening the time wherein we cease from Travel; and this was the first Day which Moses in his Language called a Day, and not the first Day: whereof at this present I could give a sufficient reason; but for that in a particular Discourse I have promised to write of all such things; I will refer the declaration thereof to its convenient time and place. After this, on the second Day, God created the Heaven, and placed it above all the World, having separated it from other things; and making it firm by the means of a Crystalline matter, he endowed it with a quality moist and rainy, to the end the Flame might render the Earth fruitful. The third Day, he firmly established the Earth, spreading the Sea round about the same; and the same Day, he with a word caused all Plants and Seeds to spring upon the face of the Earth. The fourth Day, he embellished the Heavens, with the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars, ordaining them their Motions and Courses, by which the Seasons orderly ensuing might be distinguished. In the fifth Day, he made all kind of living Creatures which dwell upon the face of the Earth, as well as those that swim in the deep Waters, as those that fly in the Air; uniting them together by couples and pairs, to the end that each, in their kind, might increase and multiply. The sixth Day, he made all Four-footed Beasts, and distinguish'd them into Male and Female: and in the same Day, he formed Man. So that Moses saith, That the G World, and all that is therein, was made in six Days, and that on the seventh Day, God took rest, and ceased from his labor. By reason whereof, we likewise desist from Travel on that Day which we call the Sabbath, which in our Language signifies Rest.

After the seventh day, Moses describes more particularly the original of Man, and the manner of his Creation, in these terms; God framed Man of the dust of the Earth, and breath'd into him a Spirit and Soul; which Man was called Adam, an Hebrew word, signifying red, because he was made of Earth, which was red or yellow; for the natural Earth, called Virgin-earth, is of that colour. Then brought God all kind of living Creatures before Adam, shewing him as well the Male as the female; on whom Adam bestowed those Names, which to this present time they retain. And seeing that Adam had no female to accompany and live with him (for as yet there was no Woman) and for that he thought it strange that all other living Creatures had their companions: God took one of his ribs from him at such time as he slept, and of the same he form'd a Woman; who being brought before Adam, he did acknowledge that she was made for him. Now in Hebrew a Woman is called Isha, but this was called Eva, which is as much as to say, The Mother of all Living. He declar'd also, that God planted in the East a Garden, flourishing and adorned with all sorts of Plants, amongst which was the Tree of Life, and another the Tree of Knowledge, by which was known both good and evil. And after he had brought Adam and his Wife into this Garden, he commanded them to keep and cherish the Plants. Now this Garden was watered by a River that invironed it round about, and divided it self into four Channels or Rivers. The first called Phison (which name signifieth abundance or multitude) floweth by the Land of India, and entrench into the great Sea, and is by the Greeks called Ganges. The second called Euphrates, and in Hebrew Phora (that is to say, disposition or flower). And the third called Tigris or Diglatb (which signifieth strait and swift) K fall into the Red Sea. Gehon, which is the fourth, runneth through the Country of Egypt, and signifieth as much as coming from the East: the Greeks call it Nilus.

Now God commanded Adam and his Wife to eat of the fruits of all other Plants, but to abstain from that of Knowledge, telling them, that at what time soever they should taste of the same, they should die the death. Now at that time all living Creatures were at accord one with another; but the Serpent, who was very tame towards Adam and his Wife, became inflamed with envy, for that he saw they should be happy, if they continued in the observation of God's Commandments; and that contrariwise, they should call themselves headlong into ruin and destruction, if they should disobey the same. He therefore maliciously persuaded the Woman to taste the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge, L giving her to understand, that the knowledge of good and evil was in the same; and that as soon as they had tasted thereof, they should lead a life no less happy than God himself: and by this means he caus'd the Woman to fall, who had no regard of the ordinance of God. For having her self tasted of this fruit, and finding it pleasant and delicious in taste, she persuaded her Husband also to taste the same: whereupon they understood that they were naked, and sought means to cover themselves: (for this fruit had in it self the virtue to give Understanding, and to quicken the Mind.) Then covered they themselves with Fig-leaves; which they put before their Privities, esteeming themselves more happy than they were before, in that they now knew that which before they were ignorant of. But when God came into the Garden, Adam (who before was accustomed familiarly to talk with him) finding himself guilty of sin, hid himself from his Presence: but God asked him for what cause he fled and shunn'd him at that time, whereas before he had taken pleasure to talk familiarly with him? Adam knowing that he had transgressed the Ordinances and Commandments of God, answer'd him not a word, but God spake unto him after this manner: I had provided for you the means whereby you might have led your life without any evil, or sense of misery; so that all whatsoever was requisite for necessity or pleasure, might have hapned of it self unto you, by my only providence, without any trial or care on your parts; which if you had well used, your life would have been very lovely and very happy: but you have scorn'd this mine Ordinance, and broken my Commandments. For in that thou art silent at this time, it proceedeth not of respect, but of evil; of which thou findest thy self culpable. Adam excuseth his sin as well as he could, and prayed God not to be incensed against him, laying the fault of that which had hapned, upon his Wife, alleging that he had offended, by reason he was deceived by her: and the Woman accus'd the Serpent. But God for his punishment, because he had suffer'd himself to be overcome by the counsel of a Woman, declar'd that the Earth thenceforward never more of its own accord should bring forth fruit; but only when they till'd it with the sweat of their countenance: nor should it always yield all that was expected from it. And as touching Eve, he chastis'd her with Child-bearing, and throes in Travel; for that being her self deceiv'd by the Serpent, he had drawn her Husband by the same means into extreme misery. He took also from the Serpent his speech, and was displac'd with him, * by reason of the malice he had conceived against Adam; and he put venom on his tongue, declaring him an enemy both to Man and Woman; whom he

A he commanded to bruise the head of the Serpent, as well for that all the evil which changed unto Men, proceeded from his head; as also in that being assaulted in that part, he is most easily put to death. Moreover, having deprived him of his sex, he condemn'd him to hide and trail himself along the earth. After God had ordained them to suffer these punishments, he drove Adam and Eve out of the Garden of delights, into another place.

CHAPTER II.

Cain kills his Brother Abel. God banishes him for it: His Posterity is curs'd at himself. The Virtues of Seth the other Son of Adam.

BUT Adam and Eve had two male-children, the first whereof was called Cain (which signifies acquisition), and the second was called Abel (which signifies mourning); they had also three Daughters. These Brothers were of very different Inclinations. Abel the younger honour'd Justice, and (supposing that God was present in all his actions) he always and wholly fix'd his thoughts on Justice; and his exercise was keeping of Sheep. But Cain (being a wicked Man, and addicted to insatiable desire of profit) was he that first found out the use of the Plough. He killed his Brother for the cause, which ensueth: Having concluded among themselves to sacrifice unto God, Cain offer'd the fruits of his labour, and planting; Abel presented milk, and the firstlings of his fold, which sacrifice of his, was more acceptable to God, in that it rather consisted of things produced of themselves by the order of nature, than that which Cain's covetousness had forcibly in a manner extorted from nature. Hereupon Cain (being enrag'd because his Brother Abel was more honour'd by God than himself, Men his Brother; and having hidden his body out of sight, he thought the Murder would be concealed. But God well knowing the fact, appear'd to Cain, and question'd him concerning his Brother, what was become of him, for that for some days he had not seen him; whereas before they had been always together. Cain (being troubled, and ignorant what answer to make unto God) said at first that he wonder'd what was the cause his Brother was so long absent: but afterwards being troubled that God continued the question, and more closely press'd him; he said he was not his Brother's keeper, nor bound to take care of his affairs. Then God reproved and convinc'd Cain of murdering his Brother; and ask'd him how he dar'd deny the knowledge of his Brothers death, whereas he himself had slain him. Notwithstanding God forbore to inflict upon him the punishment deserved for this Murder, by reason that Cain offer'd Sacrifice; and made request unto God, that it would please him to remit somewhat of the severity of his justice against him. Yet did God curse him, and threaten to punish his Posterity to the tenth Generation. Then did he drive him and his Wife out of that Country: whereat Cain being affrighted (for fear of being encountered and devour'd by some Savage Beasts) God commanded him to suspect no dangerous event for that cause, assuring him that he might safely travel through all Regions, without being either assaulted or seized by Savage Beasts: and having set his mark upon him, by which he might be known, he commanded him to depart the Country. After that Cain (accompanied with his Wife) had travelled through divers Regions, he made his abode at Nave, and in that place had several Children. But he made not use of this chastisement for his better amendment, but rather became worse and worse; for he abandoned himself to all sensual pleasures, making it his sport to outrage those with whom he convers'd, filling his house with riches gotten by rapine and violence; and gathering together other wicked and debauch'd Men, he taught them to commit all sorts of crimes and impieties: he destroy'd that simplicity which Men before that time had us'd in their mutual societies, by the inventions of Measures and Weights; the ignorance whereof was the cause that the life of Man was estranged from deceit: but instead of place of free and plain sincerity; he introduced fraud and deceit. He it was that first bound'd the fields, and built the first City, and made a Wall and a rampire, enforcing his Followers to dwell therein. This City he nam'd Enos, by the name of Enos his first begotten Son. Jared was the Son of Enos; of Jared issued Milalcad, whose Son was Methusala, who begot Lamech, who had 77 Children by his two Wives, Sella and Ada; amongst whom, Jabel the Son of Ada was the first that made Tents, and took delight to lead a Pastoral life; contenting himself with the same. Jabal his Brother invent'd Music, and the Psaltery and Harp. And as touching Jabel one of his Sons, by his other Wife Sella, he surpass'd all his other Brethren in courage, and bravely managed the affairs of War, by which means he got Riches, and Means to maintain his life with more pleasure than formerly. He it was that first invent'd the art of Forging, and was Father to a Daughter nam'd Naama. But Lamech being well instructed in Divine things, and foreseeing that he should suffer punishment for the fratricide of Cain, he told it to his two Wives.

So it was, that during the life of Adam himself, the successors of Cain were most wicked, teaching and imitating one another's wickedness, the last of them proving always the worst; so that they were strangely inflamed to follow War and Theft: and if perhaps some of them were more remiss than others in committing Murders, and outrages; yet were they rapacious enough to spoil and possess the goods and heritages of other Men. But Adam the first Man made of Earth: (for the History requireth that I should return to speak of him) after the death of Abel, and the flight of Cain, earnestly desired to have Children; and accordingly he had many, being about the age of two hundred and thirty years: besides which, after he had lived some seven hundred more, at last he died; amongst whose Children was Seth. Now for that it were too long to speak of all of them, I will only touch that which concerneth Seth: He being nourished and trained by his Father to the years of his childhood, studied virtue, and left his Descendants Heirs and followers of his sanctity: who being all of them well born, remained in the World free from all contention; and lived happily: so that it never happened that any of them in any sort did injury to any Man. To these we owe the Science of Astronomy, and all that which concerneth the Beauty and Order of the Heavens. And to the end that their inventions might not wear out of the memories of Men, nor perish before they were perfectly known (inasmuch as Adam had foretold them of the general destruction of all things after two sorts, the one by the force of fire, and the other by the violence and abundance of Waters) they made two Pillars; the one of Brick, and the other of Stone; and engraved in each of them such things as they had invented; to the end if that of Brick should be abolished by the overflowings and rage of Waters; that other of Stone might remain, and declare unto Men that which was imprinted thereon for their instructions. That of Brick was destroyed by the deluge, but the other of Stone is to be seen in the Country of Syria even to this present day.

C H A P. III.

Of the Posterity of Adam till the Deluge, from which God preserved Noah and his Family in the Ark.

IN this manner Mankind liv'd for seven Generations, honouring one God the Lord of all things, and having always a respect of virtue. But afterwards in process of time, they degenerated from the ancient institutions of their forefathers, neither observing human Laws, nor continuing their accustomed service of God; and they that before industriously exercised themselves in virtue, afterward with twice as zealous study followed wickedness; and grew at last to that height of impiety, that they provoked Gods heavy displeasure against them. For the Angels of God marrying with the Daughters of Seth's descendants, produc'd a race of insolent People, contempters of all good, by reason of the trust they had in their Forces; and for their heinous actions not unlike the Giants which the Greeks mention in their Fables. But Noah perplexed and extremely displeased with such their misdemeanors, exhorted them to change their lives, and amend their misdeeds: and (seeing them moved by no admonitions, but wholly possessed with the pleasure which they took in vices) he fearing lest they should kill him and his Family, left them to their looseness, and with his Wife, Children, and all his Family, departed into another Country. Then God (who lov'd him for his justice) became so provoked with the malice and corruption of the rest of Mankind, that he resolv'd to destroy all Creatures whatsoever in the World, and to produce another new race innocent, and reformed from all impiety: He abridged also the time of their life, so that they lived not any more so long, as they were wont, but only attained the term of sixscore years; and he covered the Land with Waters, by which means all of them were destroyed; only Noah escaped by the means and way which God taught him: He built an Ark of four Stages; in length three hundred Cubits; in breadth fifty: and in height thirty: into this he entred with his Mother, his Wife, and his Children, and their Wives, having provided himself of all things requisite both for their sustenance and use: he clos'd also therein all sorts of living creatures, two and two, male and female, for the conservation of every kind, and of some of them seven Couples. The sides of this Ark were strong, and the cover also; so that no water could pierce the same, and whatsoever storm might come, it was able to resist it. Thus was Noah (by lineal descent, the tenth from Adam) saved with all his household; for he was the Son of Lamech, whose Father was Methusala the Son of Enos, the Son of Jared, the Son of Malalech, who with divers other Brethren were begotten by Cainan, who was the Son of Enos who was the Son of Seth, who was the Son of Adam.

A six hundredth year of Noah's age (and the second Month, which was called Drou by the Madabians; and by the Hebrews Manomane) for so have the Egyptians distinguished the year, but Moses sets down Nisan for the first Month in his Chronology, which is Xanthicus among the Macedonians (for thus in this Month he brought the Spartans out of the thraldom of the Egyptians:) He made this Law therefore, that all things which appertain to Divine Service, should take their beginning and reckoning from this Month; but in respect of Civil Matters, as Fairs and Markets appointed for traffick, he observed the ancient order of the year, beginning in December: Moses writes that the Deluge began the seven and twentieth day of the second Month in the year two thousand two hundred fifty and six; after the Creation of the first Man Adam (which time is carefully calculated in Holy Writ, in which the birth and death of great Personages of that time are most exactly set down.) At such time then as Adam was a hundred years old, his Son Seth was born unto him; and the same Adam lived 930 years. Seth about the age of 250 years, begot Enos; who after he had lived 905 years, left the Government of his affairs to his Son Cainan; whom he had begotten about the 190 year of his age: after that Cainan had lived 910 years, he had his Son Malalech, begotten by him in the 70 year of his age. The said Malalech having lived 194 years died, leaving his Son Jared: who at the age of 162 years, begot Enoch, who lived 962 years: after Enoch, succeeded his Son Methusala, begotten about the age of 162 years: at such time as the said Enoch's Father was yet alive: and after that Enoch had lived 166 years, he was taken up unto God (whence it cometh to pass that his decease hath not been mentioned by any Writer.) Methusala the Son of Enoch, in the year of his age 187, had Lamech for his Son, who lived 782 years, and to whom he left the Sovereignty, having held the same 669 years. And Lamech after he had governed 707 years, declared his Son Noah Governor, at such time as the said Lamech had lived 182; which Noah liv'd the space of 900 years.

All these years calculated into one sum, make the number of 2256; yet to perfect this account, we ought not to seek out the decease of the Personages (for they lived in the same time that their Children and Successors did) but the only thing we are to observe is their Births. Now God having given the sign, and the rain falling for the space of forty days together, the Waters rose and overflowed the whole Earth fourteen Cubits (so that there was no means of flight, or place of refuge for any.) But as soon as the rain was ceased, the water began to decrease by little and little for the space of one hundred and fifty days, till the 27 day of the seventh Month; when Noah perceiving that the Ark was on ground upon the top of a certain Mountain of the Country of Armenia, he opened the Window, and seeing the earth a little discover itself round about he conceived some better hope, and began to comfort himself. Some few days after; when the water was ebb'd somewhat more, he sent out a Raven (desiring to know if the rest of the Earth were delivered from the Waters, and whether without danger he might go out of the Ark. But the Raven finding the Earth still cover'd with Water, returned unto Noah: who the seventh day after sent out a Dove to discover the state of the Earth, which returned bemired, and bearing in its mouth an Olive Branch: whereby Noah perceived that the Earth was freed from the Deluge; and having still waited seven days more, he set at liberty all living Creatures that were in the Ark. But as soon as himself, his Wife, and his Family came forth, he offered sacrifice unto God, and feasted and rejoiced, both he and all his household. The Armenians in their Language have called the place where Noah descended, Apatarion (which signifieth a descent) and in that place, even at this present, the Inhabitants of the Country shew some remains of the Ark. All Historians, even the Barbarians, have made mention of this Deluge, and of the Ark: amongst whom is Berosus the Caldean, who setting down the occurrences of this Deluge, writeth after this manner: Some say likewise that a certain part of this Ark is still seen in Armenia, upon the Mountain of the Cordicans, and that some persons have brought from thence some of the Pitch wherewith it was Caulked, which the Men of that place are wont to use instead of a preservative against Inchantment. Hierom the Egyptian also (who hath written of the Antiquities of the Phœnicians) hath made mention of this matter: as also Masfius, with divers others. Nicholas of Damascus likewise in his Ninety sixth Book speaketh hereof after this manner: Above the Region of the Miceans there is a great Mountain in Armenia called Baris, in which it is reported that divers retired themselves for safety, during the time of the Deluge, and there escaped: and that a certain Man born on an Ark, arrived on the highest top of that Mountain; and that certain pieces of that bottom had been kept there a long while. 'Tis probable this is the Man of whom Moses the Law-giver of the Jews maketh mention. But Noah fearing lest God (having condemned all Men to a general perdition) should every year overflow the Earth after this this manner offered Burnt-sacrifice unto God, beseeching him, that hereafter he would maintain the ancient order, and that no such great calamity might arrive, by which all living Creatures might come in danger to be utterly destroyed and exterminated; but that having inflicted deserved punishment on the wicked, he would spare the Innocent, whom in his mercy he had preserved from the past danger; otherwise they should be more miserable than those that had been buried in the waters, if having beheld with trembling 'so strange a desolation they should not be preserved from the first, but to perish by a second.' He prayed therefore that he would be pleased to accept of his sacrifice, and in his mercy vouchsafe not to conceive hereafter a ruinous hate and displeasure against the earth; to the end that he and his Posterity might enjoy their labours Till it is granted, and building them Cities might possess the same in peace, wanting none of those commodities which they enjoyed before the Deluge: but that they might equal their forefathers in age, and length of life.

Noah having in this sort finished his requests, God (who loved him for the uprightness of his heart) granted him his request, and said he had not been the Author of their deaths who were drowned, but that they themselves by their own wickedness had procured those punishments due upon themselves. For had he desired that they should be extinguished, he would not have brought them into the World. For better it is, not to grant life, than to destroy those to whom it is given. But (said God) through their contempt of my service and graces, they have enforced me to destroy them with the rigor of this vengeance: hereafter I will not so severely pursue and punish their iniquities, in my displeasure, especially for thy sake. And if hereafter at any time I shall send any tempest, fear not (how great and hideous soever the storms be) for there shall be no more Deluge of water upon the earth. In the mean time I command you to keep your hands innocent from murder, and all man-slaughter; and to punish those that commit Wickedness. I leave the use of all other living Creatures to your sufficiency or service; in as much as I have made you Lords over them all, as well those that breathe upon the face of the earth, as those that swim in the waters, and such as inhabit and live in the air; but you shall not eat any blood, in as much as therein consisteth the soul and life of living Creatures. And I declare unto you, that I will forbear to draw the shafts of my displeasure against Men: And I will give you the Rainbow for a sign of the Promise which I make to you.

Noah lived after the Deluge 350 years; and having spent all the rest of his life in happiness, he died after he had lived in the World nine hundred and fifty years. Neither is there cause why any Man (comparing this our present age and the shortness thereof, with the long life of the Antients) should think that false which I have said: neither followeth it, that because our present life extendeth not to such a term and continuance of years, therefore they of the former World attained not the age and long life which we publish of them. For they being beloved of God, and newly created by him, using also a kind of nutriment agreeing with their natures, and proper to prolong their lives, it is no absurd thing to suppose that their lives were of that continuance, considering that God gave them long life, to the end that they should teach virtue, and should conveniently practice those things which they had invented, the Sciences of Astronomy and Geometry; the Demonstrations whereof they never had attained, except they had lived at the least six hundred years. For the great year is accomplished by that number of years: whereof all they bear me witness, who either Greeks or Barbarians, have written ancient Histories. For both Manethon (who hath written the History of Egypt) and Berofus, who registred the acts and affairs of the Chaldeans (together with Moctus, Hestienus, Hierom of Egypt, who writ those of the Phenicians) and others, accord with me in that which I have said. Hesiodus also, Hecataeus, Hellanicus, and Acufilas, Ephorus, and Nicolaus do declare, that they of the first World lived one thousand years. Notwithstanding let every man judge of these things, as best liketh him.

CHAP. IV.

Of the Tower of Babylon, and the change of Tongues.

Noah had three Sons, Sem, Japhet, and Cham, born one hundred years before the Deluge. These first descended from the Mountains into the Plains, and there made their Habitation: which when other Men perceived (who for fear of the Deluge had fled the Plains, and for that cause were loth to forsake the Mountains) they gathered courage, and persuaded themselves to do the like: and the Plain where they dwelt was called Sennar. And whereas they were commanded by God, that (by reason of the increase and multitude of Men) they should send Colonies to inhabit divers Countries of the World (to the end no quarrels might grow betwixt them; but contrari-

A contrariwise in labouring and tilling a great quantity of ground, they might gather great store of fruits) they were to ignorant, that they disobeyed God, and falling into great calamities, suffered the punishment of their offence. Now God seeing their number continually increase, he commanded them again to divide themselves into Colonies. But they (forgetting that the Goods which they possessed, proceeded from him, and his bounty, and presuming that their force was the only cause of their abundance) did not obey him, but rather suspected that God sought to betray them, to the end that being thus divided, he might the more easily destroy them; Nimrod the Grandson of Cham one of Noah's Sons, incited them in this sort to mock and contemn God. He put them in the head that they might not believe that their prosperity proceeded from God, but that they ought to attribute it to their own valor, which furnished them with so much riches: so that in a little space he reduced their estate to a tyranny; supposing by this only means that he might make Men revolt against God, if he might persuade them to submit themselves to his Government; giving them to understand, that if God should once more threaten a Deluge, he would protect them against him, and to that end build a Tower, to whose top the water should not reach, and also revenge the death of their Predecessors. The stupid People gave ear to these persuasions of Nimrod, supposing it to be pusillanimity in themselves, if they should obey God. For which cause they began to build the Tower with their utmost industry; neither was there any one idle in all that work; yea, so great was the number of Labourers, that in a little time the work was raised to a height beyond all expectation. The thicknes of it was so great, that it obscured the height: and it was built of burnt Brick, and cemented and joined with a bituminous mortar, to the end that it might become the stronger.

God seeing their madness, yet condemned them not to a general extermination (by reason that they had made no profit by their example, who perished in the first Deluge) but made them mutiny the one against another by changing of their tongues; so that by reason of their diversity of language, they could not understand one another. The place where this Tower was builded, is at this present called Babylon (by reason of the confusion of tongues that first began in that place) for Babel in Hebrew signifieth confusion. Of this Tower, and the diversity of Languages, Sibylla makes mention in these words: At such a time as men used one kind of Language, they built a most high Tower, as if they meant by the same to mount up to Heaven; but the Gods rais'd Winds, and overthrew the Tower, and sent amongst the Builders distinct and several Languages; whence it came to pass, that the City which was afterwards built in the same place was called Babylon. But as touching the field of Sennar where Babylon stands, Hestienus testifieth after this manner: It is said of those Sacrificers, who escaped from this great disorder, that they took the Sacred Reliques of Jupiter the Conqueror, and came into Sennar of Babylon.

CHAP. V.

How Noah's Posterity disperse themselves thorow the whole World.

From that time forward (by reason of the diversity of tongues) the multitude dispersed themselves into divers Countries, and planted Colonies in all places, and occupied those places whither either God or their good fortune conducted them; so that both the Sea-coasts, and the Middle-land were replenished with Inhabitants. Some there were also, who passing the Sea in Ships and Vessels, first peopled the Islands. And there are some Nations likewise, who at this day retain the names which in times past were imposed on them, some others have changed them. Others are altered into names more familiar and known to the Neighbors, deriving them from the Greeks the Authors of such Titles. For they in latter times having grown to great name and power, appropriated the ancient glory to themselves, in giving Names unto the Nations which they subdued, as if they had taken their original from them.

CHAP. VI.

The Descendants of Noah down to Jacob. The several Countries which they possessed.

NOW they, in honor of whom the Nations receive their first Names, were the children of the sons of Noah. Japhet the son of Noah had seven children, who extended themselves in Asia, from the mountains of Taurus and Amanus, to the River of Taurus, and in Europe unto Gades, occupying the Countries which they first met with, not before inhabited, and calling their several Lands by their own name; Gomar was the founder of the Comarians, whom the Greeks now call Galatians; Magog dwelt amongst those who (according to his name) were called Magogians, and by the Greeks Scythians. Of Midus (the first begotten son of Japhet) issued the Medians, whom the Greeks name Medes; and of Javan his other son, the Ionians, all the race of the Greeks took their original. Thob-

hus gave name likewise to the Theobelians, who at this day are called Iberians. Mefchus was the founder of them that were called Mefchinians, who were since named Cappadocians; for they flew even at this day a token of their ancient name, to wit, the City of Mafaca, which testified that this Nation hath been fo called. Theres gave name to the Therians, who were under his Government, and whom the Greeks called Thracians. All these Nations took their original from the seven sons of Japhet. But of the three sons which Gomar had, Afchanaxes gave name to the Afchanaxians (at this day termed Rheginians by the Greeks;) Riphates gave name to the Riphatinians, called at this day Paphlagonians; Tyrganes to the Tyrganians, who by the Greeks are called Phrygians. All Javan the son of Japhet, had three sons; of whom Alifus gave name to the Alifians, who at this present day are the Aetolians, over whom he commanded. Tharfus gave name to the Tharfians, which was the ancient name of the Cilicians, as appeareth by the name of their Renowned and Metropolitane City Tharfis; Chetim obtained the Isle of Cherine, called at this day Cyprus (whence it is that not only all Islands, but also all places on the Sea-coast are by the Hebrews called Cethim) witness one of the Cities of Cyprus, which hath had the fortune to preserve its ancient name; being called Citium, by those that give Greek names to all things, a word not very much varying from Cethim. These Nations were founded by the sons and young children of Japhet. But I will first publish one thing, which perhaps is unknown to the Greeks, and then prosecute my purposed Narration which I have omitted; that is, that these names have been changed after the manner of the Greeks, to the end their pronunciation might be more easie and agreeable. For we never alter the terminations of words.

But the sons of Cham possessed Syria, and all the Region that butteth on the Mountains of Amnus and Libanus; extending their Empire even as far as the Ocean, and giving names to the same. Which names are partly wholly abolished, and partly fo changed, that they are very hard to be known. There are only the Ethiopians, of whom Chus, one of Cham's four sons, was Prince, that have always preserv'd their name; and not only in that very Country, but also through all Asia they are call'd Chuseans to this day. The Mefreans descended from Mefre, have also preserv'd their name: for we call Egypt Mefre, and the Egyptians Mefreans. Phut likewise establish'd the Colonies of Libya, and called the Inhabitants thereof according to his name, Phutians; and there is a River in the Country of Mauritania, which hath the same name, of which it is manifest that divers Greek Histories make mention, as also of the Country near adjoining, which they call the Country of Phut, but it hath since changed its name by the means of one Libis one of the sons of Misraim (why it is called Africa, I will hereafter signifie unto you.) As touching Canaan the fourth son of Cham, he dwelt in the Country at this day called Judea, and call'd it the Country of Canaan, according to his own name. Chus, who was the eldest son of Cham, had six sons; Sabas, Prince of the Sabeans; Evilas, Prince of the Evilans; at this day called Getulians; Sabathes, Prince of the Sabatheans, whom the Greeks name Alfabarians; Sabactes, Prince of the Sabactians; and Romus, Prince of the Romans; who had also two sons, of whom Juda dwelt in the Country of the Indians, amongst those that are called Hesperians in Ethiopia, and Sabæus founded the Sabeans.

As for Nimrod the sixth son of Chus, he led his Colony upon the Confines of Babylon, and tyrannized there, as is before declared.

All the eight sons of Misraim occupied all the Country from Gaza unto Egypt; but only one of the eight named Philitin, hath left his name to the Country which he possess'd, for the Greeks call a part thereof Palestine. As touching the rest, Lom, Enam and Labin, Nethem, Phetofim, Chestem, Chreefene and Chepthom, we know neither of their Actions, nor of their Names, except Labin, who planted a Colony in Lybia, and gave his Name to it: For the Ethiopians (whereof hereafter we shall make mention) overthrow their Cities.

Canaan also had eleven sons, amongst whom Sidonius built and named Sidon (a City in Phenicia), and Amathus built Amath, which at this day the Inhabitants call Amath, though the Macedonians call it Epiphan (which signifies famous) from the name of one of its Princes; Arudeus possess'd the Islands of Arudus, and Ariceus built the City of Arce, upon mount Libanus. As for the other seven, Evous, Chetens, Jebufens, Euclens, Sineus, Samarus and Gorgelens; there is no memory remaining of them in Sacred Scriptures, but only their Names: For the Hebrews razed their Cities upon the occasions which I am going to relate.

After the Deluge, when the Earth was established in its first estate, Noah gave himself to Tillage, and planted Vineyards; and when the Fruit thereof was ripe (and he had preserv'd and made Wine thereof) he drank and banquetted after he had done sacrifice; being thereby made drunk, and overpres'd with sleep, he lay discovered in a most unbecomingly and shameful fashion; which when Cham his younger son beheld, he scornfully discover'd it to his Brothers; who being ashamed, cover'd their Father's nakedness with Reverence.

A Reverence. Which fact of his coming to the knowledge of Noah, he wished all felicity to the two other; and as touching Cham (out of a fatherly tenderness) he curs'd him not, but only his Posterity after him; who accordingly were punish'd for the sin of their Forefather, as we shall shew hereafter.

Sem the third son of Noah had five sons, who inhabited the Country of Asia, beginning at Baphrates, and extending to the Indian Ocean. For Elmiz the eldest left the Elimeans or Elamites for his Successors, whence proceeded the Persians. Assur the second built the City of Ninive, and gave his Subjects the name of Assyrians (who were rich above all the rest.) Arphaxad the third, named those of his command Arphaxadians, who at this day are called Chaldeans. Aram the fourth, had the Arameans (whom the Greeks call Syrians).

And from Lude the fifth, came the Ludeans, who at this day are called Lydians. Of those four sons which Aram had, Ufes dwelt in the Region of Trachonites, and built the City of Damafcus (situate between Palestine and that part of Syria, which is firnamed Celer or hollow.) Otrus obtained Armenia; Getber, Badrta. Mifas was father to the Mezanians, whose Country is called at this day the valley of Pafin Sale. Arphaxad's son, was Heber's father, from whose name in times past the Hebrews were denominat: Heber begat Jufas and Phaleg, who was so called, for that he was born at fuch time as Lands came to be divided: for Phaleg in Hebrew significth Division. They that follow, were the sons of Jufas: The Original of Elmodad, Salceph, Azeremth, Izrais, Edoram, Usal, Dacl, Ebal, Ebemacl, Sapham, Ophir, Evilua, and Jobel; who occupied some parcel of that Region which was between Copen a River in India, and the hither Syria. Hitherto have we spoken of the Progeny of Sem, now we come to speak of the Hebrews. Phaleg the son of Heber begat Ragaus, by whom was begot Seruch, from whom Nachor descended, and from Nachor Thares, who was Abraham's father, the tenth in account from Noah, and born 292 years after the Deluge. For Thares being 70 years old, begat Abraham. Nachor at 120 years of Age, begat Thares. Nachor was born to Seruch, when he was about the years of 132 of his Life, and Ragaus begat Seruch, when he was 130 years old; and about those years Phaleg begat Ragaus. But Heber at 34 years of age, begat Phaleg (himself begotten by Sela, when he was 135 years old;) which Sela was begotten by Arphaxad, when he was 135 years of age. And Arphaxad was the son of Sem, and Grandson of Noah; whom he begat two years after the Deluge. Abraham had two brothers, Nachor and Aram; of whom Aram left Lot for his son, and Sara and Melcha for his daughters, and afterwards dyed in the land of Canaan in a City called Ur of the Chaldees, where his Sepulchre is to be seen even at this day. His daughters were married, Melcha to Nachor, and Sara to Abraham. But Thares growing weary of Chaldaea after the death of his son Aram, he and his Family transported themselves into Charan a City of Mefopotamia; in which place they buried Thares, when he had lived the space of 250 years. For, about this time the life of man was abridged, and grew more short, until the time of Mofes: when the space of man's Life limited by God himself was 120 years; to which term Mofes attained. Nachor had eight children by Melcha his Wife: Us, Baux, Manuel, Zacham, Aram, Phaleg, Jadelpus and Bathuel (who were the legitimate sons of Nachor.)

But Thares and Gadim, Tharvan and Macham were begotten by him on his Concubine Ruma. To Bathuel one of the legitimate sons of Nachor, was born a daughter named Rebecca, and a son called Laban.

C H A P. VII.

How Abraham, the Author of our Nation, departed from the Land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in the Country of the Canaanites, which is now called Judea.

Abraham having no Issue, adopted Lot the son of Aram's brother, and brother to Sara his Wife: he departed out of the Country of Chaldaea, when he was 75 years old (having had commandment from God to depart thence into Canaan;) in which Country he remained, and left the same to his Posterity after him. He was a man accomplished in all things, full of understanding, and apt to persuade, those that gave ear unto him, with out any default in his foresight and providence. For this cause he was supposed to surpass all men in vertue, and was he that first undertook to rectifie the received erroneous Opinions of men touching the Deity: He first of all did most manifestly preach, and prove, that there was but one God, Governor and Maker of all things; and that otherwise if any thing conferred or furthered our Felicity, it hapned unto us not by our own workings, but by his holy Will. And this he observ'd and prov'd by what comes to pass both in the Earth and the Sea, as also by those things which he saw daily occur by the influences of the Sun, the Moon, and other Stars: namely, that there is a certain power that disposeth them, and decently administ'reth all things; without whose assistance, nothing would be profitable unto us; whereas nothing hath of it self any vertue, but all things are obedient to his Omnipotent Will; and for that cause, honour and thank;

thanksgiving should wholly be ascribed to him. For which advices and counsels of his, H fleeing the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians began to mutiny against him, he thought it expedient to forsake that Country and follow the Will and Command of God, and to went and dwell at Canaan; where being seated, he built an Altar, and sacrific'd unto God. Berolus, amongst other things, maketh mention of our Father Abraham, although he names him not, when he speaketh after this manner: After the Deluge, and during the tenth Generation, there dwelt amongst the Chaldeans, a most just, excellent, and upright man, and exercised in the knowledge of the Celestial Bodies. But Hieronimus makes not a bare mention of him; but hath left a Volume which he hath written concerning him. And as touching Niclaus Damascenus, hear what he saith in the Fourth Book of his Histories:
Abraham reigned in Damascus (where he was a Stranger) whither he arrived with his Army from a Country situate above Babylon, called Chaldaea; and a little while after (departing out of that Region) he went and dwelt with his People in a Country at that time called Canaan, and at this day Judaea, and his Posterity multiplied therein. In another Treasure I will recite that which is reported of him: The name of Abraham even at this day, is honourable in the Country of Damascus, and there is a Village to be seen, which beareth his Name, and is called Abraham's Houle.

C H A P. VIII.

Abraham, pressed by Famine, departed into Egypt; where having stay'd a while, K at last he returned back again.

AFTER this (when Famine had invaded the Land of Canaan) Abraham had Intelligence that the Egyptians abounded in all plenty, and decreed with himself to retire thither: purposing also to confer with their Priests concerning their Notions of God, and either to follow their belief, if they were better grounded in the same than himself, or to rectify them, if his Judgment were better grounded than theirs. He led with him his Wife Sara; and understanding that the Egyptians were much addicted to Women, to the end the King might not put him to death, in order to enjoy his Wife Sara, who was very beautiful, he devised this excuse, to say, That she was his Sister; charging her, that if the matter came in question, he should not fail, but confirm the same. But no sooner came they into Egypt, but the like fortune encountered them, as Abraham had before suffered: for the beauty of his Wife was suddenly published in every place. For which cause, Pharaoh the King of that Nation (desirous to see that with his Eyes, which he had heard with his Ears) he sought for, sent and lusted after her: but God withstood this his unbridled Lust, by afflicting the King's Subjects with a Plague, and his State by Sedition. Whereupon taking council of the Priests, what remedy might be used, and means sought to appease the Divine Majesty; they answer'd him, That the cause of their Afflictions proceeded from his intending violence to the Stranger's Wife: Whereto being much affrighted, the King first questioneth with the Woman, what she was, and who her Companion should be: and at last resolv'd of the truth, he excus'd himself to Abraham, saying, he suppos'd her to be his Sister, and not his Wife; and that his purpose was not to offer Injury, but seek Alliance; and giving him a great sum of Money, he gave him leave to confer with the most excellent and learned Priests among the Egyptians. By this conference he grew into great estimation, in regard of his Vertues: for whereas that Nation was divided into different Sects and Opinions, and through mutual contempt and division, were incens'd one against another, he declar'd, That all their different Opinions in Religion, were most vain, and void of all truth. For these his disputations he was held in great regard among them, and esteem'd for a most wise and excellent personage; not only in well understanding, but also in expressing and persuading that which he undertook to teach. He imparted to them the Sciences of Arithmetic and Astronomy: for before Abraham came into Egypt, the Egyptians were altogether ignorant of those Sciences; but he first brought them from Chaldaea into Egypt, and from thence are they deriv'd to the Greeks.
 As soon as he return'd into Canaan, he divided the Country with Lot: and for that there grew a Contention betwixt their Shepherds (touching the bounds of the Pastures where they fed their Cattel) he gave Lot the choice and election of that Country which best pleased him, retaining unto himself that which was left. Thus pitching his Tents towards a Mountain near the City Hebron (which was by seven years more ancient than Tavis in Egypt) he dwelt there: But Lot chose the Plain near the River of Jordan, not far from Sodomy, which in those days was a goodly City: but at this present, by the just Judgment of God, is utterly destroyed; so that no Memory remaineth thereof. The causes of which Judgment shall be related hereafter.

The overthrow of the Sodomites by the Assyrians. Lot is taken Prisoner.

AT this time the Assyrians were Lords over all Asia; and the estate of Sodom flourished in all affluence, riches and multitude of People, and the Country was governed by five Kings; Ballas, Bareas, Senabarus, Symoborus and Bale (each particularly seized of his Province and Kingdom.) Against these, the Assyrians encamp'd themselves; and having divided their Army into four parts (under the conduct of four Generals) they waged battel with them; in which the Assyrians attaining the day, they imposed a tribute on the Kings of Sodom; who (after they had for twelve years space performed their duty, and payed their tribute) in the thirteenth year revolted from them. Whereupon the Assyrians levied a new Army against them; under the conduct and command of Marphad, Arioch, Chodollogomar and Thargal, who sacked all Syria, and extinguish'd the Posterity of the Gyans. And drawing near to Sodom, they encamp'd near the bituminous Pits (which at that time were in that Valley;) and which after Sodom was destroyed, became a Lake; which (by reason of the bituminous matter that floateth in the same) is called Asphaltites, that is to say, bituminous. Of this Lake hereafter we will speak somewhat. But the Sodomites encountering with the Assyrians, there was a terrible Battel fought, wherein many of the Sodomites perished, and many were made Prisoners; amongst whom was Lot, who came thither to assist them.

C H A P. X.

Abraham pursueth the Assyrians, and returneth victorious.

ABRAHAM hearing of these things, and moved both with the taking of his Cousin Lot, as also with the slaughter of his Friends and Neighbors, presently prepared himself with all his Followers, to succor them: and us'd such diligence in pursuit of the Assyrians, that the fifth night after he encountered them near Dan, which is one of the sources of Jordan: Where surprizing them on the sudden (disorder'd with Wine, and disarmed) he kill'd a great number, put the rest to flight; and pursu'd them in such sort, that the second day after he drove them all into Soba of Damascus; manifesting hereby, that Victory consisteth not in the multitude, but rather in the courage of those that fight; and that a few generous hearts are more worth always than a faint-hearted multitude: for he had not with him above three hundred and eighteen of his household Servants, and three of his Friends, to defend this great Army. The few Assyrians that escap'd out of this slaughter by flight, returned to their Houles with Ignominy.

As soon as Abraham had reluc'd his Nephew Lot, and those other Prisoners of Sodom which were taken by the Assyrians, he returned into his Country, and met in his way with the King of Sodom (in a place called The Kings field) where also he was entertained by the King of Solyma, called Melchisedech (which is as much as to say, The just King;) for in truth he was no less; but was held worthy, by reason of his justice, in all mens opinion, to sacrifice as the Priest of the most high God. Solyma in process of time was called Jerusalem. This Melchisedech friendly entertain'd Abraham and all his Followers, not suffering them to want any thing that was fit for their sustentance; he feasted him at his own Table, highly praised him, and rendred publick thanks to the great God, for that he had vouchsafed to grant him victory. Abraham on the other side presented him with the tenths of his spoils. As for the King of Sodom he remitted all the prey that was taken, and only required to be possess'd of those Captives which were of the Country: which condition Abraham accepted not, answering, That he F would receive no profit for that Prey, but only some Provisions for his Servants and some part of the spoils for his three Friends who had assisted him; the first whereof was called Eshcol; and the two other, Emmerus and Mambres. For this cause God praised Abraham, saying, Thou shalt not want the reward that is due unto thee for thy valiant Acts. To which he answer'd, And what good shall I reap of this recompence, if I have not an Heir to possess it after my decease? (for as yet he had no issue.) Then did God promise him a Son, whose Posterity should be so multiplied, that they might in number equal the Stars of Heaven: which when he understood, he offered sacrifice unto God, according to the Commandment which he had received: He took a Heifer of three years old, a Goat of three years, and a Ram of three years, and a Turtle, and a G Pigeon; all which he divided in twain, as he was commanded, the Birds only excepted.
 But before the Altar was prepared (at such time as the Fowls hovered about to have part of the blood of those Beasts which were sacrific'd) he heard a Voice from Heaven his name Isaac, (which in the Hebrew Tongue signifieth Laughter) because Sara laughed at such time as God said unto her she should bear a Son, having in her self no likelihood of conceiving, by reason she was stricken in years. For at that time she was ninety years old, and Abraham one hundred when the child was born; and on the eighth day after his birth he was Circumcised; which custom is yet continued amongst the Jews, who Circumcise on the eighth day.

C H A P. XII.

Of Ishmael, Abraham's Son; and of the Arabians Posterity.

But the Arabians Circumcise not till the age of thirteen years: because Ishmael their Ancestor, and Abraham's Son by the Concubine, was Circumcised in the thirteenth year after he was born. Of which Ishmael it becometh to speak more exactly in this place. Sara loved Ishmael (begotten on her Servant Agar) from the beginning, with no less affection than if he had been her own Son; so that he was brought up as Abraham's heir. But after she had brought forth Isaac, she thought it no more requisite that Ishmael should be brought up with her Son, because he was elder, and might after his Father's decease, become the Master. She incited Abraham therefore to send both him and his mother to some other place: but at first he gave no ear to Sara's request, thinking it more than barbarous cruelty, to drive away a tender Child and his Mother, destitute of all necessities. At length by the Commandment of God he listened to his Wife's counsel, and committed the Child unto his Mother, (being of himself as yet unapt to travel) and giving them a Pitcher of Water and Bread, he commanded them to go thither, whither their necessity should drive them. And when their Victuals failed them, and their Water was consumed, (he laid the Child, being faint and weak, under an Oak; and to the end that in her presence she should not breathe his last, the went a little way from him. At that time an Angel of God appeared unto her, shewing her a Fountain hard by that place, and charging her to look to the careful education of her Child; because that by the conversation of Ishmael, she was to expect great happiness. Upon these promises she took comfort, and falling into the company of Shepherds; she by their bounty was relieved in her distress.

Afterwards, when Ishmael had attained Mans estate, he Married a Wife of the Nation of the Egyptians, (from whence his Mother had her original) by whom he had twelve Sons: namely, Nabaiath, Cedar, Addeal, Edumas, Massam, Mema, Mafnes, Chodam, Theman, Jerur, Naphes, Calmas, (all which inhabit the Lands which are between Euphrates and the Red-Sea, the name of which Country is Nabathæa.) These are they that began and made famous the Nation of the Arabians as well in respect of their proverbs, as of the dignity of Abraham.

C H A P. XIII.

Of Isaac, Abraham's Legitimate Son.

As touching Isaac, Abraham loved him with an entire and Fatherly affection, as his only begotten Son born in his old age by the goodness of God. The Child also addicting himself unto all virtue, careful to honour his Father and Mother, and studious of the service of God, invited both his Parents rather to affect and love him. So that Abraham was very desirous to forsake this present life, provided that he might leave behind him all the goods which he had, unto his Son; which through the mercy of God he happily effected. Whereupon (under trial and conformity of his faith) God appeared unto him, and reckoned up all the benefits which he had bestowed on him; how he had granted him victory over his enemies, and how he had established and blest him with present felicity by his favour; for which cause he required him to sacrifice, and make an oblation unto him of his Son Isaac; commanding him to conduct him to the Mountain of Mores, and there to sacrifice him. In doing whereof, he should manifest the desire he had to serve him, (in preferring that which was agreeable to God, before the life of his Son.) Abraham supposing that it was no ways lawful to disobey God, but that he ought to submit himself to his will, (as to him by whose Providence all things had their being) said nothing to his Wife, concerning that which God had commanded him, neither how he had determined the death of his Son: neither did he make it known to any of his household-servants, lest they might have diverted him from his resolution. He therefore took his Son Isaac, with two Servants, (loading an Ass with such things as were requisite for sacrifice) and travelled towards the Mountain, his Servants attending him for two days; and on the third day, as soon as he perceived the Mountain, he

A he left the rest of those that accompanied him in the Plain, and attended only by his Son, he ascended up the Mountain (upon which afterwards King David appointed that the Temple should be builded.) They carried with them also the rest of those things which were requisite for sacrifice, (save only the Beast that was to be offered.) About this time, Isaac was five and twenty years old, and did himself prepare the Altar, and enquired of his Father what he should offer, considering that as yet they had no sheep for sacrifice. Abraham answered him that God would furnish them; (being of power sufficient to give Men that in abundance, whereof they have need, and to deprive them of that they have, and whereof they held themselves possessed) if he were well pleased with their sacrifice: Now as soon as the Altar was made ready, and the Wood prepared and laid upon the same, and all things in readiness) he addressed his speech unto his Son, in this manner. My Son, I beg'd thee of God with very earnest Prayers; and ever since thou wert born into the world, I have intermitted no care and diligence in thine education; neither have I thought that any thing could make me more happy, than at departing out of this World, to see thee at mans estate, and to leave thee the Heir and Lord of all my substance. But since it hath pleased God, that I should be thy Father, and that the same God likewise now thinketh good that I should destroy thee, generously submit, and be contented to be sacrificed to him: For in so doing I fulfil the Commandments of God, who requireth at our hands that we do him this honour, for the favours which he hath bestowed upon us in assisting us, both in War and Peace. Since therefore being born, thou art to die, I deem it reasonable, that in regard it seemeth good unto God that thou depart out of this life, (not by sickness, nor by War, nor by any other inconvenience, that naturally bapeth unto Men) but by being offered in sacrifice to him by thine own Father, that thou render thy Soul unto him in the midst of Prayers, and the celebration of this sacrifice, to the end he may receive and seat thee near himself: Thou shalt then be the comfort of mine old age, (which is the cause for which I have nourished thee) if thou procure for me assistance of God instead of that which I ought to receive from thee. Here Isaac with a noble heart (like the gracious Son of God) godly a Father) heard all which his Father said with great contentment, and answered, That he would rather never have been born, than once disobey the Ordinance of God, and of his Father; or shew himself overjealous to submit his will to both their pleasures, considering that if his Father only should command the same, he should do very ill if he disobeyed him: which said, he leapt unto the Altar, and offered himself to the slaughter. Which had surely hapned at that instant, if God had not hindered it; for with a loud voice he called Abraham by his name, commanding him not to kill his Son, and telling him that he had not given him that commandment, because he took pleasure in humane blood, neither for that by such impiety he would deprive him of that Son, of whom it was his pleasure to make him the Father; but that by this act he intended to prove his affection, to see whether being commanded such a thing, he would be obedient; and for that he had made trial of his faith and readiness, and his disinterested piety, he did not repent him of that good he had done unto him; that he would never forget to have care of him, and his race, whenever he should pray unto him; and that when the course of his years were happily ended, he should leave a great dominion to those of his Children which should be good and virtuous. He told him moreover, that he would multiply his race in divers Nations, and that he would bestow great benefits upon them, and that the memory of the chief of his off-spring should be envied of all Men for their greatness. When God had spoken after this manner, it pleased him on the sudden (no Man knoweth how) to cause a Ram to appear thereabouts for a sacrifice. And thus (being delivered from all evils and inconveniences beyond their expectations, after they had heard so many promises of so many blessings) they embraced one another, and celebrated the sacrifice; which done, they returned towards Sara in safety, and paid the remainder of their lives in happiness, God giving them his blessing in whatsoever they undertook.

Not long after, Sara died; after she lived one hundred twenty and seven years; and was buried in Hebron; (where the Canaanites freely offered a place for Burial) yet Abraham chose rather to buy a place to bury in, of one Ephrem a Citizen of Hebron, for four hundred sicles; and there the Monuments both of himself and his posterity are built.

Sus, who likewise had Sons; Sis had Sabacan, and Dadames. Of Dadanes issued Latus, Him, Asurus, Luures. The Children of Madin were Epha, Ophres, Anochus, Ebidas, Eldus. All these Children and their successors, according to Abraham's advice, gathered and established the Colonies which possessed the Country of the Trogodytes, and all the Country of Arabia the Happy, whose confines extend even unto the Red Sea. Some report that this Ophres conducted an Army into Libya, and possessed the same; and that his successors (making their abode in that Country) called it by the name of Africa. Which opinion is confirmed by Alexander Polybius; who writeth after this manner. Cleodemus the Prophet, who is also called Malchus, and writeth the History of the Jews (after the example of Moses their Law-giver) saith, that of Chetura there were divers Children born unto Abraham, and he nameth them by their names: to wit, Apher, Surim and Japher, and that of Surim the Syrians took their name: of the two others, Apher, and Japher, the City of Asra, and the Country of Africa took their names. That they Warred under the conduct of Hercules in Libya against Antaeus; and how Hercules having taken Ophra his Daughter to his Wife, begot of her Dedor, who was Father to Sophon, from whom those Barbarians that are called Sophaces have taken their name.

Now Abraham thinking fit to provide a Wife for Isaac his Son, who was almost forty years old, sent the eldest Servant of his Family to demand in Marriage, Rebecca the Daughter of Barthuel, who was the Son of Nachor his Brother, for Isaac, and bound him to the performance thereof with an Oath (by causing him to lay his hand under his thigh.) He sent also rare presents unto them, such as were seldom seen in those parts: The Servant departing, was long upon the way (because that in Winter-time it is troublesome to travel through Mesopotamia, by reason of the deep Bogs, and in Summer for want of Water) besides the Robberies of the Country, which Strangers and Travellers can hardly escape, except they stand upon their Guard, and have Convoy. At length he arrived at a City called Carras; and being in the Suburbs of the same, he beheld divers young Maidens that went to fetch Water; at which sight he pray'd to God, that if the Marriage were pleasing in his sight, he might find Rebecca amongst them, for whose cause Abraham had sent him thither to require her in Marriage for his Son: and that he might know her by this sign, that asking all the rest for Water, they should refuse him, and the only satisfy him. With these thoughts he approached the Well, and desired those Virgins to give him to drink; which they denied, saying, that they could not get Water but with great labour, which they must bear unto their Houses, and not lawfully bestow on others: whereupon one amongst them reproving the rest for that discourtesie which they used towards the stranger; saying, that they had never been conversant amongst Men, that refused to give him Water that requested it; she gave him Drink with great kindness. This made him conceive a good hope of all his business yet being further desirous to know the event of the matter, he praised the courtesie of Rebecca, who had not refused to travel in her own person to satisfy his necessity; asking her of what Parents she was, terming them happy, that had such a Daughter; praying God, that it might please him to grant them the good hap to marry her to their contentment, and match her with a Man of honest reputation, by whom the might be fruitful of good and virtuous Children. Rebecca made no difficulty to tell him the names of her Parents (the better to gratifie him) neither concealed the her own, but answered in this sort. I am called, said she, Rebecca, my Father was named Barthuel, and is long since dead. Laban is my Brother, who, together with my Mother, hath care of all our Family. Which when he understood, he rejoiced at all that had hapned unto him, and was comforted with those things which he heard, perceiving manifestly how God had prospered his journey. Whereupon drawing out a jewel (with certain other ornaments, such as Virgins take delight to wear) he offered them unto the Maid, telling her that he gave her these presents, in requital of the kindness he had offered him in satisfying his thirst, for that the amongst so many other Virgins had only shewed her self affable and gracious; desiring also that he might be entertained in her Brothers house, by reason that Night deprived him of the means of travelling any further, and that he was charged with certain jewels of great price, which in no place (as he said) might be in more safety than in their custody, whom in effect he had found to courteous and honest; assuring her, that the virtue which appeared in her, gave him sufficient testimony both of the courtesie of her Mother and Brother, who would not (as he supposed) take it in ill part if he were entertained; and lastly, that he would in no ways be chargeable unto them, but would pay for his lodging and expences.

To this Rebecca answered, that he had reason to conceive a good opinion of her Parents humanity, but yet he did in some sort prejudice them in suspecting their liberality,

A, assuring him that his entertainment should in no sort be Mercenary, but voluntary and free, and according to their affection. Yet first (said she) I will certify my Brother Laban hereof, and afterwards conduct you to our house: which done, she led him into their Tent, commanding her Brother Laban's Servants to take care of his Camels; and for himself, he was entertained at her Brother Laban's Table.

When Supper was past, he spake both to the Brother and Mother of the Virgin after this manner: Abraham the Son of Thares is your Cousin; For (said he, addressing to the Mother) Nachor the Grand-father of your Children, was Abraham's Brother, by one and the same Father and Mother. He now sendeth me unto you, desiring you to give this Virgin for Wife to his only Son and Heir of all his substance: whom although he might have matcht with the richest of his Country, yet hath he refused all of them, desiring rather to render this respect to those of his kindred and Nation: let not light therefore by his good affection and desire. For, besides all other blessings and good fortunes which have happily befallen me in this my journey, I have, by Gods especial Providence; found out both the Maid and your house. For, at such time as I drew near the City, and beheld many Virgins going to fetch Water, I behought God that I might light upon this Maiden, and he vouchsafed me my desire: ratifie therefore on your part this Marriage favoured by Gods Providence; and honour Abraham in granting your consent to this your Daughters Marriage, which I am sent to request at your hands, with most entire affection. Now they, in that they both allowed a thing so advantageous, and perceived also that it was conformable to the will of God, sent their Sister unto him under the conditions demanded: and Isaac Married her, being already in possession of all his Fathers goods, by reason that the other Sons of Abraham were already departed to establish their Colonies in other Provinces.

CHAP. XVI.

Of Abraham's Death, Gen. 24, 7, 8.

A Few days after Isaac's Marriage Abraham deceased, a Man full of vertue to his last end, and honoured by God (according to that entire love he hath to vertue) with great affection. All the days of his life amounted to one hundred (seventy and five) years; and he was buried in Hebron near his Wife Sara, by his Sons Isaac and Ishmael.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Isaac's Sons, Esau and Jacob; and of their Nativitie and Education, Gen. 25.

AFTER the death of Abraham, Rebecca (Isaac's Wife) became big with Child, in an extraordinary manner; and the time of her reckoning being near at hand, Isaac was sore troubled, and sought counsel at Gods hands: who answered him, that Rebecca should bring forth Twins, and that of those two Sons, two Nations should be derived, both which should be called by their names; and that he who seemed to be the least of them, should grow to be the greatest: not long after (according as God had foretold him) she was brought to Bed of two Twins, the eldest of which was very hairy all over his body; and as he came out of his Mothers Womb, his younger Brother held him by the Heel; the Father loved the elder, who was called Esau and Seir, by reason of his Hair (which the Hebrews call Seir in their Language) but the younger who was called Jacob, was dearly loved by his Mother.

Now it hapned that a great Famine reigned in the Land of Canaan, Isaac resolved to retire himself to Egypt, by reason of the plenty of that Country, but he went and dwelt at Sierar, according as God had commanded: In which place King Abimelech received and entertained him (according to the Law of Hospitality, and the League of Friendship, which was betwixt Abraham his Father and him.) At first therefore he shewed him great signs of Friendship, but afterwards, the envy he had conceived, hindered him from persisting in the same; for perceiving that God was favourable unto Isaac, and had an especial care over him, he drove him out of his Country. He retired not far from Gerar to a place called Pharan, that is to say, The Valley, and as he there dig'd to find out Springs of Water, Abimelech's Shepherds came and set upon him, and hindered him in such sort as he could not finish his purpose; and for that he purposely retired from them, they supposed they had gotten the Victory. Shortly after, when he began to dig in another place, other Shepherds of Abimelech outraged him again as at the first; for which cause he left this Fountain imperfect also, expecting a more convenient opportunity, which was afterwards offered him by reason that the King gave him leave to dig; whereupon he opened a Fountain, and called it

Rebobot;

Roonoth, which signifieth large. As for the other two, he called the first of them Eſcon, which is to ſay ſtrife: and the other Sienna, which ſignifieth Hofility.

Thus increaſed he daily more and more both in power and riches. But Abimelech ſuppoſing that his affluence would be many ways hurtful unto him, and remembering that he had not faithfully entertained Friendſhip with him, but in ſome fort given occaſion of ſuſpition, by means of ſome heard meaſure; fearing leaſt hereafter the injuries freſh in memory, ſhould more diſtract him than their old and ancient plighted Friendſhip, and miſdoubling his revenge, he repaired unto him, and contracted a new League of amity with him, having with him one of his chiefſt Captains, as an Arbitrer between them, by whole means he obtained whatſoever he required: ſo courteous was Iſaac, and ſo ready in memory of his Fathers old Covenant to forgive new injuries. So Abimelech having obtained his purpoſe, returned to his houſe. Eſau one of the two Sons of Iſaac, having attained the age of forty years, took two Wives, Ada the Daughter of Edom, and Alibama the Daughter of Eſebion, two Princes of the Canaanites, (and that of his own authority, without his Father's advice or privy, who would not have conſented, had the matter been remitted unto him, becauſe he held it inconvenient to mix and joyn him, or his, in affinity with any dwellers or inhabitants of the Country.) This notwithstanding, he would not diſpleaſe his Son by commanding him to put away his Wives, but determined with himſelf to conceal and keep the matter ſilent.

When Iſaac was grown old and wholly deprived of his ſight, he called Eſau his Son, and told him that though through his blindneſs he could not ſee the day-light, nor ſerve God ſo exactly as he had wont to do, yet he would give him his bleſſing before he died; and therefore he willed him to go a Hunting, and to make ready what he ſhould catch for him that he might eat; and that after his repaſt, he would pray to God that it would pleaſe him to be aſſiſtant unto him all his life-time, and be a comforter and aid unto him. Since he could not better employ the little time that he had to live, than in imploring the favour of God for him. Hereupon Eſau went a Hunting; but Rebecca in the mean time (deſirous that Iſaac's Bleſſing ſhould light upon her Son Jacob) contrary to her Husbands intent and mind, commanded him to go and kill a Kid, and prepare a repaſt for his Father. Jacob being obſequious and obedient to his Mother in all things, obey'd her command, and as ſoon as the meat was ready, he wrapped his arms L and covered his hands with the Goats Skins, hoping by the Hairineſs thereof, to make his Father believe that he was Eſau. For being his Twin-Brother, he reſembled him in all things, except in this thing only; wherefore fearing left he ſhould be ſurprized in his ſubtily, before his Father Iſaac had finiſhed his prayers, and inſtead of his bleſſings he might be loaden with his Curſes, in this drefs he preſented the Meat unto his Father. But Iſaac perceiving ſome difference in his voice, from that of his Brother, called his Son, who ſtretching out his hands unto him covered with the Kids Skins, Thou art (ſaith he) more like unto Jacob in thy voice, but by thy Hairineſs, thou ſemeſt unto me to be Eſau. Thus ſuſpecting no deceit, and having already eaten, he addreſſed himſelf to pray, and called upon God, ſaying, O Eternal Lord, maker of all Creatures, thou haſt promiſed great Bleſſings unto my Father, and haſt given me many preſent felicities, and haſt vowed that thou wouldſt be merciful unto my Poſterity, and plentifully pour upon them more and more ample benefites; let this thy favour, I beſeech thee, be continued towards me, neither diſpitiſt thou me by reaſon of this my preſent weakneſs, which is the cauſe that I have more need of thy help. Save and keep this my Son by thy clemency, preſerve him from all evil, give him a happy life, and poſſeſſion of all bleſſings and benefites which are in thy power to beſtow upon him: make him terrible to his Enemies, and gracious to his Friends. Thus prayed he unto God, thinking he had bleſſed Eſau. Scarce had he finiſhed his Prayers, but Eſau returned from Hunting, which though Iſaac perceived, he was no ways moved with diſpleaſure, but held himſelf ſilent. Eſau belought him that he might obtain as much as he had vowed to his Brother: but Iſaac denied him, in that he had beſtowed all his Bleſſings upon Jacob: for which cauſe Eſau lamented and wept. His Father (moved by his tears) foretold him that he ſhould excel in Hunting, in force of Body, in Arms, and other ſuch exerciſes, whereby he ſhould purchaſe immortal Glory, both to himſelf and his poſterity; yet notwithstanding that he ſhould be his Brothers Vaſſal. Now for that Jacob feareſt left his Brother ſhould ſeek to be revenged of him for robbing him of his Father's Bleſſing, he was by his Mothers means delivered from this danger. For the perſwaded her Husband to ſend Jacob to take a Wife near Allied unto her, out of Mefopotamia. Eſau at that time Married another Wife called Baſſemath, the Daughter of Iſhmael; knowing that Iſaac was not well pleaſed with his former alliance with the Canaanites; for which cauſe to give him contentment he married Baſſemath, whom afterward he loved more entirely than any of his other Wives.

But Jacob being ſent into Mefopotamia by his Mother, in order to Marry the Daughter of Laban her Brother, (whereunto Iſaac conſented through the counſel of his Wife) paſſed through the Country of Canaan. And for that there was a declared and open enmity betwixt Iſaac's People, and the inhabitants of Canaan, he would not take up his lodging amongst them, but lay abroad in the fields, reſting his head upon ſtones, which he had heaped together inſtead of a Pillow: and during the time of his reſt, this Viſion B was preſented unto him. It ſeemed unto him that he ſaw a Ladder, that reached from the Earth, up into Heaven, on the ſteps whereof there deſcended certain perſons more excellent to look on, than the ordinary part of humane kind, and on the top thereof God manifeſtly appeared, and calling him by his name, ſpoke unto him after this manner: Jacob, Thou art the Son of a good Father, and deſcended from a Grand-father renowned and famous for his great virtue; thou muſt not therefore be daunted, or dismayed by thy preſent travels, but rather be encourag'd with the hope of a future happineſs. For by mine aſſiſtance thou ſhalt be bleſſed, and endowed with many benefites: For I am he that brought Abraham hither, from the Country of Mefopotamia, at ſuch time as he was driven away from thence: I have alſo made thy Father happy, and will C be no leſs gracious and favourable unto thy ſelf. Be courageous therefore, and proſecute thy journey under mine aſſiſtance: The Marriage which thou purſueſt ſhall have a happy iſſue, and thou ſhalt have good Children, who in number ſhall grow infinite, and ſhall likewiſe leave after them a plentiful and famous poſterity; and I will give them the Sovereignty over this Country, both to them and their Succeſſors, and they ſhall people and replenish both the Earth and the Sea, as far as the Sun enlighteneth the World. Let not therefore any danger diſmay thee, nor travel diſcomfort thee: for beſides all this, whatſoever thou ſhalt undertake, I will not ceaſe to aſſiſt thee in it. Theſe things did God foretel unto Jacob, who greatly rejoicing at that which he had ſeen, and that which had been declared to him, anointed the Stones on which he had reſted his head, D and willed the promiſes of ſo many bleſſings were made to him, and vowed to offer ſacrifice to God on the ſame, if he return'd happy and ſafe into his Country: which as he returned, he accordingly performed, offering unto God the tenth of all his goods. And as for the place where the Viſion appeared unto him, he called it by the name of Bethel, which in the Hebrew Tongue ſignifieth, the houſe of God. Continuing then his journey into Mefopotamia, he traveled ſo long, till at laſt he arrived at Charran: and having met in the Suburbs of the City with certain ſhepherds and young Men, accompanied with young Maidens, ſitting near to a certain Fountain, he drew near unto them, deſiring them to give him drink; and falling in diſcourſe with them, he asked them, Whether they knew one that was called Laban, and whether he were yet alive? All of them answered, E that they knew him well; and that he was a Man of that reputation, that his name could not be concealed; that his Daughter was accuſtomed to feed her flock with them, and that they wondered that ſhe was not yet arrived; of whom (ſaid they) thou mayeſt perfectly underſtand all that thou deſireſt to know. Whileſt thus they ſpake the time in talk, the Maiden drew near, accompanied with her ſhepherds; whom one of the company informed, that Jacob was inquiſitive after her Father: who rejoicing after the manner of young Maidens, asked him what he was, and whence he came, and what affair had brought him thither, wiſhing he had the means to ſupply whatſoever his neceſſities required. Jacob being mov'd, not ſo much by the courteous and Kindred, as by her beauty, which was very extraordinary, ſaid unto her: If thou art the Daughter of Laban, F there is a greater and more ancient conjunction betwixt us than either thine or my birth: for, Abraham, Aran, and Nachor, were Thares Sons; Bathuel, thy Grand-father, was Nachors Son; Iſaac, my Father, was the Son of Abraham; and Sara, the Daughter of Aran. There is yet a nearer and dearer relation between us: for Rebecca, my Mother, is Siſter unto Laban thy Father, born of one Father and Mother; ſo that we are Couſins; and therefore am I come at this preſent to ſalute you, and renew that ancient love which our alliance requirith at our hands. But the remembering all thoſe things which her Father was wont to report and diſcourſe of Rebecca, and knowing that her Parents were deſirous to hear ſome news from her, wept for joy, and embracing the young Man, ſaid unto him: Thou bringeſt a moſt deſired and great pleaſure to my Father and all his family, who never forgets thy Mother, but oftentimes makes mention of her; and would eſteem it a great felicity to hear tidings from her. Then ſhe deſired him to follow her to her Father, left any longer he might be deprived of ſo deſired a pleaſure.

This said, he brought him to Laban; where, being acknowledged by his Uncle, he both by that means lived securely amongst his Friends, and brought him great contentment, by his unexpected access unto them. Some days after, Laban told him, that he took too much contentment in his presence, that he could not express it in words; and desired him to manifest the cause that had induced him to leave his Father and Mother in their old age, when they had most need of him; and he promised him all assistance and favour in whatsoever case he had to make use of him. Whereupon Jacob discoursed unto him the whole matter; that Isaac had two Sons, Esau and himself: that his Brother (because by his Mothers contrivance, he had defrauded him of his Fathers Blessing) fought to kill him, as the ravisher of that Principality from him that was destined unto him by God, and the interpreter of his Fathers other intentions; that this, with his Mothers command, was the cause why he came thither; as to his nearest relation by the Mothers side; adding, that next after God, he hoped to find his greatest assistance and help in him, his Uncle. Whereupon Laban promising to him whatsoever humanity he could desire (as well in respect of their common Ancestors, as for the love he bare unto his Mother; towards whom, although she were absent, he would express his good affection, in shewing himself well affected towards him that was there present;) he told him then, that he would give him the charge of his flock, and make him Master over all his Shepherds; and that when he thought good to return back again to his Friends, he should depart with such rewards and honours as might well become a Friend so nearly allied unto him. Which when Jacob understood, he answered, That he would willingly endure any sort of labour in Laban's service, and that his devoir towards him would be a delight to himself: but that in lieu of his labours, he required Rachel to Wife: who deserved his esteem for her virtue, and particularly for her goodness wherewith she had brought him thither: declaring, that the love which he bare unto her, was the cause why he used those speeches. Laban (being greatly delighted and contented with this his Discourse) granted him his consent to the Marriage, telling him, that he could not have wish for a better Son-in-Law: but with condition that he should sojourn a while with him, for that he was no ways minded to send his Daughter among the Canaanites; and that it repented him, that, by reason of Marriage, his Sister had been carried into so far a Country. Jacob accepted the condition, and Covenanted to abide with him for seven years, saying, that he was glad to have found an occasion of making it appear to him by his care and good service, that he was not unworthy of his alliance. When the time which was Covenanted between them was expired, and Jacob expected the contented possession of his love, as was promised him, Laban prepared a Nuptial Feast: and when night drew on, and Jacob least suspected, he brought his Daughter Leah to him in face, and elder in years, and laid her in his Bed. Jacob deceived by the darkness, and for that he had drunk liberally, lay with her: but the day after discovering the deceit, he complained hereof to Laban, who asked him pardon, alledging that he had not brought in Leah with intent to deceive him, but that the custom of the Country (which forbids to Marry the younger before the elder) compelled him thereto: yet that the same should no ways hinder, but that he should Marry Rachel too, on condition to serve him yet seven years more. Herewith Jacob was pacified, and suffered himself to be persuaded (out of the love which he bore to Rachel;) and when the other seven years were expired, he Married Rachel. Now these Sisters had two Maid-Servants which their Father had given them: Leah's Maid was called Zelpha, and Rachel's, Bala; they were no Slaves, but only Subjects. Leah liv'd in great grief, to see that Jacob bore greater affection to her Sister, than to her self, bethinking her oftentimes, that if she could have Children, she should be better esteemed and loved by her husband, for which cause she continually besought Almighty God, that it would please him to give her issue: whereupon it happened that God gave her a Son, and Jacob's affection was turned towards her; for which cause she called him Ruben, that is to say, the Son of Vision, because she had obtained him through the mercy of God.

After him she bare three other Children; Simeon (whose name signifieth, that God had heard her) Levi (which is as much as to say the firmness of society) and last of all Juda (which signifieth Thanksgiving.) At that time Rachel fearing lest she should lose part of her Husbands love, by reason of the fruitfulness of her Sister; caused her Maid Bala to lie with him; by whom he had a Son called Dan (that is to say, the judgment of God;) and after him Neptulim (which signifieth ingenious;) by reason that she used subtilty to require her Sisters fruitfulness. Leah hereupon us'd the same artifice, and gave her Maid Zelpha to Jacob, of whom he begat Gad (which signifieth come by chance;) and after him Asur (that is to say, beneficent) because that Leah was more honoured for the multitude of her Progeny.

Ruben

A Ruben, the eldest of all the Sons of Lea, brought his Mother Apples of Mandrake, which when Rachel perceived, she desired her to give her part thereof, for that she longed to taste of the same: whereunto Lea would yield no consent, replying, That she ought to content her self in that she had the advantage in Jacob's love. Rachel to mollify the heart of her sister told her, That she would be content that Jacob should lie with her that night; which Jacob accordingly did, and Lea once more had Children, namely Isackar (which signifieth Come by hire) and Zabulon (which importeth a pledge of good will) besides whom, she had a daughter also called Dinah. Not long after this Rachel lay with Jacob, and brought forth a Son, who was called Joseph (which signifieth an addition.) During all this time (which was for the space of twenty years) Jacob had the Government of his Father-in-laws flocks: but afterwards he thought good (accompanied with his Wives) to return to his own Inheritance: which when his Father-in-law perceived, he would in no sort give his consent thereto; for which cause, he covertly determined to forsake him. To this intent he made trial of his Wives, to see how they were affected towards his flight; who heartened him by their contents: inasmuch that Rachel having stolen the Images of those Gods which were honored in that Country, fled away with her Sister, and the two Maids, and all their Children, with the rest of all their substance. Jacob also drove away the moiety of the Cattle, without the knowledge of Laban. Rachel also bare with her the Images of the Gods, although she had been taught by Jacob to condemn them, and yield them no honor: but she supposed, that if Laban pursued and overtook them, by restoring them, she might obtain his pardon. But Laban a day after the departure of Jacob and his Wives, had notice thereof, and being therewith much troubled, he pursued after them, intending to assault them by force, and on the seventh day he overtook them upon a certain Hill where they sat down to take their rest, in that it was Evening: but God appearing to him in a Dream, commanded him to use no violence, neither towards his Son-in-law, nor his Daughters; but rather to listen to a peaceable accord betwixt himself and Jacob: assuring him that if in contempt of Jacob's weakness he should lift up his arm to assail him, that he himself would join with Jacob to protect him.

The next day, Laban having received this command from God, called Jacob unto him to the end to confer together (and to tell him what the night before he had beheld in his dream.) As soon as Jacob was come to him, he began to accuse him; alledging, that he had received him into his house, at such time as he came unto him being poor and naked of all means, and had given him great abundance of Goods. I have (saith he) given thee my Daughters in marriage, hoping by that means to increase thy love towards me more and more; but thou hast had neither respect of thy Mother, neither of the acquaintance or parentage betwixt thee and me, neither of the Wives which thou hast married, nor of thy Children, whose Grand-Father I am; but hast dealt with me after an injurious and hostile manner, driving away that which appertained unto me, seducing my Daughters to abandon him that begat them, and carrying away my household gods with them, which both I and my Predecessors have served and honoured: and what none, but men of War, would have done unto their Enemies, that hast thou done unto me: yea, thou that art my Kinsman, my Sisters Son, the Husband of my Daughters, my pledge, and my familiar Servant, hast dealt thus with me. On the other side, Jacob alledged for himself, that God had not only made impression in his heart, but that all men also are possit with the love of their Country; and that after so long space of time, it seemed good unto him to visit his native soil. And concerning that crime (saith he) which thou objectest against me, touching the prey, if any other but thy self be judge, thou shalt be convicted to have dealt unjustly with me; for whereas thou oughtest to have rewarded me, for the maintenance and increase I have made of thy Goods, hast thou not done us great wrong to envie us a little part and portion thereof? And for thy Daughters; know this, that they have not followed me as persons conveyed away by subtilty, but under that love and duty which married Wives bare unto their Husbands: they do not therefore only follow me, but they come after their Children. These things alledged he for himself. Further he replied, and accused Laban, because that being his Mothers Brother, and having given him his Daughters, to Wife, he had notwithstanding bitterly vext him by his severe commandments to which he had been obedient during the space of twenty years; that the toyls he had endured in order to his Marriage with Rachel had been grievous unto him; notwithstanding that it was but a trifle in respect of that which he suffered afterwards; which had he born him an envious affection or hostile hatred, he could very well have elaped. In truth, Laban had dealt most unjustly with Jacob. For seeing that God assisted him in all that he enteredprized, Laban promised to give him all the Cattel that were born white, and sometime that that which was brought forth black: but when that which Jacob had named and chosen did increase, then did not Laban perform his promise unto him, but turned him over to the next years increase, by reason he had always a respect of the greater flock, and promised that which he hoped would not come to pass; and which if it fell contrary, he was ready to infringe. And as touching the Gods, he told him he might make search for them.

This condition did Laban accept: but Rachel understanding the same, thrust the Gods into a Sack, and made them to be carried on a Camels back, and she sate upon them, saying, that she was indisposed, by reason that at that time she had her natural purgations. And for this cause Laban desisted from searching any further, supposing his Daughter being so affected would not conceal or set her self to near things that were so sacred; and he made a covenant with Jacob, that neither of them should call to remembrance the unkindnesses that had past betwixt them, but that he should cherish his Daughters; all which they bound with an Oath. This covenant was made upon a certain mountain, where they reared a Pillar in the form of an Altar: whence it came to pass that this Pillar was called Galaad, that is to say, the hill of witness, from whence the Country of Galaad bears that name even until this day: and after that the alliance was made, and that they had banqueted together, Laban returned back again into his own Country.

But as Jacob travelled towards the Country of Canaan, he had several visions, which prefigured unto him good hope of happiness to come; and he called the place where this thing hapned, The field of God. And being desirous to know how his Brother Esau was affected towards him, he sent messengers before him to bring him the exact truth thereof, by reason he stood in fear lest the memory of his old discontent should be renewed: charging his messengers to signify unto Esau, that Jacob deeming it a thing inconvenient to live with his Brother, who was displeased with him, had of his own free Will forsaken the Country, and that at this present he was upon his return, conceiving that length of time might have extinguish'd his displeasure. He therefore led with him his Wives and Children, with all those riches which God had given him; offering himself unto Esau, with all which he had of most esteem, by reason that he thought it the greatest benefit that might happen to him to impart unto his Brother a part of those commodities which he had received at Gods hands. All which they signified unto Esau, who rejoiced very much thereat, and went forth to meet his Brother, accompanied with four hundred armed Men. But Jacob hearing that he marched forward to meet him, attended by so many Men at Arms, was very much afraid: yet fixing his confidence in God, he provided for the time, lest any detriment should happen unto him, studying every way to defend both him, and his, from invasion. To which end dividing his Troops, he caused some to march before, and the rest to follow closely after: so that if any did assault the first, they might retire themselves to the Troop that followed.

After this manner having ordered all things about him, He sent certain Servants with presents to his Brother, namely, with Beasts of charge, and a great number of divers kinds of four-footed Beasts (which for their rareness might give more content and admiration to those to whom they were presented.) All these marched one after another, to the intent, that being beheld thus in ranks, they might seem to be a greater number than they were: to the end, that if as yet there remained any discontent in the heart of Esau, these presents might serve to mitigate the same. He commanded them also that marched foremost, that they should use courteous salutation towards Esau. Having thus all the day disposed his Troops, as soon as the night was come, he caused all his companies to march, who passed the River of Jaboch: but Jacob, who was left hindmost, had a vision, in which he wrestled with an Angel, and he became victor.

Now the Angel spake unto him, exhorting him to rejoice at that which had hapned unto him, assuring him that he had not achieved an easie matter, but that he had surmounted an Angel of God, which was a sign of great good which would befall him, and that his Posterity should be invincible, and that no man whatsoever, should overcome him: commanding him to call his name Israel, that is to say, according to the Hebrews, a restor of an Angel. These things were foretold unto Jacob upon his request; who perceiving also that he was an Angel of God, prayed him to inform him of that which should happen unto him: which the vision did, and afterwards vanished. Jacob took great pleasure thereat, and called the place Phanuel, that is to say, the face of God: and for that in wrestling he had hurt a part of his thigh, he afterwards abstained from eating of the same, and by reason thereof our Nation do never eat that part.

Now when he had intelligence that his Brother approached, he commanded his Wives to march forward severally with their hand-Maids, to the end that they might from

A from afar behold the Fight, in case his Brother should assail them. As for himself, when he perceiv'd his Brother drew near him in the Spirit of peace, without intent of circumvention, he cast himself at his feet, and Esau saluted him, and enquired of him touching the companies of Women and Children; and after he understood all things, he offer'd to lead them to his Father. But Jacob executed himself, by reason of the weariness of his Cattel, and Esau retired to Seir, where he made his abode, and had imposed that name on that Country, by reason of his thick hair. Jacob also retired himself to a place which at this day is called the Tents; and from thence into Sichem, a City of the Canaanites.

Now at such time as the Sichemites celebrated their Feast, Dina, which was Jacob's only Daughter, went into the City to see the bravery of the Women of that Country. But Sichem the Son of King Emmor was so taken with her beauty, that he defouled her; and being passionately in love, he desir'd his Father that he might have her to Wife; who listening therunto, went himself unto Jacob, praying him to give Dina his Daughter, in lawful Marriage, to his Son Sichem. Jacob not daring to refuse him, by reason of his Authority and Quality; and on the other side, not thinking it to be either a thing lawful, or convenient, to match his Daughter with a Stranger, desired some time for deliberation. Hereupon the King departed, hoping that Jacob would listen to the Marriage. But Jacob having discovered unto his Sons the ravishment of their Sister, and the request of Emmor, desir'd them to consider amongst themselves, what was fit to be done in the matter: whereupon some held their peace, not knowing what to say; C but Simon and Levi (the Brothers of the same Womb with their Sister) completed together this practice: It was now a Festival of the Sichemites, who intended nothing but pleasure, and banqueting; and the two Brethren taking this opportunity, by night fell upon their first Guards, and killed them as they slept; and from thence entering into the City, they killed all the Males (and with them the King and his Son) but to the Women they offered no violence. Which being executed without the knowledge of their Father, they brought their Sister back again. Jacob was very much astonish'd at this accident, so strangely executed, and was greatly displeas'd with his Children: but God appeared unto him, and comforted him, and commanded him to purifie his Tents, and offer those Sacrifices which he had vowed when first he went into Mesopotamia, and the Vision appeared unto him. As he cleansed those which followed him, he found the Gods of Laban, which Rachel had stol'n, and hid in Sichem, in the Earth, under an Oak, without his knowledge.

Afterwards departing from thence, he sacrific'd in Bethel, where he had seen the Vision, at such time as he first of all took his Journey into Mesopotamia: and as he travelled in the Land of Epbrata, Rachel died in Childbed, and was buried there (and she alone enjoyed not the honor of being buried in Hebron with those of her Parentage.) After he had made great lamentation, he nam'd the Child which the bare at that time Benjamin (by reason of the Pangs which kill'd his Mother.) These are all the Children of Jacob, twelve Males, and one Daughter; of whom eight were born by his lawful Wives, six of Lea, and two of Rachel: and of their Maids, four; two, of each of them; whose names I have heretofore mention'd. From thence went Jacob to Hebron, a City of Canaan, where his Father Isaac dwelt; but he lost him also shortly after.

C H A P. XIX.

Isaac dieth, and is buried in Hebron, Gen. 35. 29.

Jacob had not the comfort to find Rebecca his Mother still living; and Isaac died in a little time after the arrival of his Son, and was buried with his Wife by his Son Esau and Jacob in Hebron, among their Fathers. This Isaac was a man beloved of God, and guided by his special Providence, after the decease of Abraham; and after he had pass'd his Life in all virtue for the space of 185 years, he died.

The Contents of the Chapters of the Second Book.

1. How Elau and Jacob, Isaac's Sons, divided their habitations; and how Idumæa fell to Elau's lot, and Canaan to Jacob's.
2. How Joseph, the youngest of Jacob's Sons, by reason of his Dreams, which foretold his future Felicity, incurred his Brother's Envy.
3. How Joseph was sold by his Brethren into Egypt, and grew in great Authority in that Country, and how at length he had his Brothers under his power.
4. How Jacob, with all his Progeny, came unto his Son.
5. Of the affliction of the Hebrews in Egypt, for the space of 400 years.
6. How under the conduct of Moses they forsook Egypt.
7. How the Red Sea divided it self, and gave the Hebrews a passage at such time as they fled out of Egypt.

CHAP. I.

How Elau and Jacob, Isaac's Sons, divided their Inheritance; and how Idumæa fell to Elau's lot, and Canaan to Jacob's.

AFTER Isaac's death, his two Sons divided their Inheritance among themselves, and neither of them remain'd in that same place which they had chosen before to make their abode: but Elau leaving the City of Hebron to his Brother, went and dwelt in Seir, and was Lord of the Country of Idumæa, which he named by his Name (calling it Edom) for the occasion which followeth. He being very young, returned one day fore wearied with Travel, and hungry, from Hunting; and finding his Brother dressing for himself a mors of Lentil-pottage, which were very red in colour, and further encreased his appetite; he desir'd them at his hands, that he might eat them. But he taking the opportunity and occasion of his Brother Elau's hunger, constrained him to forsake his Birth-right, and to sell him the same, on condition he should give him them to eat. Elau then pres'd with Hunger, resign'd unto him his Birth-right, and confirm'd it with a solemn Oath. Hereupon, his equals in age, in way of mockery, called him Edom, by reason of his red meat; for Edom in Hebrew, significth red. His Country likewise was hence called Edom. But the Greeks, to the end they might make the name more agreeable, called it Idumæa. He became the Father of five Children, of whom he had three by his Wife Alibama, whose names were Jaus, Jolam and Chore: of the other two, Aliphates was the Son of Ada: and Raguel, of Mosametha: these Children had Elau. Aliphates had five legitimate Children, Theman, Omar, Opber, Jotham, Cenez (for Amelech was illegitimate, born by one of his Concubines, whose name was Thesma.) These dwelt in the part of Idumæa, which is called Gobolitu; and in that part, which by reason of Amelech, is called Amalechitis. For Idumæa being in times past a Land of great extent, continued the name of Idumæa thorow the whole Country: and the particular Provinces of the same, kept the names of those that first inhabited them.

CHAP. II.

Joseph, the youngest of Jacob's Children, is envied by his Brothers, Gen. 37.

BUT Jacob attained to that felicity, that scarcely any other in all that Country was so happy; for he surpassed all the Inhabitants of it in riches; and by reason of the virtues of his Children, he was both envied and regarded. For, they were accomplished in all perfections, endowed with stout hearts, apt to execute any work of the hand, and to endure all sorts of Travel: finally, all of them were furnished with knowledge and providence. But God had such care of him, and so graciously procured and furthered his good fortunes, that that which seem'd unto him to be grievous and contrary, he brought to a prosperous issue for him, to the encrease of his riches; and caus'd that both he and his Children were the first motive to our Ancestors to forsake the Land of Egypt, on that occasion which here ensueth. Jacob having begotten Joseph of Rachel, lov'd him entirely, both in respect of the beauty of his body, and of the ornaments and virtues of his mind; as also his prudence, wherein he exceeded all his other Brothers. This cordial affection of his Father, mov'd envy and hatred amongst his Brothers towards him: together with the Dreams which he had seen, and told both to his Father and Brethren, which presag'd unto him a singular felicity. For, it is the common custom of Men to be jealous of their prosperity, with whom they are familiar.

Now

A Now the visions which Joseph saw in his dream, were these. Being sent by his Father, in the company of his Brothers, to reap Corn in the time of Harvest, he saw a vision (far different from those which commonly happen in sleep) which (as soon as he awoke) he told unto his Brethren, to the end they might interpret it. He told them, that he thought in his dream the night past, that his Sheaf of Corn stood upright in a place where he had fixed it, and that theirs run towards his, to bow down and reverence the same. Which vision of his, seem'd to foretel him his ample fortune: and how he should obtain the Lordship over all of them. But they conceal'd all these things from Joseph; making shew, that they could in no sort interpret the dream: but being by themselves apart, they breathed forth contrary Imprecations, wishing that nothing of this prediction, might take effect, but perlevered more and more in envy and hatred towards him. But God (opposing his power against their envy) sent Joseph a second and more strange vision: for he dream'd, that the Sun, the Moon, and eleven of the Stars descend'd down to the Earth, and humbled themselves before him. Which vision he revealed to his Father in the presence of his Brethren (without suspicion of any hatred in them towards him) and desir'd him to interpret unto him the meaning thereof. Jacob greatly rejoiced at this dream, by reason he conceived in his mind the interpretation thereof, and (in comparing and alluding his conjectures not rashly, but with prudence) he rejoiced at those great matters which were signified by that dream: which foretold that his Son Joseph should be very fortunate and happy; and that the time should come, in which his Father, Mother and Brethren should honor him, and do him homage. For, he compared the Moon (which ripeneth and encrease all things that grow) to his Mother; and the Sun (which giveth form and force) to his Father. And as touching his Brothers, who were eleven in number, he compar'd them to the eleven Stars (which receive their force both from the Sun and the Moon.) Neither did Jacob without judgment and consideration, so interpret this vision. But Joseph's Brothers were highly grieved at this presage, conceiving as enviously and hatefully thereof, as if this felicity had been portended to a stranger, and not to their Brother, with whom they might equally partake his good fortunes, being as well Allied in felicity unto him, as in consanguinity. Whereupon they resolv'd on his death and destruction: and having consploted these counsels amongst themselves, and gathered in their Harvest, they retir'd themselves with their flock, towards Sichem (which was a part of that Country very fit to feed their Cattel;) where they kept their flocks without giving any notice of their departure to their Father. But he perceiving that no man came from the herd, that might tell him any tidings, being sorrowful and careful of his Sons, sent Joseph to the flocks, to understand how they did, and how their Affairs prospered.

CHAP. III.

How Joseph was sold into Egypt by his Brethren, and grew in credit in that Country: and how his Brethren at length were under his subjection.

BUT so soon as they saw their Brother coming towards them, they rejoiced, not as at the arrival of one of their near Friends, sent unto them by their Father, but as if their Enemy had met them, and was, by the will of God, deliver'd into their hands. They therefore mutually agreed to put them to death, and not to let slip the present opportunity. But Reuben, the eldest amongst them, seeing their disposition and conspiracy to kill him, endeavour'd to dissuade them; setting before their eyes, how heinous and wicked the enterprize was, and what hatred they might incur thereby. For (said he) if before God and before Men it be a wicked and detestable thing, to lay hands on, and to murder a stranger; how much more heinous a Crime will it be held for us, to be convicted to be the murderers of our Brother: whose death will heap sorrow on our Fathers head, and draw our Mother unto great grief and dololation, through the loss of her Son robbed and bereft from her against the ordinary course of nature. He pray'd therefore them to be advis'd in these things; and to consider in their minds, what might happen, if this Child, who was fair, virtuous, and young, should be put to death: desiring them to give over this unnatural resolution, and to fear God who was both the judge and witness of their deliberation intended against their Brother: adding that if they would desist from this heinous act, God would take pleasure in their repentance and reconciliation: but if they proceeded in their enterprize, he assur'd them, that he would punish them like fratricides; since nothing is hidden from his providence, whether it be committed in the Desert, or attempted in the City. For wherefore Men are, there is it always to be thought, that God likewise is. Further, that when they should have perpetrated this fact, they should always have their Consciences as an armed Adversary against them, which never would forsake them. That it was an impious fact to kill a Mans own Brother, although he had done him injury; and much more meritorious, to forgive a Mans Friend, that had offended against him. Moreover he said, that Joseph had done them no wrong, whose tender years rather required care and compassion at their hands, than hate and tyranny. Besides that, the cause of his slaughter would aggravate their offence, if it should be known, that for envy of his future felicity they should take away his Life; all which good hap they likewise might participate, by reason of consanguinity: and that it was their duty to think, that whatsoever blessing God imparted to Joseph, was theirs, and that for that cause they were to consider, that God would be more displeased against them, if they should endeavour to deprive him of his Life whom he had esteemed and adjudged worthy of prosperity to come. Ruben alledging these and many other things, dissuaded, and laboured to divert them from shedding their Brother's Blood. But seeing that all these his motives could in no sort mollify them, and that they hastened the rather to perpetrate the Murder; he counselled them, that at leastwise they should allot him some milder kind of death: telling them, that he endeavoured all what in him lay, at the first to dissuade them; But since it was throughly resolved among them, that he should not live; that less mischief should follow of it, if they would be ruled by his counsel: for by that means their will should have effect, yet a more mild and less hurtful, in comparison of Murder; that it were better for them to withhold their hands, and keep them immaculate, by casting him into the next Pit, and there leaving him in the hands of Death. To this counsel, all of them agreed. So Ruben took Joseph, and bound him with cords, and let him down easily into a Pit, which was dry: which done, he departed, to seek out a more convenient place for pasture.

But when Ruben was gone, Juda one of Jacob's Sons (espying certain Merchants of Arabia of the Country of the Ismaelites, who from the Country of Galaad carried Spicery and Syrian Merchandise into Egypt) counselled his Brothers to draw up Joseph out of the Well, and to sell him to those Arabians: assuring them, by that means it would come to pass, that Joseph should die the farther off from them, amongst Strangers: and as touching themselves, they should be exempt from that pollution. Which counsel of his being commended by them all, they drew Joseph out of the Pit, and sold him to the Arabians for the sum of twenty pieces of Silver, at such time as he was seventeen years of Age. Now had Ruben resolved in himself to save Joseph without his Brothers privy; for which cause coming by night unto the Pit, he called him with a loud voice; and seeing that he gave him no answer, he began to conjecture with himself, that his Brethren had put him to death; he reproved them therefore very bitterly: but after they had told him what was become of him, he gave over his mourning. After these things were thus passed, the Brethren consulted among themselves, in what sort they might clear themselves from their Fathers suspicion; and concluded among themselves to tear the Coat wherewith Joseph was attired when he came to them, and which they had taken from him when they cast him into the Well; to the end, that having stained it in the blood of a Goat, they might afterwards carry it to their Father, and shew it him, to the end he might suppose, that Joseph was slain by wild Beasts. Which done, they came unto the old Man (who had already heard something of Joseph's misfortunes) and told him, that they had not seen their Brother Joseph, neither could they assure him what mishap had befallen him: but that notwithstanding, they had found his Coat, all bloodied and torn; which made them suspect, that he was slain by some wild Beasts, if so be he were sent unto them, attired in that Coat.

But Jacob (that hitherto expected more gentle tidings, supposing and hoping that Joseph had only been captive) gave over this Opinion, and took the Coat for a most assured testimony of his Sons death; for he knew that he was apparelled therewith, at such time as he sent him to his Brothers; for which cause he lamented Joseph, from that time forward, as certainly dead. And such was the grief of his heart, that he received no consolation, but suffered himself to be persecuted by the Brothers, that Joseph was slain by Savage Beasts. He therefore fate him down, being clothed in Sackcloth, and charged with sorrow, and neither could his Sons by their counsels mitigate his moans, nor he himself remit the rigour of his lamentation.

Now Joseph was sold by the Merchants, and bought by Putiphar (an Egyptian Lord, and Steward of King Pharaoh's household) who held him in great estimation, and trained him up in all liberal Sciences, suffering him to live, not after a servile, but liberal manner, and committing unto his charge the care of his household; all which favours he made use of. Yet was he no ways diverted by these his privileges and promotions, from his habitual virtue; testifying hereby, that prudence doth not submit to adverse fortune, if a Man use the same orderly, and not at that time only when fortune fawneth and flattereth.

It

A It fortun'd not long after, that his Masters Wife fell in love with him, both for his beauty, and for his wit and diligence; and she imagin'd if she open'd his mind to him, she might easily enjoy him; and that he would esteem it a part of his felicity to be loved by his Mistress. All which she fancied, having only regard to that servile condition wherein at that present he was, and not to his manners, which continued always virtuous, notwithstanding any change that could happen unto him. So she discover'd to him her passion, and desir'd him to grant her an amorous encounter: but he refused her demand, alledging that it was a most wicked requital towards his master, if it should come to pass, that he who had bought him, and so greatly honoured him, should receive so great an injury and outrage from him. He exorted her therefore to conquer her appetite, and to lay aside all hope of ever compassing her concupiscence; alledging unto her, That desire is then less active, when hope is extinguish'd; and that he had rather suffer all mischief imaginable, then consent or condescend unto her in that wickedness. And although (said he) it be undecent for a Servant to contradict the will of his Mistress, yet, the filthiness of the fact dissuaded him from attempting the same. This repulse, more and more inflam'd her, having supposed that Joseph would not deny her; and her disordinate affections encreasing daily the devised and completed a new means, in hope to bring her love to the desired issue.

Whereas therefore a solemn and publick Feast was at hand, wherein (according to custom) the Ladies were wont to adorn the solemnity by their presence; she feigned a sickness, and persuaded her husband to believe it, hoping by this means to have the better opportunity, being alone, to solicit Joseph; which falling out accordingly, she began to court and caress him with these flattering discourses, That he had done well if (upon her first request) he had obeyed her, without any contradiction, in respect of her dignity who made suit to him; and her incredible passion, which had so far commanded her, that notwithstanding she were his Mistress, she had debas'd her self so much as to solicit him: that now he should behave himself more wisely and better; if in amends of his forepallid obstinacy he at last would consent. For if he expected this her second summons, she now made it far more affectionate and importunate then the former, for (saith he) I have feigned sickness to this end, to solicit and prefer thy company before a publick triumph. Or if at first thou didst mistrust me, thou may'st hereby conceive that I do not maliciously tempt thee, in that I yet continue in the same affection. For which cause either make choice of this present pleasure, and be obsequious to her that loved thee, in hope of further preferments, or be assured of my hate and revenge, if thou preferrest thy opinion of chastity before my favour. For be assured that thy chastity shall profit thee nothing, if I accuse thee to my Husband, and avow, that thou soughtst to violate me: for though thy allegations be more true, yet shall my words be of more force, and my accusations more acceptable in Putiphars ears than thine. But neither by these words, nor her Tears, the witnesses of her vows, could Joseph be perverted; nor could flatteries allure him, nor terrors compel him to forsake

E his resolved chastity; but he constantly contemned those unjust afflictions, wherewith she threatened him: choosing rather to suffer any misery whatsoever, than to be carried away to such criminal pleasures; being well assured that he was worthy of extreme punishment, if on a womans entreaty he should condescend to any such treachery. He admonished her of her duty, alledging the Laws, rights, and customs of Marriages, willing her rather to respect them, than her inordinate lust: which is speedily followed with repentance, and a continual fear of being discovered: whereas conjugal fidelity is void of fear, and attended by a good conscience before God and Man. Moreover, that it was more convenient for her to govern and command him as his Lady and Mistress than to debase her self, making him the partaker of their common sin; and far more pleasant to be assured in the confidence of a good life, than in secret to commit sin. By these, and such words, he endeavour'd to abate the violence of her furious passion, and to reclaim her from her depraved fancies to submit to the law of reason: but she, the more instantly he dissuaded, the more earnestly invaded him; and when by no means she could prevent him, by words, she laid violent hands upon him, to constrain him by force. But Joseph unable to endure any longer the impudence of the woman, leaving his Garment behind him, whereby she held him, fled suddenly out of the chamber. She, partly impelled by the grief of repulse, partly mov'd with fear, left her lasciviousness should be made known to her Husband, decreed first of all falsely to accuse Joseph, and by this means to take revenge upon him, holding it to be a craft worthy a womans wit, to anticipate and first of all to accuse her accuser. She therefore sat down sad and perplexed, colouring the grief of her defrauded lust, under the cloak of indignation, for her attempted honour and violated chastity. But when her husband came home, and being troubled to behold her sadness, demanded the cause thereof. H Thou deservest to live no longer (said she) my Husband, if thou do not rigorously punish that wretched slave, who hath attempted to violate thy Bed, forgetting both what he was when he came into thy house, and with how great goodness thou hast entertained him; and who instead of testifying his gratitude for the same, hath not forborn to offer injury, even to thine own Wife; and which is more on an holy day, and in time absence: whereby it manifestly appears, that the moderation which hitherto he hath pretended, rather proceeded of servile fear, than native modesty. And that which hath the more emboldened him, is that (besides all hope, and beyond his merit) thou hast favoured him: for seeing all thy goods committed to his trust and dispensation, and that he was preferred before all thine ancient Servants, he thought it lawful likewise for him to attempt and outrage thy wife. And to procure more credit to her words, she produced his Garment, which (as she said) he left behind him, when he endeavored to violate her. Putiphar moved with the words and tears of a woman, and attributing too much to his wives dissembling love, omitted the further and faithful inquisition of the truth, and after he had praised his Wives faith and loyalty, he cast Joseph, thus condemned of heinous wickedness, into the Prison of Malefactors, esteeming his wives chastity, and commending it the more, in that he was now made a witness of her approved honesty.

But Joseph committing his innocency to God, neither took care how to excuse himself, nor to declare how the matter had passed: but silently suffering the necessity of his Bonds, he comforted himself with this only hope, that God was more powerful than they that had imprisoned him; and accordingly he soon found the effects of his providence. For the keeper of the Prison considering both his faith and diligence in all that he employed him in, and the comeliness of his person, looked him out of Bonds, and by that means in some sort lessened his misery; giving him also an allowance more liberal than the rest of the prisoners had. Now, when they that were in the Prison (as often as they had intermission from their labour) conferred together (as Men in misery are wont to do) and questioned among themselves, of the causes of their misfortunes; a certain Butler of the Kings (condemned by him, in displeasure, to be cast into Irons) grew familiar with Joseph: and for that he accounted him a prudent and provident Man, he told him his Dream, praying him, that if any presage might be gathered thereby, he would expound it unto him; lamenting his misfortune, that he was not only persecuted by the Kings displeasure, but also when he should take his rest, troubled from Heaven by Dreams. For he said, that in his sleep he beheld three great clusters of grapes hanging on three Branches of a Vine, which were all ripe, and ready to be gathered; and that he thought he pressed them into a Cup, which the King held; and that afterwards, having strained the Must, he offered it to the King, and that he willingly drank thereof. When he had shewed him his Dream, he desired him, that if he had any Knowledge given him from God, he would vouchsafe to interpret his Vision unto him. Joseph bad him be of good courage, and expect, that within three days he should be delivered from his Bonds, admitted again to the Kings service, and restored to his former credit. For (said he) the Vine bringeth forth a fruit very good, and profitable for mans use; by the use thereof faith and friendship is confirmed amongst them, discords dissolved, and troubles and sorrows allwaged, instead of which, pleasures succeed. Since, said he (as thou tellest me) the King favorably received the Wine pressed out by thy hands, know that thou hast a good Dream offered thee, and that it signifieth thy deliverance from misery within three days, according to the number of those Clusters, which thou gatheredst in thy Dream. Remember me therefore, I pray thee, as soon as the event hath approved this my prediction to be real and true; and when thou art at liberty, forget not us that are left here to lie in misery, for I am not here thrust into Bonds for my wickedness, but I am punished like a Malefactor for my Vertue and Modesty; in that I rather respected the honour of the house in which I lived, and his credit who committed me to Prison, than mine own pleasure. The Butler rejoiced greatly at the interpretation of his Dream, and expected the event. Now a certain other Man, the Kings Baker, being in the same Prison with the Butler, and conceiving some hope through Joseph's so happy interpretation (for that he likewise had seen a Vision) desired to expound unto him what interpretation was to be had of a Dream, which he had had the night past, and which he related in these words. Me thought (said he) I carried three Baskets on my head: of which, two were filled with bread, and the other with flesh, and divers other kind of Meats, such as are prepared for Kings: But the Birds of the air hovering round about me, devoured all the victuals, being nothing frightened by me, although I endeavored to drive them away. Which said, he expected a presage no less fortunate than the former.

A But Joseph, after he had attentively considered the circumstances of the Dream, told him that he would rather have inform'd him of more favorable success than his Dream did portend; and that he had only two days left to live, which were signified by the two Baskets; but on the third he should be hanged and devoured by the Fowls, which he could not drive from him. Neither did it otherwise fall out with both of them, that Joseph had foretold: For upon the prefixed day, the King (celebrating the Feast of his Nativty) commanded that the Baker should be hanged, and the Butler delivered from his Bonds, and restored to his former office. But God delivered Joseph (after he had for the space of two years spent his time in the misery of the Prison, and was in the mean space no ways assisted by the ungrateful Butler) by preordinating this manner and manner of his liberty. King Pharaoh having in one and the same night seen in his sleep two Dreams, which he conceived were of ill presage to him, though he had forgot the explication of them which had been made to him at the same time; early in the morning calling before him the learnedst among the Egyptians he required the interpretation thereof. Now when he could in no sort be satisfied by them, he became more and more troubled: which the Butler perceiving, he called to mind Joseph, and his wisdom and prudence in these sorts of conjures, and repairing unto the King, told him of Joseph, and of his vision which he had whilst he was in Prison, together with Joseph's interpretation, and the event thereof, and how the same day, the Master of the Bakers being condemned to the Gallows, gave greater credit to his predictions: how he was kept Prisoner as a slave by Putiphar, the Master of his household, and that he was a Hebrew, as himself said, descended of good and honourable Parents. Command him therefore (said he) to be sent for, neither dispise the Man for his present misery, for thou maist manifestly understand by him, the signification of thy Dreams. Hereupon the King sent for him presently, and friendly taking him by the hand, spake to him after this manner. I understand by the report of my Servant, that thou art prudent; and therefore desire thee to shew me the interpretation of my Dreams in such manner as thou discoverest his unto him, and thou shalt do me an high pleasure: but beware thou neither conceal any thing for fear, nor speak for flattery, nor feed me with falsehood, but tell me all things truly, although such as may breed my discontent to hear them. D Methought as I was walking by a River side, I saw seven well fed and fat kine, which came out of the River into the pasture: and again, methought seven other came from the pasture to meet them, which were very lean and ugly to behold; these lean devoured the seven others that were fat and great, yet were never the more increased, but were all of them miserably vexed with hunger. But after this vision, being awakened out of my sleep, and troubled in my mind, what it might signifie, being seized by little and little by a pleasant slumber, I fell a sleep again; And again, I saw a vision more prodigious than the former, and which likewise troubles and terrifies me more. For I saw seven ears of Corn sprung out of one root, that hung down and bowed their heads, because they were laden with grain ready to be reapt: after which, there appeared E seven other weak, and dry ears, which devouring those other great and full ears, left me highly astonished. Hereunto Joseph answered: This Dream (O King) although it hath been seen in two figures, yet it importeth one and the same accident, which is to ensue. For both those seven lean Oxen, and those seven dry ears of Corn, which you saw devour the seven fat Oxen, and seven full ears of Corn, fore-signifie a famine and scarcity in Egypt, for so many years as there were Oxen and ears of Corn in good plight: so that the fertility of these good years shall be consumed by the sterility of so many other years according to their number; and there shall be such scarcity of necessary provision, that it shall be hard to prevent and supply the defect: all which is signified by those seven lean kine which having devoured the good, could not be satisfied by the same. All these things God foretels unto Men, not to the end they should be terrified and affrighted; but that being forewarn'd they may provide for themselves, and the more easily prevent the imminent danger. If therefore thou shalt lay up and store the abundance of the plentiful years, Egypt shall not feel the penury that shall follow. And when the King (admiring Joseph's prudence and wisdom) demanded after what manner he might provide in the time of plenty, to prevent and redress the future sterility, he warned and counselled him, that the Egyptians should use parsimony and that which remained of those years superfluity, might be reserved for future necessities. He counselled him also to command his husbandman to hoard up their Corn in their Barns, and only to distribute to the People so much as was sufficient, and no more. Hereupon the King (not only praising Joseph's counsel, but also his interpretation of his Dreams) made him Lord and Commissary of all his store; and commanded him to provide whatsoever he thought necessary for his service and the good of his People: assuring him

Antiquities, 1716.

He was now about thirty years old, and was held in great honour by the King, being for his extraordinary prudence, surnamed by him Ploutomphaneuch, which in the Egyptian language, signifieth, The discovery of hidden things: he was also honored with a Wife of great dignity. By the Kings order likewise he took to wife a Virgin, Daughter to Putifar the Heliopolitane Priest, whose name was Aseneth, by whom he begat Children before the Famine began in Egypt. The elder of which was called Manasse, which signifieth Oblivion (because attaining better fortune he grew into oblivion of his former misery:) but the younger was called Ephraim (which signifieth Return, for that he was restored to the liberty of his ancestors.) Now when, according to Joseph's interpretation, the seven years of plenty and affluence were past in Egypt; the years of famine began to infect the Land, and for that the evil was unexpected, the headlong multitude grievously pressed with hunger and misery, began to flock about the Kings gates and Garners. Whereupon the King called for Joseph, who presently distributing Grain to those that wanted it, became without controversy, the Father and conferrer of the commonalty. Neither did he only sell it those that inhabited that Country, but to strangers also; accounting the whole race of Mankind so allied together that 'tis reasonable such as want, should be supplied by those that have plenty. And because the same calamity both oppressed Canaan and other Kingdoms of the world, Jacob also sent all his Sons into Egypt to fetch Corn; (as soon as he understood that strangers also had liberty to traffick in that place) only with himself he retained Benjamin, whom he begat on Rachel, and who was brother by the whole blood to Joseph. When these ten Brethren arrived in Egypt, they repaired to Joseph, beseeching him that they might be permitted to buy corn: for nothing was done without his express command; it seem'd an honour done to the King, to do honour to Joseph. He taking knowledge of his Brothers, who thought of nothing less than of him (by reason that in his youth he was sold away by them, and age had altered the lineaments of his face;) and besides, none of them could imagine that he had attained to so great dignity) determined to make trial of them, to the end he might the better gather how they were affected. For he both denyed them his license to buy Corn, and commanded them also to be apprehended for spies, telling them that they were of divers Nations, though they feigned kindred: for how can it be (saith he) that a private Man should bring up so many worthy Sons; which felicity scarcely and very seldom is granted to Kings? This did he, to the end he might gather some intelligence of his father, and in what estate he lived, during his absence; and what was become of Benjamin's Brother: for he was much afraid, they had offered the same hard measure to the youth which they had us'd to himself. These words struck them with a great fear, in regard of their eminent peril, supposing that they had travelled this long journey all in vain: and for that they saw their accusation must be answered; Ruben the eldest of them, began after this manner to plead their common cause. We come not hither (saith he) as spies, but dire famine (whose furie we seek to prevent) hath compelled us to come into this Country, hoping in your humanity; who (as we have heard) have not only made offer of sale of Corn, and means of subsistence to your own Citizens, but also to all strangers. That we are Brothers, and born of the same Father, our very countenances testify, in that they vary not very much the one from the other. Our Father is called Jacob; by Nation an Hebrew: who begat us, his twelve Sons, on four women: and while we were all living our affairs were fortunate and prosperous; but since the death of one of us, whose name was Joseph, our domestic fortunes began to grow to ruine. Our Father languisheth in continual lamentations; and his Tears do no less afflict us, than in times past the untimely death of our dearest Brother did affect us. Now are we come to buy Corn, having left in our Fathers custody the youngest of our Brothers, called Benjamin. That thus it is, if thou please to send any one unto our house, thou mayest be assured. Thus spake Ruben, both on his own and his Brothers behalf, to remove Joseph's sinister opinion of them: who knowing that both his Father and Brother were in health, commanded them to be shut in Prison, under pretence to call them to further examination, at better leisure. Some three days after (calling them before him) he began thus: Since (saith he) you profess, that you came not hither into this Kingdom on purpose, either to prejudice the King, or work

Treasons

A Treasons towards the State, and that you pretend your selves to be the Sons of one Father: you shall induce me to believe, that your allegations be true, if leaving some one with me as pledge of your loyalties (who shall be well entertained) you bear hence your desired Corn to your Father, and return again unto me, bringing with you your Brother, whom (as you say) you left behind you: for this shall be an Argument that you lye not. Amazed at these words, and supposing that their extreme calamity was at hand, they lamented their misfortune; oftentimes expostulating amongst themselves, that God did now punish them for their cruelty towards Joseph. But Ruben reprehended their too late and unprofitable repentance, saying, That those afflictions which God (the just revenger of innocency) had inflicted on his impious Brothers, ought patiently to be born. After this manner spake they one unto another, supposing that no Man was present who understood the Hebrew Tongue: and they all lamented, being inwardly touched with the words of Ruben; and condemned their perpetrated wickedness; for which, at that time, they thought that God did most justly punish them. Joseph beholding them in this perplexity, and unable to dissemble any longer his Brotherly love, by reason the Tears already began to burst out of his Eyes, which at that time he desired to conceal, departed from among them.

Not long after, returning again unto them, he retained Simeon with him, to be in the mean time as a pledge, until their return; and giving them licence to buy their Corn, he commanded them to depart; giving withal a special commandment to one of his Servants, that the Money which they had brought to buy Corn, should secretly be shut up in their Sacks, and they permitted to depart; all which his Servant performed. But Jacob's Sons returning into Canaan told their Father all that had hapned unto them in Egypt, and how they were taken for Spies, and Traitors to that Country: and that when they protested, that they were all Brethren, and that the eleventh was left at home with their Father, the Government would not believe them. Moreover, that Simeon was left pledge with the Governor, until Benjamin should come thither to give testimony of their truth: whereupon they desired their Father without fear or sinister conceit, to send their younger Brother with them. But Jacob was displeased with that which his Sons had done; and whereas he was not a little grieved that Simeon was left behind, he thought it worse then death also to be deprived of Benjamin; and neither could Ruben with his Prayers (offering his Sons for pledges, that if any sinister fortune should fall upon Benjamin by the way, the Grandfather might revenge it on his Children) persuade Jacob to yield consent: but they uncertain what to do, were more and more terrified, in that they found their Money inclosed in their Sacks of Corn. Now when Corn began already to fail them, Jacob being compelled by force of Famine, deliberated to send Benjamin with his other Brothers: for they dur'd not return into Egypt, without him. And when necessity pressed them daily more and more, and his Sons ceased not instantly to call upon him; yet was he still doubtful and unresolved: till at last Judah, a Man vehement by nature, began more freely to tell his Father that he was too careful of his Brother Benjamin, to whom nothing could happen without the will of God, whither abroad or at home; and that without this superfluous care of his Son Benjamin, endangered his own and all their lives, which could not subsist but by the relief which was to be had out of Pharaoh's Country; that he ought also to have care of the life of Simeon, lest whilst he delayed to send Benjamin on the journey, Simeon in the mean time should be slain by the Egyptians. Moreover he exhorted him to commit the care of his Son to God, promising to bring him back again in safety, or else to die together with him: and proposing, that certain Fruits of Canaan, as Balm, Storace, Terebinth and Honey, should be sent as Presents to Joseph, together with the double price of their Corn. Thus shedding Tears on both sides, they departed from their Father, leaving him miserably tormented for the health of his Sons; and contrariwise suspecting with themselves, lest through his absence their Father should dye with sorrow. And to travelling into Egypt, they mitigated their present grief with the hope of better fortune. No sooner were they arrived there but they repaired unto Joseph; being sore afraid, lest it should be laid to their charge, that by fraud and deceit they had carried away with them the price of their former Corn: which presently, before Joseph's Steward, they carefully excused, saying, That they found the Money, among the Wheat at such time as they emptied their Sacks; which now, in discharge of their truth, they had brought back again. But he denying that he ever mislaid their Money, and they being delivered from this fear, began to be more secure; so that Simeon was suddenly set at liberty, to converse among his Brethren. Now, when Joseph was returned from the service of the King, they offer him presents: and he enquiring of them, how their Father did: they answered, that he was in health. Then perceiving that Benjamin was yet yet alive, whom he saw among them, he ask'd whether that were their younger Brother: and hearing that it was, he only uttered these words, That God's Providence was over all Things, and departed from them, being unwilling that any of them should see him shed Tears, which he could not any longer contain. Inviting them afterwards unto a Banquet, he commanded them to sit down in order, according as they were wont to do when they were with their Father; and whereas he kindly entertained all of them, he honoured Benjamin with a double share. After the Banquet, when they were all laid down to rest, he commanded the Steward to measure out the Wheat which every one should bear away with him, and to hide the price thereof again in their Sacks: but in Benjamin's Sack, he commanded him to put his Cup which he ordinarily made use of. This he did, with intent to make trial of their loves towards Benjamin; and whether they would stick unto him, being accused of Theft, or leave him behind as a Malefactor, and return unto their Father, as if the matter no ways touched them. Which being done according as he had commanded, early in the morning all Jacob's Sons arose, and taking with them Simeon, departed onwards of their journey; rejoicing as well at his Restoration, as Benjamin's return, whom they both promised and protested to bring back again to their Father; when behold, suddenly a Troop of Horsemen beset them round; amongst whom, was that Servant who had hid the Cup in the Sack. They being troubled by this sudden incursion, and asking, why they set upon them whom they so lately had both invited and entertained so honourably: The Egyptians answered, and exclaimed against them, calling them wicked Men, who forgetting the late benefits received, and Joseph's gentleness and humanity, were so wicked, as to return him Injuries for his Courtesies; threatening them that they should be punished for their Theft: and telling them, that although for a time they had deceived the Officer of the Table, yet could they not deceive God; and again asking them, whether they were well in their Wits, in supposing that for this offence they should not be incontinently punished: with these, and the like speeches, the Servant insulted over them. But they, who nothing at all suspected this subtilty, accused him, saying, That they wondered at the Mans unreasonable-ness, in so rashly accusing them of Theft, who had not kept back the price of their Corn, which they found in their Sacks, whereas none but themselves knew of that Money; so far were they from purposely offering any wrong. Yet in that they thought the searching would better satisfy them, than denial, they bid them search their Sacks; offering themselves, each of them, to suffer punishment, if any one of them were found guilty of the Theft. This search which they offered, the Egyptians accepted; yet agreed the punishment should be inflicted only on him who had done the Injury. Afterwards beginning to search, and orderly looking into each Mans Sack, at length they came to Benjamin; not that they were ignorant the Cup was hid in his Sack, but that they might seem to discharge their duty more exactly. Now all the rest being secure in themselves, they were only careful of their Brother Benjamin; and they hoped that he would not be found guilty of falsehood: for which cause, they more freely upbraided their Persecutors; object- ing unto them, how, through their importunity, they had been hindered a good part of their Journey. Now as they searched Benjamin's Sack, they found the Cup; where- upon all the Brothers began to mourn and lament, both bewailing their Brother's mis- fortune, who was presently to suffer death for the Theft; and their own mishap, who having plighted their Faith unto their Father for Benjamin's safe return, were compelled to falsify the same through this accident. And that which further increased their grief, was, that when as they most of all hoped to be free from dangers, they were, by for- tunes envy, thrust into so great Calamity; confessing themselves to be the Authors both of their Father's, and this their Brother's misfortune; in that they had never ceased to importune and compel their Father (although he were unwilling, and resisted) to send the Child with them.

Now the Horsemen having laid hands on Benjamin, led him unto Joseph, and his Brothers followed him. Joseph beholding his Brother in the other hands, and the rest bemoaning him round about them; Have you, said he (O most wicked Men) either I have con- temned my humanity, or Gods Providence, as that thou durst attempt such a heinous injury against him who entertained you with hospitality, and dismissed you with benefits? To whom they answered, that they were ready to suffer punishment for Benjamin, calling again to their remembrance, Joseph's injuries, saying; that he was happy who delivered by death from life exempt from all calamities; and that (if he lived) God inflicted that plague on them for his sake. They said also, that they were the plague and great misfortune of their Father, because that to the former sorrow, which he had endur'd ever since the time of Joseph's death, they had also annexed this new misery: neither did Reuben desist to reproach them in bitter manner with the wickedness which they committed.

A committed. But Joseph told them that he dismissed them all (feeling that their innocence was proved to him) and would be contented with the Lads punishment: for (said he) neither is it reasonable that he should be delivered for the sake of those who have not offended: nor they punished for him that hath done the Theft: He commanded them therefore to depart, and promised them safe conduct on their way.

Whilst all of them were grievously wounded with these words (so that scarcely one of them could speak for sorrow) Juda (who had persuaded his Father to send Benjamin with them, and who above the rest was a Man of confidence) purposed to expose himself to all danger in that resolution to deliver his Brother: whereupon he addressed himself to Joseph, and spake thus, My Lord (said he) we confess that we are all ready to suffer punishment, though we have not all of us committed the offence, but only the youngest; and though we suppose his life to be almost desperate, yet our only hope rests in your goodness and clemency. We beseech you therefore, that you will have compassion of us, and be pleased to take counsel, not of your just indignation, but your native goodness; since 'tis proper to great minds, as yours is, to surmount those passions, to which only vulgar Souls give way, and are wont to submit. Consider, I pray you, whether it stand with your dignity to kill those, who present themselves to be punished, and desire in no sort to live, except it be by the benefit of your mercy: Suffer not your self to be deprived of this honor, after you have delivered us from Famine, and liberally furnished us with Corn to carry to our Family, labouring under the same calamity. For 'tis one and the same bounty to continue them in life, who are afflicted with Famine; and not to take it from them, who have merited death; And you shall save those whom you have saved; and that life which you would not suffer to fail by Famine, restore and give again: whereby your clemency will be more commendable, whilst you give both life, and those things likewise whereby life is maintained. Moreover, I think that God himself hath given you this occasion to declare your virtue, that it may appear that you set lighter by the injuries offered unto you, than by your will to do good; and that you are not only liberal to them who are poor and innocent, but merciful to those that are guilty. For although it be a glorious thing to yield succor in adversities; yet is a Prince no less honoured by his clemency, especially in a cause that concerneth his particular interest; for if they that remit small offences, are followed by deserved praise; what is it to refrain a Man's anger in a capital Crime: Dost it not very near approach the Divine clemency? And had I not good experience by Joseph's death, how grievously my Father taketh the want of his Children, I would not so earnestly intreat for his safety who is so dear to him: or if I did, it should be only to contribute to the praise of your clemency; and were there not some to whom our death would bring both grief and discontent, we were willing all of us to suffer punishment. But now whereas we have not so much commiseration of our selves (though as yet we are but young, and have not much tasted the pleasures of life) as of our disconsolate Parent, who is oppress'd not only with Age, but Grief, we beseech you, not for your own sakes, but for his, to grant us life, though at this day we are under your justice for our offence. Assuredly he is a good Man, and hath omitted nothing to render us like himself; worthy he is never to taste or be tried by any such calamity, who now, through our absence, is dis- cruciated with care and sorrow. Now if he should receive tidings of our death, and the cause thereof, he will not endure any more to live: the infancy of our deaths will shorten his days, and make his death by this means more unhappy; you rather than hear the rumor of our shame, he would desire to die beforehand. All these things considered (although you are justly moved by this offence) remit the revenge unto our Father, and rather let your pity towards him, than our iniquity towards you, prevail. Grant this favor to his old age; since if deprived of our presence, he neither will, nor can desire to live: yea, grant it to the very name of a Father, where- with you are honoured your self: for God, the Father of all men, will bless you in that name, and prosper your Family; whom also you shall honor, if in respect of that common name, you take compassion of our Father, in considering the sorrow that he shall endure, if he be deprived of his Children. It now lieth in your power to give us that which you may impute us of, by that power which God hath given you: and in doing us this favour, you shall imitate the Nature of God, and in this respect become like unto him. For, since it lieth in your power to do both the one and the other, it were better you did good than evil; and contenting your self with your power, not remember then to urge your revenge: but only think that your power was given you to keep and preserve men; and that the more mercy you extend towards many, the more honor you redouble on your own head. Now it lieth in your power, by forgiving our Brothers error, to give us all life. For neither can we be safe except he be saved; neither may we return home unto our Father, except he return; but here must we suffer what forever our Brother suffereth. Nei- ther do we crave any other mercy at your hand if we be repulsed in this, but that you will inflict the same and the same punishment on us, in no other manner, than as if we had been partakers of the Felony: for this were better for us, than that we our selves, through sorrow, should offer violence to our own Souls. I will not alledge or urge his youth, or judgment, as yet unripe; neither will I alledge, alleges, that pardon is usually granted to such; but here will I make an end, That whether we be condemned, in that I have not sufficiently pleaded his cause, or whether we be absolved, we may wholly ascribe this grace to your favour and clemency: to whose praise, this likewise shall be added, That not only you have saved us, but also, in pardoning us the punishment which we have justly deserved, you have had more care of us, than we our selves. If therefore it be your pleasure to adjudge him to die, let me suffer for him, and send him back unto our Father; or if it please you to retain him for your slave, I am more fit than he to do all sorts of services, as you may perceive; and I am ready to suffer all that which may be inflicted on me. When Judah had spoken thus, he humbled himself at Joseph's feet, endeavouring, as much as in him lay, to mollify and appease his anger: in like sort also all the other Brothers prostrated themselves, offering themselves to die for Benjamin.

Gen. 45, 1, 2, and 16.
Joseph maketh himself known to his Brethren.

But Joseph moved with pity, and unable any longer to personate a displeased Man, sent away all those that were present; and being alone with them, discovered himself unto his Brothers; and in this sort to them only he disclosed himself, and said, I cannot but commend the piety and love which you bear unto your Brother, which I find to be greater than I did expect, gathering my conjectures from those things which in times past have happened unto me. Forso this end have I done all this, that I might make trial of your brotherly affection: whereof since you have given me a signal proof, I will not ascribe that which you have done unto me to your natures, but rather wholly to the Will of God, who hath at this present furnished you with all things which are profitable for you, and I hope will hereafter give you greater things by his special grace. Seeing therefore I understand my Fathers rather desired than hoped health, and find you to be such as I desired you should be towards your Brother, I freely forget those injuries which in times past were done unto me: rather making choice to give you thanks, as the Ministers of God's Providence, that against this time provided for our common good, than remembering your former malice. I therefore pray you, that forgetting those things which are past, you will be of good courage, and rejoice that it hath pleased God to produce a good event of an ill intent. Let not the evil sentence which in times past you pronounced against me, any ways trouble you, since you perceive it wanted effect: but rejoice at these Works of God, and go and tell your Father that which you have seen, lest being consumed with immoderate care of you, I myself be deprived of the chiefest fruit of my felicity, before he come to my presence, and be made partaker of the same. Wherefore depart you, and bringing with you him, your Wives and Children, and all your Kindred, come back unto me: for it were inconvenient (my dear Brethren) that you should not be partakers of my felicity, especially since this Famine is as yet to continue for the term of five years. This said, Joseph embraced his Brethren: but they were wholly confounded with tears and sorrow, and the greater was their repentance, in that they had sinned against so kind a Brother. After all this, there follow'd a Banquet. And the King understanding that Joseph's Brethren were arrived, he (as if some good fortune had befallen him) very heartily rejoiced, and gave them Chariots laden with Corn, and Gold, and Silver, with other Presents, to present their Father with, who, enriched with divers gifts (some from their Brother to his Father, and others to themselves, but especially to Benjamin) returned home into their Country. Now when Jacob understood by his Sons in what estate his Son Joseph was, that he had not only escaped death (which he had so long time bewailed) but also that he lived in high prosperity, and ministered to the King of Egypt, and had, in a manner, the whole Government of the Kingdom in his hands; he easily believed all things that were told him, and acknowledged the great Works of God, and his Goodness shewed unto him, although for a time it seemed to be intermitted. And a little time after, he prepar'd himself to go and visit his Son Joseph.

CHAP. IV.

How Jacob with all his Family went into Egypt.

When Jacob arrived near the Fountain of Covenant, he offered in that place a Sacrifice unto God; and fearing lest his Children should inhabit Egypt, by reason of the fertility of the place, and that his posterity, by not returning back into the Land of Canaan, should lose the possession of that which God had promised them; and furthermore, doubting lest that his Journey into Egypt, being by him enterprized without consulting the Will of God, should be prejudicial to his Children; suspecting likewise lest he should die before he came to Joseph's presence, he was wonderfully perplexed in mind. Whilst thus he ruminated, and cast the things in his mind, he was surprized with a heavy sleep, during which time God appeared unto him, and called him by his Name; Jacob, asking who it was that called him, God answer'd, Dost thou not know (O Jacob) that God, who hath both protected thee, and thy Ancestors, and succoured you

Hido & Ruffini, cap. 7, §. 26, 27, 28.
Jacob rejoiced to hear the prosperous and happy news of Joseph.

A in all your necessities; who contrary to thy Fathers purpose, made thee Lord of his Family; and whereas by thy self thou didst travel into Mesopotamia, did not I bring it to pass, that being watched in wedlock very happily, thou returnedst into thy Country back again, being blessed with many children, and stored with much riches? Was it not I also that have kept thy family in safety, and when it seemed thou hadst lost Joseph, I raised him to that high step of dignity wherein now he liveth, and made him the next in dignity to the King of Egypt? And now also I am come unto thee, to this end, that I may guide thee in thy journey, and that I may forget thee that thou shalt depart this life in the arms of Joseph, and that thy posterity shall be mighty and famous for many Ages, and shall possess that Land, the Empire whereof I have promised them. Encourag'd and made confident by this dream, he more willingly hastned towards Egypt with his sons, and his Family, whose number amounted to Threescore and ten. Their names, in that they are somewhat hard, I should not mention, were it not to satisfy some, who contend that we are Egyptians, and not Mesopotamians. The Sons of Jacob therefore are twelve in number, of whom Joseph came thither long before them. The rest are these with their Sons. Reuben had four Sons, Enoch, Phales, Assulon and Charms. Simeon had six, Jumilas, Jamin, Putbod, Jachen, Zaar and Zaar. Levi had also three, Gelfem, Chaath, and Marari. Judah had likewise three, Sala, Phares and Zara, with two Sons of Phares, Esron, and Amyr. Issachar had four, Thulas, Phrasar, Job and Samaron. Zabulon had three, Surad, Elon and Janel. These were the Children which Jacob had by Leah, who also led with her Dinah her Daughter: The number of whom amounted to Thirty three. But Rachel had two Sons, of which the elder was called Joseph, who had likewise two, Manasse, and Ephraim. Benjamin had ten, Bolofus, Baccarus, Afabel, Gela, Naman, Ifes, Aros, Nomphtis, Optatis and Sarod. These fourteen added to those abovenamed, make up the number of Forty seven. And this was the legitimate issue of Jacob. But by Bala, Rachel's Handmaid, he had Dan and Nephthim; this latter had four Sons, Elin, Gunnes, Sares and Hellim. Dan had only one Son called Uffis. Now if these be added to the abovenamed, they make up the number of Fifty four. But Gad and Asfer were born by Zelpha, Leah's Handmaid; Gad was attended by seven Sons: Zaphonia, Ugis, Sunis, Zabrus, Erines, Erades and Arnel. Asfer had one daughter and six Sons, whose Names were Jaanes, Effus, Judah, Baris, Abars, Melmel. Together fifteen being added to the aforeaid Fifty four, make up the number Seventy, which with Jacob. But Joseph understanding that his Father was at hand (for Judah posted before to give him notice thereof) went out to meet him, and did so, near a Town called Heros. Jacob was fill'd with such extream and unexpected Joy, that he had almost expired; and that of Joseph was little less. He desired his Father to march onwards by easy journeys, and taking with him his five Brethren, hastned unto the King, signifying unto him, that his Father with all his Family were Arrived. The King no sooner understood it, but he joyfully asked Joseph in what employments he took delight: Who answer'd him, that his Exercise was in keeping of Cattel, and that he had no other Trade. This answer he made, to the intent they might not be divided one from another, but that living all together, they might take care of their Father: Another Reason was, lest emulation should happen betwixt them and the Egyptians, if so be they should be Conversant in the same profession; whereas this people had little experience in the keeping of Cattel. Now when Jacob was brought into the King's presence, and had done him Reverence, and pray'd God for the prosperity both of him and his Realm, Pharaoh ask'd him how old he was? And he answer'd, that he was an hundred and thirty years old; at which when the King admir'd, he added, that his Ancestors had lived far longer. Then Pharaoh appointed him and his Sons to dwell in Heliopolis, where also the King's shepherds had their pastures. But the Famine increased in Egypt, and the calamity was without remedy, by reason that Nilus did not overflow the earth after its usual manner; and on the other side, God rained not upon the earth. Moreover, in that the sterility was foreseen, it was more grievous especially to the Commonalty, who had laid up nothing, neither did Joseph give them Corn without ready money: Which when they began to weary, they exchange'd their Cattle and Slaves for Corn; and they that had Lands, sold a portion thereof unto the King for their provision. And when by this means all these possessions came into the King's hands, they went to inhabit here and there, as they thought, to the end that the King might be more assured of the possession of their Land; the Priests only were excepted, to whom the Lands which they had, remained intire. Finally, this necessity reduced both the minds and bodies of the whole Nation into servitude, after such a manner, that they esteemed no Labour or Means unseemly, that might serve them towards their sustenance. But when the Famine ceased, and the earth water'd by the overflow of the River, began to recover her former fertility; Joseph visiting every City of the Kingdom, and assembling the multitude in every one of them, restored them the possession of those Lands which they had sold to the King, and exhorted them to manure the same in no worse manner than they would do their own, on condition to pay the fifth part unto the King, which was due unto him by his Prerogative and Kingly Right. The People rejoicing at this unexpected restitution, earnestly intended and prosecuted their Tillage: And by this means, not only Joseph's Authority, but also the Peoples Hearts were not a little tied unto the King; and the Inheritance of the fifth part of the profits remained with the Kings that succeeded, and all their Posterity.

But Jacob, after he had lived 17 years in Egypt, ended his life in the arms of his Sons, having first prayed God to give them Prosperity and Abundance; and prophesied, that every one of their Posterities should attain to the Possession of a part of the Land of Canaan, as in process of time it came to pass. Besides, praising his Son Joseph, for that forgetting the Injuries done unto him, he had bestowed divers Benefits on his Brethren, yea, and such as well besetm'd his Benefactors, he commanded his Sons, that they should admit Joseph's Sons, Ephraim and Manasse, into their number, at such time as they should divide the Land of Canaan, as hereafter it shall be declar'd. Last of all, he pray'd them to bury him in Hebron. He liv'd 150 years wanting three, being second to none of his Ancestors in Piety, and obtain'd the same Blessing, in that he was a Man adorn'd with equal Vertues. Joseph, by the King's permission, transported his Fathers Body to Hebron, and there buried it very magnificently. But his Brothers fearing to return with him into Egypt, in that they suspected lest their Father being dead, he should be revenged on them, in that they had not any Friend left alive, under whose Favour they might hope for pardon, he commanded them, that laying their suspicions aside, they should fear no evil: And having brought them back again with him, he gave them great Possessions: Neither did he ever cease to entertain them with brotherly Kindness. But he likewise died, when he had liv'd 110 years; a Man endow'd with admirable Vertue, prudent in all Affairs, and moderate in his Government: By which means it came to pass, that neither his foreign Birth, nor his Calamities, whereof we have spoken, did any ways hinder him, but that he was exalted and continued in high Dignity. The rest of his Brothers also, having spent their lives in Happiness, died in Egypt, whose Bodies their Sons and Nephews transported and buried in Hebron; but Joseph's Bones were afterwards translated by the Hebrews into Canaan, at such time as they departed out of Egypt into Canaan; for herunto had he bound them with an Oath. But being obliged to declare this, and other actions of this Nation, I will first of all shew the cause why they departed out of Egypt.

C H A P. V.

Of the Affliction which the Hebrews endur'd in Egypt, for the space of 400 years.

THE Egyptians are a Nation addicted to Pleasures and Delicacy, impatient of Labour, and affecting Gain: Whence it came to pass, that bearing hatred to the Hebrews, and envying their Happiness, they were very evilly disposed toward them. Forseeing the Race of the Israelites flourish and abound in Riches, which they got by their Labour and Industry, they conceiv'd an Opinion that their advancement and increase, would be the overthrow and decreace of the Egyptians; so that at length they forgot the Benefits which Joseph had done to them: And after the Royalty was transported into another Family, they committed divers Outrages against the Israelites, and comploted against them in what manner they might more grievously afflict them. They enjoin'd them therefore to cut Nilus into divers Trenches, and to environ their City with Walls, and to build Fortifications and Banks, whereby the Foundations of the River might be diverted. They also employ'd our Nation in building their high and vain Pyramides, compelling them to learn divers Arts, and to accustom themselves to endure Labour; and in such Afflictions liv'd the Israelites for the space of 400 years, the Egyptians studying nothing else but to vex them with continual Labour, and our Countrymen endeavouring always to surmount all these Difficulties. Living in this estate, there grew afterwards another occasion, which intigated them the more to seek the ruine and desolation of our Nation. For one of the Sacred Secretaries (to whose Predictions those kind of People do very much attribute) foretold the King, that about that time there should be One born among the Israelites, that should grievously afflict the estate of the Egyptians, and wonderfully enhance the Glory of the Israelites, and surpass all other in Vertue, and purchase to himself immortal Glory, if so be he should attain no Man's Estate. Wherewith the King being greatly terrified, published an Edict, by the advice of this Secretary, that whatsoever Male-child should be born among the Israelites, it should be cast into the River to be drown'd; he commanded likewise the Egyptian Midwives diligently to observe the time when the Hebrew Women Travail'd with Child, because he trusted not to the Midwives of their own Nation,

A Nation. He Enacted also a Law with a penalty, that if any should be so bold to conceal their Children, both they and all their Family should be put to death. Great was their Calamity, not only because they were deprived of their Children, and the Parents themselves made the Ministers to murder their own Children; but also because they foresaw hereby, the certain and infallible extirpation of their whole Nation, by reason that when the Children were slain, the Parents themselves, not long after, were assured to die: thus lamented they in themselves the extreme misfortune whereinto they were fallen. But no man whatsoever, though he complot never so many Stratagems, can resist the Will of God. For both the Child, of whom the Sacred Secretary had prophesied, was secretly brought up undiscovered by the Kings Spies; and proved by the Events of his Life, that he was no false Prophet. Amram, an Hebrew both, and a Noble Man amongst his Nation, fearing both the publick Peril, lest the whole Nation should be brought to nothing by the want of Issue; and his own private Misfortune, whose Wife at home was big with Child, and ready to lie down, was troubled in his Mind; and uncertain what to do. For which cause he made his request unto God, beseeching him that at the length he would have Mercy on that People by whom only he had been perpetually honoured; and that it would please him to bring to an end the present affliction, which threatened the whole Nation with utter Ruin and Destruction. God being moved to Mercy by his most humble Prayer, appeared to him in a Dream, and comforted him, commanding him to be of good Courage, telling him, That he had in Memory the Piety of his Ancestors, and that he would reward them for it, even as in times past he had been gracious to their Fore-fathers. For it was he that had increased their Posterity, and multiplied them to so mighty a Nation, that by his favour Abraham departing alone out of Mesopotamia into Canaan, besides other Felicities, had Issue by his Wife that was formerly barren, and left ample Possessions to his Successors: to Ismael, Arabia; to Chetur's Children, Tragliatite; and to Isaac, Canaan. Nor could they ever forget without Impley and Ingratitude, the attempts also which were happily achieved in War by his Assistance; that Jacob's Name is renowned amongst Foreign Nations, both in respect of the Felicity wherein he lived, and that which by hereditary Right he left to his Posterity; who taking their Original from 70 Men that accompanied their Father into Egypt, were now increased to the number of 600000: and assuring him that now also, he would take care of them all in general, and of him in particular, That this Child, for fear of whose Nativty, the Egyptians have condemn'd all the Hebrew Children to death, should be born to him: that he should not be discovered by the constituted Spies; and having elap'd beyond all expectation, should be brought up, and in due time deliver the Hebrews from the Thraldom of the Egyptians, and obtain an eternal Memory for this his famous Action, not only amongst his own Nation, but also amongst Strangers: that he should also have a Brother, that should deserve both in himself, and in his Posterity, to inherit the Priesthood for ever. After these things were declar'd in a Vision unto Amram, he awak'd, and told it to his Wife Jacobel; and notwithstanding the Prediction of this Dream, their Suspicion and Fear the rather increased more and more; for they were not only pensive in respect of their Child, but also by reason that the future great good fortune that was promised them, seemed incredible. But soon after, the Woman being brought to Bed, gave credit to the Oracle, having had so easie and gentle a Labor, that she beguiled the Overseers and Spies, in that she felt none of those Throes which commonly afflict such as are in Labour: so that she nourished the Infant three Months secretly in her Houle, without being in any fore discovered. But afterwards, Amram fearing to be surpris'd, and doubting lest he should incur the Kings displeasure, if the matter were discover'd, whereby both he, and the Child should be made away, and Gods Promises should be frustrate, he chose rather wholly to commit the safety of his Son to F's Providence, supposing that if the Boy were hidden, which notwithstanding would be hard to effect, yet it would be troublesome unto him to live in continual peril both of his own and his Son's Safety: moreover, he thought that God would provide some means of Preservation, to the intent that nothing of that which he had foretold, might be proved false. Having taken this Resolution, they prepared and made a Cradle of Settle; after the manner of a Couch, so great, that it was sufficient to lay the Child in at ease; and having pitched it on every side, lest the water should pierce the same, they put the Child into it, and suffering him to float along the Stream, committed him to the Mercy of God. Whil't in this manner it was born down by the Stream, Miriam, the Sister of the young Infant, by her Mothers command, went along the Bank on the other side of the River, observing whither at length the Basket would be carried; and where it should arrive. At that time God manifestly declared, That nothing is achieved by Mans Wisdom, but that all things are brought to pass by his admirable Providence; and that they,

who for their Profit, and particular Security, seek the Ruin and Destruction of others H with never so much Subtily, Care and Diligence, yet are oftentimes deceiv'd in their Expectations : And that they that submit their Wills unto Gods Will, are secured from all Wrongs by such means as were never thought on, as may most manifestly be perceived by this Child.

Thermuthis, the King's Daughter, walking along the River side, espied this Basket carried away by the course of the Stream, and presently commanded certain Swimmers to fetch it to Land, and bring it before her : who executing her Command, she opened the Basket, and beheld the Child ; who, in that he was fair and well featured, did greatly delight her. Thus God so loved and favoured Moses, that he cauled him both to be nourished and brought up by them, who, for fear lest he should be born, had decreed to destroy all the rest of the Race of the Hebrews. Thermuthis therefore commanded them to fetch her a Nurf, who might give the Child suck ; who refusing the same, as all other Nurfes did that were fittest for to suckle him, Marion, as if by good fortune, and not of set purpose, the had light into their company, began to speak thus unto Thermuthis : In vain (said she) O Princess, dost thou strive to give this Babe suck by any but an Hebrew Nurf, for he will not accept it : for if thou call unto thee a Nurf of the same Nation, and agreeable with his Nature, doubtless he will take the Nipple. This Speech of hers being both heard, and plausibly accepted, the Princess commanded her to bring her an Hebrew Woman that gave suck ; which she diligently performing, returned, and brought her Mother with her, whom none of the Assistants knew ; and who presenting her Breast unto the Child, K he willingly took the dug ; so that upon the Princess command, the suckling of the Child was wholly committed unto her. By reason of this accident, and for that he was cast into the River, he was called Moses ; for the Egyptians call water, Mo ; and saved, Yes ; so this Name, composed of these two words, was imposed on this Child ; who afterwards (without Exceptions) became the wisest Man among the Hebrews, according as God had foretold : He was the seventh after Abraham ; for he was Amrams Son, and Amram Son unto Caris, and he to Levi, and Levi to Jacob ; who was the Son of Isaac, who was the Son of Abraham. He had a Judgment ripe than his Age ; for even among his childlike Delights, he shewed himself more discreet than all his Equals ; and whatsoever he did, it gave Testimony, that at such time as he should attain to Mans Estate, he would be capable of great things. When he was but three years old, God adorned and endowed him with an admirable beauty. He was so fair and amiable, that there was not any, how austere and inhuman soever, but in beholding him, would be astonish'd. Yea, divers who met him, as he was carried through the Streets, turned themselves about to behold him, and intermitted their other Affairs, only to look upon him ; for the admirable beauty of this Infant, did ravish all those that saw him. Whence it came to pass, that Thermuthis, in that she had no other Issue, adopted him for her Heir ; and carrying him to the King her Father, she presented him to him, saying, That she was careful of a Successor, by reason God had not vouchsafed him to have any Issue ; for (said she) I have brought up this Infant no less excellent in Wit, than divine in Beauty, having received him miraculously from the River Nilus, and have decreed to adopt him my Child, and to establish him as Successor to thee in thy Kingdom. This said, she delivered the Infant into her Father's Arms ; who, after he had embraced and hugged him at his Breast (to give his Daughter the more content) he put his Diadem upon the Child's Head : but Moses pulling it from his Head, after a childish manner, cast it on the ground, and spurned it with his Feet ; which Act of his was supposed ominous to the Realm, and dangerous for the King. Whereupon the sacred Secretary (who had foretold, that his Nativity would be the destruction of the Egyptians) , walked them to kill the Child, crying out with a loud Voice, to the King, after this manner : O King, this Child, by whose death God promisseth us Security hath already confirmed the Prophecy insinuating over thy Kingdom, and spurning thy Diadem : Take from the Egyptians that fear which they have conceived of him, by his death ; and from the Hebrews that hope which they build on his Courage and Life. But Thermuthis hastily conveyed him thence, and the King was not overforward to lay hands on him, by reason that God disposed all things in this manner, in that he had a care of Moses's Preservation. He was therefore very carefully brought up ; and by reason of him, the Hebrews in general were replenished with good hope ; but by the Egyptians, his Education both was suspected and grudging at ; yet by reason that if the Lad should have been slain, there was not any one, either African, or adopted, that could pretend to the Succession of the Crown of Egypt, they abstained from his slaughter. Being therefore thus born and brought up, when he increased in years, he evidently, by his Virtue, made it known unto the Egyptians, that he was born to abate their Pride, and to exalt the Hebrews, by this occasion which ensueth. A about them, spoiled and made pillage of all the Goods of the Egyptians ; who, incensed against them for the wrongs and injuries which they had done, levied an Army, intending to revenge them of that disgrace which their Enemies had offered them : but in the Battel they were all put to flight, so that many of them were slain ; and the rest shamefully flying, returned with ignominy worse than death, into their own Country. The Ethiopians proud with this good fortune, instantly pursued them : and supposing it a cowardly part, not to take the benefit of their present good fortune, and conceiving an assured hope of conquering Egypt, they enter'd the Country, and generally waited the same : and having tasted of the sweetness of pillage, without any temper or moderation in their Victory, they were encouraged to attempt greater matters. And whereas B they perceived, that having waited all the Neighbour-regions, no man durst fall out, to encounter them in Arms, they marched forward toward Memphis, even to the Sea, arriving near no City that had the heart, or durst make head against them. By which calamities, the Egyptians being much oppressed, they sent one to ask counsel of the Oracle, by what means they might redress their miseries ; and when an answer was given them, That they should choose an Hebrew to assist them in the Wars, the King commanded his Daughter to give them Moses ; who, together with the Empire, might govern the whole Army. She taking an Oath of the King, that no injury or violence should be offered him, delivered him into his hands ; esteeming it to be a great good fortune for Moses, that he was called to the succor of her Country : and, on the other side, blaming the Priests, C who were not ashamed to demand his aid and assistance, whom they had adjudged to be slain as their common Enemy. But Moses, exhorted by Thermuthis, and the King, willingly took the charge upon him. Whereat the Priests of both Nations were very joyful : for the Egyptians hoped, that when by his virtue and valor he had overcome their Enemies, they afterwards might more easily dispatch and murder him, by some treacherous and sinister means ; and the Hebrews conceived an hope, that they might get out of Egypt, by reason that Moses was the General of the Army. Moses therefore making haste, before such time as the Enemies had any notice that he was dislodged, he levied his Army, and conducted them, not along the Banks of the River, but through the main Land ; where, in he made manifest his most admirable prudence. For the journey by Land being very D dangerous, by reason of the multitude of Serpents (which the Country thereabouts breeds of all sorts, and some of that kind, that the like thereof are not seen in any other place, all different in malignity, and horrible form, and some winged ones, who not only offend those that they encounter on the earth very privily, but also tower very high in the Air, and hover about to hurt those that are not aware of them) he, for the security of his Army, and to the end he might march without any inconvenience, invented this marvellous and admirable stratagem : He caused two Paniers of Sedge to be made, in form of Coffers, and filled them with certain Birds called Ibis, who are mortal Enemies to Serpents, and before whom the Serpents flee ; and sometimes, in flying from them like Harts, they are laid hold of, and swallowed by them. Otherwife these Birds are mangled and made tame, and are not harmful to any but to Serpents : of whom I will now E cease to write any further, because the Greeks do already know what kind of Bird it is.

When therefore he arrived in the Country of Serpents, he let fire his Ibis against the venomous Beasts, and made use of them to encounter the other. And having marched in this sort, he surprized the Ethiopians, before they suspected him ; and suddenly charging them, he overcame them in Battel, spoiling them of the hope they had to conquer Egypt : and entering the Towns of Ethiopia, he razed them, and made a great slaughter of the Inhabitants. The Egyptian Army having tasted this happy success under the conduct of Moses, omitted not the pursuit ; especially, for that they saw that the Ethiopians were well nigh conquered, or rather wholly destroyed : and in the end having driven them even to Saba, the chief City of Ethiopia (which Cambyles called Meroe, for the love which he bore unto his sister, who was so called) they besieged them. The City was strong, and very hard to be assailed by reason of the River Nilus which environs it round about : on the other side, the Rivers of Asapus and Asaobara, flow in so fiercely, that they could neither break the course of the water, nor wade over the stream : for the City is built in an Island, environed with a strong wall round about, having great Ramparts betwixt the Rivers and the Walls built to resist the inundations of the waters ; by reason whereof, that the City could be very hardly taken, although the opposite Army had found means to pass the water. Now, when Moses was much troubled that his Army profited nothing, by reason that the Enemy durst not encounter them in open field, G he beheld what a chance happened : Tharbis, the Daughter of the King of Ethiopia, beholding Moses as he approached with his Army near the Walls of the City, and seeing how valiantly he fought, and behaved himself, and wondering at the Exploits and Enterprises which

which he made (which was the cause that the Egyptians, almost despairing of their estates and liberty, were grown desperate) and how the Ethiopians (not long before esteemed the Conquerors, and happy in their Warlike exploits and fortunate executions) were in the greatest extremity of danger, he was surprized with love of him, and for that his passion augmented more and more in her, he sent to him seven of her most faithful household servants, to offer him her love. Which he accepted, on condition that she should deliver the City into his hands; promising her, by a solemn Oath, That when he was Master thereof, he would take her to Wife, without falsifying, or breach of his promise. The matter was no sooner motioned, but the effect followed. Having conquered the Ethiopians, and given thanks to God for the Favors he had done him, Moses accomplished the Marriage, and sent the Egyptians back again into their Country. Who nevertheless conceived great hatred against him, the Author and Cause of their safety and victories; and began seriously to consult and advise amongst themselves, how they might destroy him; suspecting left by reason of the happy success he had had, should begin to think of making himself Master of Egypt. They accused him therefore of Murder before the King, who already of himself had him in suspicion, as well through the hatred he bore him for his noble carriage and courage, whilst he was General, as also through the fear he had conceived of the destruction of Egypt, foretold by his Priests, who incessantly incited him against Moses: so that the King was upon the point to lay hands on him, and murder him.

But he having intelligence of these practices, escaped, and fled secretly, flying from his presence through the Desert, by which the Enemies least suspected his flight; and although at no place in his journey he found victuals to sustain him, yet overcame he his penury by his patience. And arriving near a City of the Madians situate upon the shore of the Red Sea, that was named by one of Abraham, and Chetura's Sons, he sat him down near a Fountain, refreshing himself, and taking his ease after his laborious journey; for it was about Noon, and the City already appeared in his sight. In this place an occasion befel, by which he both gave proof his virtue, and found an opportunity to better his estate. For whereas the Region is much troubled with want of water, the Shepherds had a custom, to strive which of them should first possess the Pits, for fear lest the water would be quite consumed by others, before they and their Cattel had quenched their thirst. To this Fountain therefore there came seven Virgins, which were Daughters of Raguel, otherwise called Jethro, the Priest (whom the Inhabitants of that place held in great estimation) who had the charge to attend their Fathers flocks; for that is the exercise wherein the Troglodytes are wont to employ their Women. These hasted to draw sufficient water for their flocks into the Troughs, expressly made to receive the water; and when in the mean time the shepherds came and surprized them, and drove away the Virgins, to the end they might be Masters of the water, Moses judging it a shame to himself to suffer this outrage, drove away the shepherds, who would have enjoyed that which appertained not unto them, and gave a just assistance to the dismayed Maidens; who, as soon as they were returned into their Fathers presence, told him the outrage that was done them by the shepherds, and the help that they found by the hands of a stranger, beseeching him that the courtesie which he had shewn unto them, might not be forgotten, but that he might receive some token of gratitude. The Father commending his Daughters thankfulness towards their Benefactor, commanded them to bring Moses into his presence, to the end he might thank him according as he deserved. As soon as he was come, Raguel told him, That his Daughters had given him to understand, how kindly he had assisted them: and having his virtue in admiration, he said, that he had not adventured himself, nor done kindness to those that were without sense of the courtesies that were shewed unto them, but unto those who were capable to give him thanks; yea, so ready to requite him, that the greatness of their requital should far surpass the measure of his humanity. He therefore adopted him for his Son, and gave him his Daughter Zephora to Wife, and made him Superintendent and Master of the flocks (in which, in those days, the wealth and riches of most Nations consisted.) Moses having obtained this good fortune at Jethro's hands (for such was Raguel's Sirname) he abode there with him and attended his flocks. But not long after he led his Cattel to graze near the Mountain Sinai, which is the highest of all those that are in that quarter, and good for Pasturage, by reason of the wholsome Herbs that grow thereabouts: which notwithstanding was not fed upon before that time, because the shepherds durst not frequent it, in regard of an opinion of those that dwell in that Country, That God inhabited that Mountain. There hapned there unto him a marvellous Prodigy, which was, that a flame of fire seemed round about him in a Bull, without offending either the green Herbs, or the Flowers, or the Boughs charged with fruit, although the flames were great and vehement. He, not a little

A little amazed at this unexpected spectacle, at last grew more and more so, when he heard a voice issuing out of the fire, which called him by his name; charging him with boldness, in that he was not afraid to tread upon that ground, which hitherto had been frequented by no Man; bidding him to depart afar off from the flame, and content himself with that vision; for although that he was a virtuous Man, yet that he ought not to be curious to make further search into the same. The same voice also told him, That the honour and glory which he obtained amongst Men, was by the assistance of God; charging him to be of a good courage, and to repair into Egypt, for in that place he should be Captain and Guide of the Hebrew Nation, and should deliver the People which were there, from the outrage and servitude which they suffered. For (said the voice) they shall inhabit that happy Country wherein your Father Abraham dwelt, and they shall enjoy all sorts of blessings, under the conduct of thee and thy prudence. Moreover, he commanded him, That having brought the Hebrews out of Egypt, he should offer sacrifice of Thanksgiving, at such time as he should arrive again in that place. And such was the Oracle which he received out of the flame. Moses altogether ravished at that which he had both heard and seen, spake thus: O Lord, it were madness in me, and no prudence, if I should distrust thy power, which I reverence, and which I know hath been manifested unto my Predecessors; notwithstanding, I stand in doubt, how I, who am a Man of no eloquence, and of less force, should persuade my Brethren, by my words, to forsake the Country wherein they inhabit, to follow me into that Country whither I will conduct them. And although they should be persuaded, how can I force Pharaoh to permit them to depart from thence, by whose labours and travels the Egyptians are daily increased in goods and riches? Whereupon God commanded him to trust in his assistance, and to be of good courage, and promised that if he had need of eloquence, he would bestow upon him the faculty of persuasion; or if he were driven to act any thing, that he would redouble his forces: commanding, That in confirmation of those promises he had made him, he should let fall his staff upon the ground: which having done, a Dragon began to creep upon the ground, and in turning and rowling himself, lifted up his Crest on high, making semblance, to defend himself against those that should assail him, and then a little while after became a staff again. Afterwards he commanded him to put his hand into his bosom, and no sooner had he obeyed, but he drew it out altogether white, and in colour resembling Chalk: and a little while after, it recovered its ordinary colour. Moreover, he further willed him to draw water out of the next Well, and to pour it on the ground, and he saw it turned into a bloody colour. Amazed at these accidents, he was commanded to be of good courage, and assured that he should have great assistance. Moreover, that he should use these signs before all Men, to the end (saith God) that all may believe, that being sent by me, thou doest all this according to my Commandment. Furthermore, I enjoy thee, That without any further delay, thou haste into Egypt; and that thou travel day and night, without losing time, without delaying any more, to succour the poor Hebrews, grievously afflicted in Egypt. Moses having no cause to distrust that which God had promised him, and being confirmed by these things, whereof he was both an eye-witness and hearer, he prayed God, that if there were any occasion to express the like power in Egypt, he would vouchsafe to further the effect: beseeching him further, that he would not conceal his name from him, to whom he had participated the hearing of his voice, and the sight of his presence: that it might please him therefore to declare unto him his name, to the end, that when he should offer sacrifice unto him, he might call upon the same. God declared unto him his name, which before time had been concealed amongst Men, and of which also it is not lawful for me to speak. Moses wrought these signs not only at that time, but also when or wheresoever he thought it requisite: by all which he gave further credit to the fire which had appeared unto him, and assured himself, that God would be his favourable Defender, that he would deliver his Brethren, and involve the Egyptians in great calamities. And after that he understood, that Pharaoh King of Egypt was dead (during whose life, he fled from thence) he requested Raguel, to give him leave to depart into Egypt, for the profit of those of his Nation; and taking with him Sephora (who was Raguel's Daughter, and his married Wife) and Geson and Eleazar, his Children, which he had by her; he departed into Egypt. Now this name of Geson, in the Hebrew Tongue, signifieth Foreign; and Eleazar signifieth favoured by God; in memory, that Moses had escaped from amongst the Egyptians, by the assistance of the God of his Fathers. And as he approached near the Mountains, Aaron, his Brother, by the commandment of God, came forth to meet him; to whom he declared all that had hapned unto him in the Mountain, and that God had given him in charge. And as they gathered onward of their way, the Men of great estimation amongst the Hebrews (having intelligence of his coming) came out to meet him, before whom Moses made use of the above-

above said power of doing Miracles, by reason he could not perfwade them by words: II and they being astonish'd at that which they had seen him do beyond their expectation, grew confident, and conceived a good hope of all things, seeing that God had a care of their safety. When he perceived that the Hebrews were ready to obey him, and that they protect'd to follow him in all that he should command them, through the earnest desire they had to be at liberty; he presented himself before the King, who had newly undertaken the Government, and shew'd him the great benefits he had done unto the Egyptians, at such time as they were defiled by the Ethiopians, who had spoiled all their Country, and how he had spared no travel, but sustained all the charge of the War, as if it had been waged for his own proper Nation. On the other side, he opened unto him the dangers which he had unjustly suffered for his recompence. He afterwards discour- sed unto him that which had befallen him near the Fountain of Sini, and the talk which God had in that place with him; and the signs in particular which had been shew'd unto him, in confirmation of those things which were promis'd, exhorting the King not to mis- trust or resist the Will of God. The King hearing this, began to mock him: but Moses made him see, in effect, the signs which he had shew'd near the Mountain of Sini. But the King, instead of being mov'd therewith, waxed angry, and grievously reviled him; accusing him, for that in times past he fled away, for fear to be slain in Egypt; and at this present returned thither, under a subtle pretext, cloaking his Craft with Magick and In- chantment, the more to afflict him. And at the same instant he called into his presence the Priests of Egypt, to let him see those signs, and to make it manifest, that the Egyptians were skill'd in those Sciences; and that he alone was not Master in those things, the which he boasted to perform by Gods power, but that they were deceits and shadows of marvels, to deceive the multitude. Whereupon the Priests cast down their Rods, and they became Serpents. Moses being moved herewith, said, O King, I despise not the wisdom of the Egyptians; but I protest, that that which I have done, doth so far surpass all their Magick and Art, as there is difference between divine and humane things. I will therefore shew you, that that which I do, is not by Inchantment, nor with a false appearance of verity, but by the providence and power of God. This said, he cast his Rod on the ground, command- ing it to change it self into a Serpent: whereupon it obeyed, and wandering here and there, it devoured all the Rods of the Egyptians, which seemed to be so many Serpents; and that done, Moses took his staff into his hand again, and it reasum'd its pristine form; but the King being never the more astonish'd (but the rather incens'd at that which was done) said, That this wisdom and subtilty of Moses, which he us'd in disgrace of the Egyptians, should profit him nothing. He commanded therefore the Overseer of the Works, who had the Government of the Hebrews, that he should remit nothing of their labour, but that he should oppress them with more tedious and grievous tasks than they were wont to be put unto: whereupon (where he was wont to allow them straw, to make their Tyle with) he forbore, after that time, to give them that allowance; and taxing them in the day-time to follow their work, he appointed them by night to seek their straw, doubling thereby the weight of their former Labour. Notwithstanding all this, Moses would neither desist from his purpose, in regard of the Kings threatening, or the continual cry of his Countrymen, neither was he in any sort dismay'd thereat; but with a confident and undaunted mind, he resolutely proceeded to restore his Country- men to their desired liberty. He therefore once again address'd to the King, perswading him to dismiss the Hebrews, to the end they might repair to Mount Sini, and sacrifice to God in that place: For no less (saith he) hath he commanded, neither can any resist his Will. That whilst God was yet favourable to him, his own interest oblig'd him to grant as the people the liberty which he demanded. That if he deny'd the same, he could not accuse him as the cause of the Calamities which he should draw upon himself by his disobedience, when he should see himself without Children, the Air, Earth, and all the other Elements become Enemies to him, and Ministers of the Divine Vengeance. That nevertheless the people of the Hebrews should (in despite of their resistance) depart out of their Country; but the Egyptians should not es- cape the punishment of their hardness of heart. The King despised these words of Moses, and would not be prevailed upon, wherefore most grievous Plagues fell upon the Land of Egypt; all which I will particularly set down, by reason that at that time the Egyptians suf- fered those things, which never before hapn'd to any other People; and likewise that I may manifest, that Moses erred not in any of his Predictions: and besides, for that it is expedient for Men to learn and do those things which are agreeable to Gods Will, for fear lest he being provoked and incens'd against them, should punish them for their in- justice. For first of all, by the commandment of God, the River of Nilus was turn'd into Blood, neither was it impossible for them to drink of it (notwithstanding they had no other Fountain of water) neither was the water only coloured like blood, but when

A any one drank thereof, it caus'd in him divers pains and gripings. Such was the water to the Egyptians, but to the Hebrews it seem'd good and sweet in taste, without any ways changing the Nature thereof. Hereupon the King (not knowing, what to do, and seeing this strange accident, and being afraid, in behalf of his Subjects) permitted the Hebrews to depart. But no sooner was this Plague ceased, but he presently changed his Mind, and would not permit them liberty to go away. For which cause, God (see- ing his Ingratitude, and that he would not be warn'd, notwithstanding he had delivered him from the former Calamity) inflict'd another Plague upon the Egyptians. He sent an infinite number of Frogs among them, which cover'd the whole Country; and the River was so stor'd with them, that they that drew water to drink, found it altogether infected with the Putrefaction of them, dying and rotting in the waters; so that the whole Country was full of filthy Mud, by reason of the Frogs that dyed on the same. They corrupted also their Meats, entering into their Houses, amidst their Meat and Drink, and creeping in their Chambers; from whence an odious stench exhale'd, by reason of the multitude of Frogs that lay dead. Now when the Egyptians saw themselves so sore press'd with these Evils, the King commanded Moses to depart with the Hebrews, whither he pleas'd. And as soon as he had spoken this, the multitude of Frogs vanish'd, and appear'd no more, neither on the Earth, nor in the Water, but they retained their ac- customed Nature. No sooner was the Earth delivered from this Curse, but Pharaoh forgot the cause thereof, and retained the Hebrews still: and (as if he desir'd to experiment yet greater Miseries) he denied them that Liberty which before he had granted them, ra- ther out of fear than good will. For this cause, God once again punish'd his fallhood, by sending him another Plague: for a multitude of Lice swarmed on the bodies of the Egyptians, by which the poor men were miserably devoured; neither could they exter- minate that Race either by Bathings or Unctions. The King troubled with this Calami- ty, and fearing the ruin of his People, and bethinking him of the shameful end there- of, was constrain'd to permit the People to depart: but (after the Plague was appeas'd) he required, that they should leave their Wives and Children behind them for Pedgels, till they return: and by this means he provoked God's Wrath more heavily against him, in that he supposed to delude his Providence, as if it had not been God, who (in the Hebrews behalf) had punish'd them, but Moses, that had plagued the Egyp- tians. For God fill'd their Country with divers sorts of Insects: (the like whereof, before that time, had not been seen there) which cover'd the Earth, that it became deso- late and untill'd, and many Persons dy'd by them; and those that remain'd alive, they were infected with the Poyson exhaling from the number of dead and sick Bodies. But notwithstanding all these, the King still continued obstinate in his Wickedness, and Dis- obedience unto God; permitting only, that the Women and Men should depart, and that their Children should be left behind them; but God desist'd not to punish his Wicked- nels by divers most grievous Plagues, far more tedious than the former, yea, such as were dispers'd over all the People.

F For their Bodies were grievously tormented with Ulcers, and corrupted inwardly; and after this sort, the greater part of the Egyptians perished. But the King being not melt- ed, nor mollified by this Plague. God rained down Hail upon them (which never before that time was seen in Egypt; and further so great, or rather greater than that which fall- eth to the Northward, near the Pole Artique) though it was a considerable time of Spring, and spoiled all their Fruit. After which, an Army of Grasshoppers devoured all those Buds and Fruits which were unhurt by the Hail; so that all the hope which the Egyptians had of their Harvest, was utterly overthrow'n. These Afflictions had been suf- ficient to perswade a man of the meanest Wit (except a Reprobate) to grow wise, and make use of that which was most profitable for him. But Pharaoh knowing the cause of the same, enforced himself to resist God, not only through Imprudence, but Malice; so that he voluntarily destroy'd his poor Subjects. He therefore commanded Moses, to lead away the Hebrews with their Wives; but that they should leave their Substance behind them for a Prey to the Egyptians, to recompense them for what they had lost. Moses answer'd, That he demanded an unjust thing, since that hereby they would not have wherewith to offer Sacrifice to God. Now while the time pass'd in these Consultations, a most dismal darkness overpread the Land of Egypt, by reason of which, many perish'd after sundry manners, and others fear'd to run the same fate, living in the most disconsolate condition imaginable. This darkness being dispers'd, after three days, and so many nights, Moses seeing that Pharaoh would not repent, nor let the People of Israel depart, came unto him, and spake after this manner: As long as you shall resist the Ordinance of God (who commandeth you to suffer the Hebrews to depart) there is no means, whereby you may be exempted from these mischiefs in doing that which you do. The King, enraged at these words, threatn'd threatened him to cut off his Head; if once more he durst appear in his Presence, to motion to him any such matter. Moses answered him, That he would no more speak unto him touching this matter; but that shortly both himself, and the chiefest amongst the Egyptians, would entreat him and the Hebrews to depart; which said, he forsook his Presence. But God intending to express that he meant yet once more to plague the Egyptians, and to constrain them to deliver the Hebrews, commanded Moses to declare unto the People that they should have their Sacrifice in a readines, on the thirteenth day of the Month Xanthicus, to celebrate the same the fourteenth of the said Month (by the Egyptians called Pharmuth, and by the Hebrews Nisan, and Xanthicus by the Medians;) and that he should lead forth all the Hebrews, carrying with them all their Goods. Whereupon he who had the Hebrews already in a readines to depart, and had distributed them by Families, kept them in one place, and in the same order; but when the fourteenth day was come, all of them (ready to depart) offer'd Sacrifice, and with the blood of the Lamb purged their Houses, besprinkling them with branches of Hyslop. And after they had sup'd, they burnt the flesh that remained, as being at the point to depart. Whereupon even at this day we retain the said Custom to sacrifice in like sort, and do call this Solemnity Pascha, which is as much as to say, the passage; by reason that on that day God leaving and overpassing the Hebrews without harm, struck the Egyptians with sickness; for a Plague in the night-time cut off all the first begotten in Egypt; whereupon Multitudes that dwelt round about the Palace, assembled themselves in the Presence of the King, and besought him to let the Hebrews go: for which cause Pharaoh calling Moses, K gave order that they should depart the Countrey, supposing that as soon as they were gone, Egypt would be no more afflicted with such like Plagues. Moreover, they honoured the Hebrews with Presents, partly to the end they should depart with the more expedition, partly for the Neighborhood and Acquaintance sake which they had one with another. And as they departed, the Egyptians wept, and repented them of the evil usage they had shewed them; but they took their way towards Latopolis, at that time desert, and in which place afterwards Babylon was built, at such time as Cambyses destroyed Egypt. The third day they came unto Beelzephon near the Red Sea; and for that they wanted Victuals in this Desert, they tempered their Meal with Water, and kneaded it as well as they could, and bak'd Cakes, with which they sustained themselves for the space of thirty days; for they had brought no more Provision out of Egypt, than enough to serve them for that time; at the end of which they were in want of Food, although they had liv'd very sparingly, rather feeding for Necessity, than eating to Satiety. For which cause, in Memory of that want, we celebrate a Feast for the space of eight days, which we call the Feast of Azymes, that is to say, of unleavened bread. But it is not easie to number the Multitude of them that came out of Egypt, if we consider the Women and Children; but those that were of full Age, and fit to bear Arms, were in number six hundred thousand.

CHAP. VI.

The Hebrews depart out of Egypt, under the conduct of Moses.

The year of the World, 2454. before Christ's Nativity, 1876.

THUS the Israelites departed out of Egypt the 14 day of the month Xanthicus, 430 years after Abraham our Father came into Canaan, and in the 215 year after Jacob went down into Egypt, and in the eightieth year of Moses Age, who had Aaron to his Brother, three years elder than himself; they carried also with them the Bones of Joseph, according as he had commanded his Sons. But the Egyptians repented that they had suffer'd the Hebrews to depart: The King also was very much mov'd; supposing, that which was fallen upon them, had hapned by Moses's Enchantments; and it was concluded to pursue them. They therefore arm'd, and furnish'd themselves with all their abilitiments of War, intending to pursue them, with the intent to bring them back, if they overtook them; for they said, that God would no more be displeas'd against them, for that already they had given them leave to depart. They hoped likewise very easily to bring them under subjection, because they were all of them disarm'd, and wearied with Travel. And having inquir'd which way they held, they hasted to follow them, although they knew the Region was very hard to Travel in; not only for those that were to march in Troops, but also for those that were to journey one by one. Now Moses conducted them this way, to the end, that if the Egyptians should repent of their dismissal, and hasten to pursue them, they might receive the reward of their wickedness, and the breach of their promise. He chose this way likewise, least the Philistines should understand their departure, by reason they were displeas'd against the Hebrews, upon an ancient grudge which they bear them; and Palestine confines and borders upon Egypt: Wherefore he led them not by the way that directly leadeth thither, but he intended to bring them into Canaan, by conducting them far about, and thorow many calamities; to the end, that afterwards he might lead them to Mount Sina, there to offer Sacrifice, according to Gods commandment. As soon as the Egyptians overtook the Israelites, they prepar'd themselves to fight, trusting to the number which they had: For with them, there served 600 Chariots, with 50000 Horsemen, and 200000 armed Footmen. They also stopp'd the passages where they thought the Hebrews might escape, enclosing them betwixt unaccessiblerocks, and the Sea: On which place there abutted a Mountain, unfrequented, by reason of the dangerousness of the way; and by this means they excluded them from all hope of escape, or flight: For on the one side they were shut in by the Mountain, that extended it self even to the Sea: And on the other side, by their Camp, pitched and embattell'd before their faces, to cut them off from the Champion, if so be they intended to flee that way. Seeing therefore that they were in no security, but were hemmed in by the straitness of the place, and by reason of want of provision, could not endure a siege, nor yet find any ways to flee from their Enemies; neither, although they greatly desir'd to fight, had they means to defend themselves, because they were disarm'd. Finally, perceiving that there was no hope of safety left them, but only by their abject submission, they began to accuse Moses; forgetting those Prodiges which God had done to set them at liberty: And their incredulity proceeded so far, that they were upon the point to stone Moses, and voluntarily to yield themselves subject to their former Thralldom. For they were much mov'd by the Tears of their Wives and Children, who expected nothing but death, seeing themselves begirt with Rocks, Seas, and Soldiers, and left destitute of all hope of flight. But although the multitude were exasperated against Moses, yet ceased he not to take care of them, and to have recourse to God; recounting to them what he had said in times past, touching their deliverance; and assuring them, that after so many Miracles, God would not suffer them to be subjected or overthrown by their Enemies. And standing up in the midst of them, he said, If your affairs had hitherto been managed by Men only, it were not amiss in you to distrust them, lest hereafter they should not bring them to their determined and your desired issue. But in that at this time you distrust the Providence of God, this sheweth you to be without sense, or understanding; considering it is he that hath made you see all those things which be promised you by me, concerning your deliverance, even at that time when you your selves expected it not: You rather ought to hope, that God will help and assist you in these difficulties, who hath brought you to pass, that you are now in this strait, to the end that when he shall have delivered you from these extremities, from which neither you your selves, nor your Enemies suppose you can escape, he may shew his power and Providence in your behalf: For God is not accustomed to yield his favourable assistance, when the dangers are only easie and supportable, but in those wherein all human hope is lost and extinct. Therefore rest your selves, G your fortunes upon such a Helper, who can make great things small, and the strongest feeble. Fear not the force and power of the Egyptians; and though you have the Sea and Mountains before you, which permit you not to flee from them, despair not of your lives: For God (if he please) can turn the Mountains into Plains, and change the Sea into dry Land.

THIS said, he conducted the Hebrews towards the Sea, in the sight of the Egyptians; who being very much wearied with pursuit and travel, thought best to forbear the Combat till the next day. But when Moses was arriv'd upon the bank of the Sea, he took his Rod, and called upon God, and improv'd his aid and succor in these words: O Lord, Thou too well knowest, that it is impossible for us by human force or policy, to escape these extremities: But thou art he only that canst save this company, who have forsaken Egypt, following thy Commandment. And since of our selves we have not any hope or means, we only recommend our selves unto thy Providence, being assur'd that by that means only we can be delivered from the pursuit and fury of the Egyptians: Send us therefore speedily thine assistance, to the end that thy Power may be known in our weakness. Relieve, encourage and hearten thy People, assuring them of their safety, who through their distrust have sinned against thee: We are environed with difficulties, which notwithstanding thou canst make easie, For the Sea is thine, and this Mountain that incloseth us; which shall open, and the Sea divide it self, if thou commandest. We may likewise see thorow the Air, if it please thy Power to deliver us in that manner, Having made this Request unto God after this manner, he strook the Red Sea with his Rod; which suddenly dividing it self at the stroke, and retiring backwards, left a dry K passage thorow the midst thereof, for the Hebrews to escape, Moses seeing how God had heard his Prayers, and how the Sea had left its Channel, he first of all entered into the same, and commanded the Hebrews to follow him, marching thorow that way, which God had by his Divine Power provided for them, willing them to rejoyce at the danger which attended their Enemies, and to give God thanks for the unexpected succors he had sent them: Whereupon they were not negligent, but marched boldly forward. At first, the Egyptians supposed them mad, and that they cast themselves headlong into manifest perdition: But when they perceiv'd that they were enter'd a good way without hurt, and that they encounter'd no danger or let, they dislodg'd, and follow'd them, believing the Sea would have given them passage also; and having set their Horse in the Vanguard, L they entered into the Sea. But the Egyptians having spent some time in arming themselves, the Hebrews in the mean while got to the opposite shore, without any disturbance; which made their Enemies more bold, supposing that no evil should happen unto them. But they knew not that God had made this path expressly for the Hebrews; but enter'd the same, as if it had been a common beaten way, forgetting that it was made to save the Hebrews from danger, and not themselves, who sought to destroy them. But as soon as all the Egyptians Army was enter'd, the Sea returned to his old course, and with winds and waves overwhelmed the Egyptians. The showres from Heaven fell upon them, vehement Thunders rattled from the Air, intermixt with flashings and lightnings. In brief, there was nothing that by the wrath of God could be inflicted upon men, which at that time hapned not unto them. For besides all that which hath been spoken, an obscure and dark Night surpris'd them, in such sort, as they were all of them drowned, and there remained not one of them to bear back the tydings of their misfortune. The Hebrews could not contain themselves, for the joy they conceiv'd at this their unexpected deliverance, and the total ruin of their Enemies: when they saw that they who design'd to make them slaves again per force, were exterminated, and that God had been so visibly assistant unto them. When they had escap'd this danger, and perceived that their Enemies were punished after such a manner, as the like punishment had never been heard of amongst Men; they all of them, during the whole Night, sung Hymns and Songs of Thanksgiving. Moses likewise compos'd a Song in Verse, containing the Praises of God, and a Thanksgiving for the favour he had done unto them. All these things have I particularly declared, according as I have found them written in Holy Scriptures. Neither ought any man to marvel at this so wonderful a Discourse, that thorow the Sea there should be a passage found, to save so many persons in times past, and they rude and simple, whether it were done by the Will of God, or it chanced of it self; since not long time ago, God so thinking it good, the Sea of Pamphylia divideth it self, to give way to Alexander the King of Macedon's Soldiers, having no other passage to destroy the Empire of the Persians. The next day the Egyptians Arms, carried by force of the Stream, were cast ashore where the Army of the Hebrews was encamped, which when Moses perceiv'd that it was done by the Providence of God, to the intent they might not be disarmed, he gather'd them together, and furnished the Hebrews therewith; and afterwards led them to Mount Sinai to Sacrifice to God, and to give him thanks for their deliverance, in the behalf of the People, according as he himself had before commanded.

How Moses conducted the People out of Egypt to Mount Sinai.

THE joy which the Israelites had to see themselves thus deliver'd by the help of Almighty God, was not a little diminish'd, by the weariness and tediousness of the difficulties which they endured in their travel towards the Mountain of Sinai: by reason that the Country was a Desert, and uninhabitable, destitute of Victuals and Water; and not only barren of what serves for the sustenance of Men, but also every where wanting Pasturage and Provision for Cattel: so that they were constrain'd to bear with them the water which they had drawn before they enter'd the Desert, according as their Captain and Conductor had commanded them: which being spent, they dig'd Pits, out of which they drew water with great difficulty, by reason of the hardness of the ground: and further, the water which they found in those places was bitter, and no ways fit to drink; E and, which was worse, very little in quantity. Travelling onwards of their Journey after this manner a long time, they arriv'd about Evening in a Certain place, which by reason the waters were brackish, they called Marah, that is to say, Bitterness. There, wearied with Travel, and their Provision failing them, they began to be pinch'd with necessity, so that they resolv'd to stay in that place; and the rather, in that they found a certain Pit there, which although it were sufficient to satisfy so great an Army, yet for that they found it in that Country, it yielded them no little consolation. For they were given to understand, that if they travelled onwards, they should find no water; and for the water of that Pit, it was so bitter and unfit for drinking, that it neither was agreeable to the taste, nor supportable for their very Cattel. Whereupon Moses seeing F them so discomfited, and not knowing how to satisfy them, in that he had not to deal with an Army or Enemy, whom he might repel with Valour; but that hunger and thirst alone reduc'd all this great multitude of Men, Women and Children, to great distress; he was greatly perplex'd, and resented in himself the calamity of them all, as if it had been all his own: for all of them had their recourse unto him, and to no Man else; the Women beg'd for their Children, and the Husbands intreated for their Wives, beseeching him to take compassion of their distress, and to furnish them with some means to escape their Misery. He address'd himself therefore in most humble manner to Almighty God, praying that it would please him to amend the evil quality of the water, and to make it potable. Which grace and favour he no sooner obtain'd, but he took a G piece of Wood, which he cleft in two, and cast into the Pit: giving the Hebrews to understand, that God had heard their Prayers, and that he had promis'd to give them the water they desir'd, if so be they would obey him, and with alacrity and diligence perform form that which should be commanded them. And when they were inquisitive what H they ought to do, to the intent the water might be changed; he enjoined every one of them that was of best strength and ability amongst them, to draw water; giving them to understand, that so soon as they had drawn out great store of water from the Pit, the rest that should remain, would be very good and convenient to be drunk. They obey'd, and the water agitated and purg'd by, often drawing, became potable, and refresh'd the weary Multitude. Whereupon dislodging from that place, they came to Helim, a Country that afar off seem'd very pleasant, by reason that it was planted with Palm-trees: but the nearer they approached it, the more tedious they found it (for there were no more than Seventy Palm-Trees in that place, and they not very tall, or well-grown, by reason of the diness and barrenness of the Soils.) They found also twelve Springs I there, which were so small, that they did not flow, but only drop. Whereupon falling to dig up the Sand, they could light of no Veins of water; and if perhaps any little appear'd, it was so troubled by the Sand, that it became unfit to be tasted: neither did the Trees bear any store of Fruit, by reason of the want of water. For which cause, the whole Multitude began to murmur against their Guide, ascribing all the cause of their Calamities and Miseries unto him. For having marched for the space of thirty days, they had consum'd all the Provision which they brought with them; and conceiving that there was no remedy, they were wholly overwhelm'd with despair. Considering therefore only the evil which was before their Eyes, and forgetting the Marvels which K God, by the Ministry of Moses, had made them both see and partake, they conceiv'd In-dignation against him, and were ready to stone him to death, as if he had been the Author of that Calamity which oppress'd them. But he perceiving the Multitude to enrag'd, and incens'd against him, strengthened himself in God; and warranted by the testimony of a good Conscience, and the uprightness of his Actions, he came out into the midst of those who revild him, and had gather'd Stones to cast at him. And for that he was adorn'd with a singular Grace and majestic Countenance, and endued with pleasing Eloquence, he began to appeale their Wrath; exhorting them to bear their present Difficulties, by remembering their forepassed blessings; and not to permit the Travel which they endur'd at that time, to drive out of their remembrance the Graces and Favours which they had receiv'd at God's Hands. He willed them likewise diligently to expect their deliverance L from that Extremity, by the Providence of God, who (as it seem'd) made trial of their Patience and Gratitude; or whether they kept in remembrance those things which had hapned unto them; or whether forgetting their forepassed Pleasures, they would suffer themselves to be swallowed with their present Misery. He willed them therefore to take heed, lest through their Impatience and Ingratitude, they should be found unworthy of God's favour, if they neglected his Will, by whose direction they were brought out of Egypt, and threatned and hated him, who was God's Minister; especially since hitherto they could no ways complain of him in any thing which he had undertaken to execute by the Commandment of God. Then reckon'd he up particularly unto them, how the M Egyptians were plagued and destroyed, whilst contrary to God's Will, they endeavour'd to detain them: how the same River, which of it self was bloody and unprofitable to drink of, to themselves became both sweet and potable: likewise, how the Sea retir'd it self, and further'd both their flight and passage, wherein they saw themselves secure and free from danger; and contrariwise, their Enemies destroy'd, overthrown and drowned: and how, even until that day, being disarm'd, they were by God's Providence both furnisht and fortified abundantly. Moreover, how often God had deliver'd them from apparent death and danger, besides all Mens Opinion; who always Omnipotent, gave them at that time not the least cause to despair of his assistance. For which cause, they ought to suffer all things patiently, and to imagine with themselves, that the success, although deferred, was never too late, which was receiv'd before such time as the danger N had prevail'd: and so to think, that God condemn'd not their Perils, but made trial of their Fortitude and Constancy, to see whether they were able and willing to endure the want of Meat and Drink; or rather, whether after the manner of brute Beasts, they had rather return to the yoke of servitude, to be fed only to be made the better able to endure labour. As for himself, he nothing fear'd his Life (because that being unjustly slain, no evil could happen unto him) but that he was careful of their safety, left lifting up their hands to stone him, they should oppose themselves against God and his Commands. Thus pacifi'd he them, and allwag'd the fury they had conceiv'd to endanger his Life; and so much prevail'd he, that they repented of that Enterprize whereby they sought to destroy him. And for that he knew that they had some reason to be thus mov'd, O address'd himself to Prayer and Supplication; and ascending a certain Rock, he desir'd God's help to relieve their Infirmities, Wants and Affliction (in whose hands only the Salvation

A of the People consist'd;) beseeching him in Mercy to forgive the People, being exasperated with extreme Miseries, and by reason thereof distracted and withdrawn from their duty. Whereupon God promis'd him to have care of the People; promising him to send them a speedy and present deliverance. Which when Moses understood, he came down to the Multitude; who perceiving Joy in his Countenance, by reason of those Promises which he had receiv'd from God, exchang'd their doleful Lamentations into Gladness.
He therefore standing up in the midst of them, told them; that he brought unto them a most speedy Remedy for their Necessity. And not long after, a number of Quails (which about the gulf of Arabia multiply and encrease more than any sort of Birds) flew cross the Sea; and being wearied in their flight, came and fell amidst the Camp of the B Hebrews, who caught them, as a Provision prepar'd for them by God, and sent to relieve their Famine, Whereupon Moses once more address'd himself to call upon God, yielding him thanks for the present and future good he had promis'd him. The People being after this manner fed and refresh'd, were soon after supplied with a new kind of Food. For as Moses stretch'd out his hands, and pray'd to God, a dew descend'd from Heaven, which thickned betwixt his hands: and for that he suppos'd it to be another kind of sustenance sent them by God, he tasted the same, and found it very pleasant.
Then address'd to the People, who know not what it was, but thought it to be Snow which fell in that place, according to the season of the year, he told them, that it was no ordinary dew falling from Heaven, as they suppos'd, but that God had sent it them; for C the Preservation and Nourishment of their Bodies: and having eaten thereof before them, he gave them of it, to the end he might strengthen their belief; who tasting the same in like manner as he had done, were greatly refresh'd with the sustenance; for in Sweetness and Pleasure, it equal'd Honey; in Odor, Bellium; and in Form and Greatness the Grain of Coriander: whereupon every one gather'd of it. And Moses commanded that every one of them should particularly gather every day but the measure of an As-saron, which is the tenth part of an Epha; which was done, lest the weaker should want, whilst the stronger, through avarice, gather'd more than suffic'd them. And if any one, contrary to the command, gather'd more than was permitted, although he toil'd and travelled more than any of them, yet was his Portion no ways encreas'd by that means.
D For whatsoever (beside the appointed measure of the Assaron) remained till the next Morning, was of no value, but became bitter and full of Worms. So divine and admirable was this kind of Food, and of that nature, that who so had sufficient thereof, needed no sort of Sustenance. Moreover, even in those our days, there falls in that Country a dew like that, which God, in favour of Moses, sent for the Peoples Sustenance. The Hebrews call it Manna; for in our Tongue, Man is an Interrogation, signifying, What is that? Thus liv'd they joyfully, being sustain'd by this kind of Meat sent them from Heaven, and us'd the same for the space of forty years, during the time they were in the Desert.
But afterwards when they were dislodg'd from that place, and encamped near to Raphidim, they were extremely troubled with Thirst; for upon their first arrival, they found E some few Springs, but afterwards they found the Land wholly destitute of Water. They therefore once more were incens'd against Moses. But he withdrawing himself apart from the fury of the People, betook himself to God in Prayer; beseeching him, that as he had given them Food in their Necessity, he would now also give them Drink, since they were ready to perish with Thirst; and praying him to provide them Drink also, otherwise their Meat was unprofitable to them. God presently granted his Prayer; promising Moses, that he would give him a Fountain, and abundance of Water from that place from whence he least expected it. To which end, he commanded him to strike with his Rod the Rock which was there hard by, and promis'd to make the water come forth immediately, so that the People should have sufficient without taking pains to F seek for it. Which command when Moses had receiv'd, he return'd to the People, who expected him, and had their Eyes fix'd upon him, with great impatience, as he descend'd from the Rock; where he had made his Prayer. No sooner was he arriv'd, but he told them that God would deliver them from the necessity wherein they were, and would graciously grant them an unexpected relief, by causing a stream suddenly to break from that Rock. But they being amaz'd at that which they heard, and doubting, lest tyred with Thirst, and spent with Journeys, they should be enforced to hew and cleave the Rock; Moses struck the same in such sort with his Rod, that it divided asunder, and there issu'd out most clear and pure water in great abundance. The People were greatly astonish'd at this so strange accident, and no less rejoiced. They fell to drink of the Water, and G found it very sweet and pleasant, as being a miraculous Water, and a Present of the Goodness, Divine Bounty and Power of God. For this cause they highly esteem'd Moses, seeing that God had honour'd him in this sort; and they acknowledged God's Providence,

C H A P. II.

How the Amalekites and their Associates were overcome, and how great a Prey the Israelites obtained thereby.

BUT when the Renown of the Hebrews was become great, and spread abroad in all parts, it came to pass, that the Neighbouring Nations were in very great fear of them : whereupon (sending Ambassadors the one unto the other) they mutually con-spir'd to expel, and, if possible, utterly extirpate the whole People.

Amongst the rest, those of the Country of Cobol, and the City Petra, who are call'd Amalekites (a Nation very Warlike, and more active than the rest) were the chief Agents in this Expedition : whose Kings both encourag'd one another, and stir'd up the Neighbour Nations to the Israelites destruction, telling them, that a Foreign Army, flying from the Thraldom of the Egyptians, had invaded their Country, whose multitudes were not a little to be suspected ; counselling them (before they had gather'd head, and recover'd more means, and a Country to dwell in, and grew more confident, by their forbearance) to charge them first, rather than to expect their increase, and so to K oppress them ; esteeming it a better point of Wisdom, to repress their Insolency and Forwardness in the Desert, than to expect whilst they were possess'd of strong and rich Cities. For this (said they) is the part of wise men, to resist the beginnings of power of their Adversaries, and not to expect, till by daily Exploits they more and more increase ; and rather to provide to prevent, than deliver themselves from Peril. After these Ambassadors, it was decreed by general Council, That they should endeavour to invade and assault the Hebrews. These determinations and designs of theirs, troubled

Moses very much, for that he expected no Hostility. When therefore he perceiv'd that the People were affrighted and amaz'd, to see themselves (being wholly unprovided) to be charg'd by so strong and well furnish'd an Army, he re-comforted them, and will'd E them to bethink themselves of God's Promises, who by his Power had set them at Liberty ; assuring them, that they should overcome all those that were made head against them, to destroy them ; wishing them to think, that though they were inferior to their Enemies in Weapons, Wealth and Munition, and the like ; yet since they had God to their friend, and ready to fight for them against their Enemy, they ought to be of good courage, as being furnish'd with more than human Supplies. Alledging further, that they were not ignorant how great an Assistant God was, having had so often tryal of his goodness in their greatest dangers, as an Enemy to their Enemies, and favourable to their Proceedings :

which favour of his he most manifestly express'd, by his miraculous deliverance of them from Hunger and Thirst ; by procuring them free escape, when they were shut in by the Sea and Mountains : And that which should most animate them to the Fight and Victory, was, That if they came off victorious, they should want nothing that appertain'd to a more commodious and peaceable Life. Moses thus having encourag'd the People by his words, call'd unto him the chieftest of the Tribes, and every one of them that had the charge of them, both in private and publick Assembly, commanding the younger to obey the elder, and the Elders to be obedient to their General. Hereupon the People contemn'd their danger, and were desirous of Fight, hoping that this Conflict would prove the end of their Calamities. For which cause, they earnestly desir'd Moses to lead them forth against the Enemy, and not to dull the Alacrity of the Soldiers by any untimely delay. Whereupon (chusing out among the whole multitude such as were most fit for War) he appointed the Son of Naveus the Ephramite, to lead them, a Man Valiant in Arms, and prudent in Counsel, and of great Piety, as having been train'd up therein by Moses his Master. He also in such sort despatch'd certain Bands, that he might not be cut off from Water : he left so many as might guard the Camp and weaker Company. Thus stood they all Night long in Arms, expecting only the Signal of their General, and the Order of their Captains, to attack their Enemies. On the other side Moses slept not, but instructed Josuah how he should conduct the Army. And as soon as the day appear'd, he encourag'd Josuah to shew himself such an one in that Battel, as both the Place wherewith he was honour'd, and the Cause for which they fought, requir'd ; wishing him, by his Prowess and good Conduct, to give Life and Courage to his Soldiers that follow'd him. He likewise exhorted the chieftest of the Hebrews in particular, and in general heartned and embolden'd all others that enter'd the Battel.

And

A After he had thus dispos'd the Army, and given all necessary Orders, he committing the Army to God's Protection, and Josuah's Conduct, retir'd upon a Mountain. Then encountered the Armies on both sides, and every one fought most valiantly ; neither wanted there encouragement on either side. And as long as Moses lifted up his hands, the Hebrews had the better against the Amalekites. But for that he was unable continually to support the same (and because he observ'd, that as often as he held down his hands, so long the Enemies drove the Israelites to retreat) he willed his Brother Aaron, and Uron his Sister Maries Husband, to stand on each side of him, and sustain his hands.
Which when they had perform'd, the Hebrews by main force overcame the Amalekites ;
so that all of them had been slain, if the Chafe had continu'd, and had not been cut off

B by the approach of the Night. Thus our Ancestors obtain'd a most happy and advantagious Victory : For besides the glory they got in having overcome so potent Enemies, and cast a terror into the hearts of the Nations round about, to whom they have ever since been formidable, they became Masters of the Enemies Camp, and both in general and in particular got Riches ; whereas before that time they had not necessary means to maintain themselves. And this Victory of theirs, was the cause of their very great good fortune, not only for the present, but also for the time to come : For not only had they their Enemies bodies under their Subjection, but also their Spirits, so as they were fear'd by all the Nations round about. And they multiplied both in Strength and Riches ; for there was a great quantity of Gold and Silver taken in the Camp. Divers

C Vessels likewise, and Tables of Brass were found therein : likewise great quantity of Tissue-work, and excellent Furniture for War. Moreover, they had all their Baggage Tents, Harnes and Horses, and generally, the whole Provision of an Army became their Prey. Thus ended this Battel. The success whereof so exalted the courage of the Israelites, that they thought henceforward nothing would be unpossible to them. The next day, Moses caused the Enemies that were slain, to be rifled, and the scatter'd Arms of those that fled to be gather'd up. He honour'd them also, that had bravely demean'd themselves in the Battel, and praised the Captain Josuah in publick ; whose honour was confirm'd by the applause of the whole Army. There was not one Hebrew that perished that day : though so many of the Enemies were there put to the Sword, as their

D number cannot be express'd. He offer'd likewise a Sacrifice of Thanksgiving unto God, and erected an Altar unto him, and dedicated it To God, the Victor. He prophesied moreover, that all the Amalekites should be utterly extinguish'd, so that none of them should be left alive, in that they had assaulted the Hebrews, and that in the Desert, and at such time as they were in Affliction. After which, he made a Feast for the General, to testify the joy he had for his Victory. This Issue had this Battel, which was the first that they fought after their departure out of Egypt. But as soon as Moses had celebrated a Feast in Memory of the Victory, to the end he might give the Hebrews some refreshment after the Battel, he caus'd them to march in array ; for now the Arms gotten from the Enemies, being given to those that wanted, there were more armed Soldiers than before.

E Thus passing onwards by little and little, they arriv'd the third Month after their departure out of Egypt, near to the Mountain of Sinai, where (as before is declar'd) Moses saw the Vision in the Bush, with other Wonders.

C H A P. III.

What Counsel Raguel gave to his Son-in-law, Moses.

WHEN Raguel, Moses's Father-in-law, understood of this his good success, he came with great Joy to Moses, with purpose to salute him, his Daughter Zephora, and her Children : who (greatly rejoicing at his arrival) offer'd a Sacrifice to God, and feasted the People, near the Bush that could not be consum'd by Fire ; and in the Banquet, the People were ranked according to the Order and Place of every Family. But Aaron with Raguel, and all the Multitude sung Praises to God, ascribing to him both the means and manner of their Liberty. They also spake much in honour of Moses, by whose Ver-tue all things had so fortunate an Issue : and Raguel particularly celebrated the honour of the People, and Moses their Governour, by whose Prudence so many good and valiant Men were guided. The next day, Raguel seeing Moses oppress'd with the multitude of business (by reason that he decided all their differences that were brought to him ; as G all were out of an Opinion of his Ability and Integrity, so that even they that were condemned by him, endur'd the Verdict patiently, knowing that their Cause was by him decided rather by the rule of Justice, than by Interest or Affection) he for that time kept silence,

silence (being loth to hinder them, who pretended to receive benefit by the Justice of his Son-in-law.) But when he found him at convenient leisure, he took him apart, and told him privately what he ought to do; counselling him to discharge himself of that trouble, concerning Affairs of so little Consequence, and to reserve only to himself those of the greatest Importance, and which concern'd the publick estate of them all. There being divers Persons amongst the Hebrews to be found, capable and sufficient to hear and determine the ordinary Pleas; but for those which regard the general good of the People, he alone was fit to undergo the burthen of them. Knowing therefore (said he) *thy Vertue, and how worthily thou hast behaved thy self toward the People, being the Minister of God, for their Safety; suffer them to determine amongst themselves those differences that arise amongst them, and reserve thy self wholly to intend the service of God, to the end thou may'st more easily assist the People in their important Necessities. If therefore thou givest credit to my counsel in human Affairs, thou shalt muster thy whole Army, and establish Chieftains, that shall command over ten thousands, and thousands, and five hundreds, and over fifties; and shalt ordain Governours over them, who dividing them by thirties, twenties, and tens, may conduit and rule them. And let some be appointed amongst them, who may receive Titles, according to the number and Names of those they commanded; who being approved by the whole Company, to be of good Fame and upright Conscience, may hear and determine all their Differences. And if any Controversie shall fall out amongst any of them in Authority, they shall refer the deciding of that difficulty to thee. By this means neither shall any of the Hebrews be defrauded of his right, and thou thy self serving God without Molestation, may'st render him more and more favourable unto thine Army.*

Moses allowed his Father-in-Laws advice.

This Council of Raguel highly pleased Moses, so that he order'd all things according to his Advice; not concealing the Author of it, nor attributing it to himself, but declaring publicly to all Men, that his Father-in-law was the Inventor thereof. He hath likewise written in his Books that Raguel was the Author of this Government: accounting it no less honour, to attribute Praise to those that deserve it, than Shame to usurp upon another Mans Merit; so that hereby you may conjecture his Virtue: of which, hereafter, in many places we have more to say. Moses afterwards assembling all the People, told them that he would ascend the Mountain of Sinai, to talk with God; to the end, that he might afterwards return to them, and impart to them whatsoever good things he should receive from him on their behalf. He likewise commanded them to pitch their Tents about the Mountain, and to have it in reverence, by reason of the Presence of God.

C H A P. IV.

Exod. 19. Moses ascends the Mountain, and receives the Tables of the Ten Ten Commandments from God, and gives them to the People.

Holio & Rufinus, chap. 6.
Moses ascended the Mountain of Sinai.
Exod. 19, 2, 3.
4, 14, 26.

THIS said, he ascended the Mountain Sinai (which is the highest, beyond comparison, of all that Country; and which, by reason of its steep and inaccessible ragged Rocks, is not only unfrequented by Men, but also cannot be beheld, without some fear.) Besides, it being reported, that God commonly dwells on the same, it is held sacred by the Inhabitants, and dreadful and inaccessible to all that behold it. But the Hebrews, according to the Commandment of the Prophet, removing their Tents, pitched them at the foot of the Hill, being full of hope of the Favours which he had promised them to obtain of God for them. And in the mean space, while they expected their Guid, they kept Holy-day, and fasted, and purifi'd themselves for the space of three days, with all sorts of Purification, and abstinence from the Company of their Wives, as N Moses had commanded them. They besought God also, that he would favourably receive Moses, and by his means bless them with the favours of which he had given them hope. They banquetted also in great Pomp, and their Wives and Children were richly attired. Now, on the third day, before Sun-rising, a Cloud cover'd all the Hebrews Camp (a thing before-time unseen by them) and environ'd all the place where they had pitched their Pavilions. And though all the rest of the Country had a clear and untroubled Sky, yet therabouts violent Winds were rais'd, which hideously roared, and a tempestuous Rain succeeded them; and Thunderclaps dreadful to hear, and Lightnings horrible to behold, signifi'd that God was there present. Let those that read this, judge therefore, as it shall please them; as for my self, it is not any ways lawful for me to depart in any sort from that which is written in Holy Scripture. That which the Hebrews both heard and saw, being strange and unaccustomed to them, troubled them greatly. Further-

Hovible Lightning about the Mountain of Sinai, v. 16.

A Furthermore, the report that was publish'd touching the mountain. That God dwelt on the same, marvellously amaz'd their spirits. They therefore sad and pensive, contain'd themselves within their Tents, thinking that Moses was destroy'd by the wrath of God, and expecting no less misery themselves. But whilst they were thus troubled in mind, Moses presented himself to them (with a countenance full of pleasing majesty, and looks so contented, that they testified the inward satisfaction of his mind) whom they no sooner beheld, but suddenly all their fear vanish'd, and in place thereof a hope of some great good succeeded; and withal, the Air, upon his arrival, recover'd its former clearness and serenity. Hereupon he summon'd the People to a solemn and general Assembly, to the end he might report, and they hear, what Commandments God had given them by him. No sooner were they assembled, but he (from an high place, from which all the People might both see and hear him) stood up, and spake after this manner:

Know (saith he) you Hebrews, that Almighty God, as he hath never despis'd my Prayers hitherto, so at this time also hath entertained me very graciously: and behold he hath vouchsafed to honour your Camp with his Presence, and to prescribe to you by me, the most happy manner of living that can be imagin'd. I conjure you therefore by him, and by the many admirable works which he hath done for you, to hear with the respect you owe to him, that which he hath commanded me to tell you, without sticking at the meaness of the Person whom he hath employed for this purpose. Do not consider that 'tis but a Man that speaks to you; but reflect rather upon the Advantages which you shall receive, by observing the Commandments which I bring to you in the Name of God; and reverence the Majesty of him who hath not disdain'd to make use of me for procuring you so great Happiness.

For it is not Moses the Son of Amram and Jocabel that is going to give you those admirable Precepts, but he it is that constrained Nilus to flow with Blood, and that through divers Plagues tamed the pride of the Egyptians: it is he that gave you passage thorow the midst of the Sea: it is he that furnish'd you with Meat prepared from Heaven, when you were in Extremity: it is he that made Water spring out of the Rock, to quench your Thirsts: it is he that put Adam into Possession and Fruition both of the Fruits of the Earth, and the Fishes of the Sea: by him, Noah escaped from the Deluge: by him, our Fore-father Abraham, of a wandering Pilgrim, became an Inhabitant of the Land of Canaan: by him, Isaac was born, at such time as his Father and Mother were old:

*By him, Jacob became the Father of his Sons so accomplish'd in all sorts of Vertue: by him Joseph became Lord over all the Forces of the Egyptians: he it is that graciously imparteth these words unto you, by me his Messenger. Let therefore these wholsom Laws of his be holy and inviolable amongst you, and more dear to you than either your Wives and Children: for in observing the same, you shall lead a happy Life, enjoy a fruitful Country, a calm Sea, and a numerous Issue, and be always dreadful to your Enemies: for I have talked Face to Face with God, and have heard his immortal Voice; so dearly beloved are you unto him, and so careful is he of the Prosperity of your Nation. This said, he conducted the People (both Men, Women and Children) to the end they might hear God talk unto them, and teach them what to do, lest the Law should have been of less regard, if it had been presented to their Understandings by a human Tongue. They all of them therefore heard his Voice descending from the Mountain, so that every one understood the Precepts which Moses gave them afterwards written in the two Tables of the Law. I may not relate the very words of them, but I will express the Sense.*

He promis'd them to do it, and perform'd it in some time after, as in due place it shall be express'd. ended the Mountain of Sinai (having premonish'd the People thereof) and ascended H the fame in their fight: but when the time seem'd tedious unto them (for he was absent from them forty days) they were in great fear, lest some evil had hapned unto him: several spake variously concerning it. They that lov'd him not, said that he was devour'd of wild Beasts. Others, that he was taken up unto God: but they of the wisser sort among them, who took no pleasure to hear any of these suppositions, contain'd themselves; being equally affected in respect of both the opinions: for that the one seem'd not inconsistent with human condition, and the other had some correspondence with the virtues of the man: so that they endur'd his fortune with an equal mind, and lamented their own mishap, in that they were depriv'd of such a Governour and Patron as he was, whose like they thought it impossible to find: neither did their care suffer them to hope, I neither depriv'd of hope could they chuse but complain: neither durst they remove their Tents, in that he had commanded them to expect his return. At length (when forty days and forty nights were past) he returned to them: having (during that time) tasted no human sustenance: and by his arrival the whole Host was replenish'd with great joy; whom he certifi'd that God's Providence was always assisting them, and that during the time of those days, he had learn'd the means how they should live civilly, orderly and blessedly, telling them, that God commanded them to make him a Tabernacle, wherinto he would defend as often as it pleas'd him, which also in their Travel they might carry about with them: so that they should have no more need to ascend unto Sinai, but he himself would defend into that Tabernacle to hear their Prayers. K He told them likewise the measure, and order of the said Tabernacle, and that there wanted nothing, but that they presently address'd themselves to the building thereof. This said, he shew'd them the two Tables, containing the Ten Commandments written therein (in each of them five) by the hand of God. The People (rejoycing at that which they had heard and seen) ceas'd not to bestir themselves to their uttermost, for the building of the Tabernacle: so that they brought in Silver, Gold, Brass and store of Wood fit for Building, and which would not be worm-eaten; the hair of Goats, and the Skins of Sheep: the one dyed azure, and the other white; Wools of the same colour, fine Linnen, Stones inclosed in Gold, wherewith men are accustom'd to deck themselves, with great quantity of Perfumes. Such was the matter of the Tabernacle, I which was made like to a portable and moving Temple: this stuff being thus gather'd together, and collected with so great affection (according to each man's utmost ability) Moses appointed Workmasters, according to the Commandment of God, but such, as the like could not have been chosen, although the matter had been committed to the Peoples suffrages; their Names are now likewise extant in the Volumes of the Sacred Scriptures; Bezaleel of the Tribe of Juda, the Son of Uron, and of Mary Moses's Sister: and Eliab the Son of Isamach, of the Tribe of Dan. The People shew'd themselves so forward for the finishing of this Work, that Moses was compell'd to restrain them, causing it to be proclaim'd, That they had sufficiently contributed for the work already; for the Workmasters certifi'd him no less. They therefore address'd themselves to finish the M Tabernacle, being particularly instructed by Moses of the measure and greatness thereof, and how many Vessels they ought to have, according to the model which God had given Moses. The Women also strove with Emulation to exceed each other in making the Vestures of the Priests, and other things which were convenient for that work, to the end to honour the Service of God.

Of the Tabernacle made by Moses in the Desert; resembling a portable Temple.

NOW when all things were thus prepar'd, and the Vessels of Gold and Brass, the sundry Ornaments and Pontifical Vellments finish'd, Moses commanded them to Feast, and Sacrifice, each one according to his ability, and set forward the building of the Tabernacle. First of all therefore he measur'd the outward Court, which in breadth contain'd fifty, and in length an hundred Cubits, in such manner as followeth. He rais'd twenty B Columns or Pillars, five Cubits high on each of the longer sides, and ten on the shorter; in the backside to every one of these Pillars, there were fastned Rings of Silver; their Cornishes were also Silver, and the Bales Brass gilded, the lower parts of which resembled the point of a Spear, the better to fix them in the Earth. Thorough the Rings there pass'd certain Cords of five Cubits length, which on the one side fastned in the ground with brazen Nails of a Cubits length, did fasten each of the Pillars; and defend'd the Tabernacle against the force of Winds. Then was there a curtain of very fine Linnen drawn about the same, which hanging from the Chapters to the Bales, and inclosing all the place, seem'd to differ in nothing from a Wall. And after this manner were the three sides of the inclosure surrounded. But the fourth side, being of fifty Cubits, was the C Front of the whole Frame; the Door whereof was twenty Cubits wide, having on both sides double Pillars; and these also were of Brass cover'd with Silver; except the Bales; and more inward, there stood three Pillars well fastned, which were also hung round about with a Curtain of fine Linnen; but at the Gate there hung a Veil of twenty Cubits long, and five deep, woven of Purple and Violet, fine Linnen embroyder'd with divers Figures, but none of any living creature: Within the Gates there was a brazen Ewer, with a foot of the same metal, wherein the Priests might wash their hands and feet. After this manner was the inclosure of the Court; in the middle hereof plac'd the Tabernacle, turning it toward the East, that the rising Sun might shine upon it, the length thereof was thirty Cubits, and the Breadth twelve; one of the Walls thereof lookt towards D the South, another towards the North, but the hinder part was towards the West; and it was as high as long; and on each side there were twenty wooden Planks four square, and joyn'd together four fingers thick, and a Cubit and an-half broad, lined both within and without, with plates of Gold; and every Board had two Hinges, which were put thorow the two Bales that were of Silver, and in their Sockets receiv'd the Hinges of the Boards; the planks of the West Wall were six in number, and gilded both within and without; all of them so closed together, as it seem'd to be but one Wall. But on both sides there were certain Boards close joyn'd together, which in breadth contain'd one Cubit and an half, and in thickness, the third part of an hands breadth, and made up thirty Cubits; but six Boards made up the nine Cubits of the hinder Wall, to which were E joyn'd other two Boards half a Cubit broad, which they plac'd in the corners instead of whole ones: Every Board had Rings of Gold fastned to the outward side thereof, rivetted in order, and answering one another on every side. Thorough these Rings were put certain Bars which were cover'd with Gold, every one five Cubits long, which joyn'd the Boards together: And the end of every Bar was put into the beginning of the other, after the manner of a Box. And on the backside of the Walls of the Tabernacle, there was one rank of Bars plac'd long ways, passing thorow all the Planks, in which by Hooks or Halse, the sides of it were held together and rivetted and fastned one within the other; by which means the Tabernacle was secur'd from the force of Winds, and kept steady and unmovable. Within the length thereof was divided into three parts: Next to one part F thereof, containing ten Cubits, on the inside, were plac'd four Pillars made of the same work and matter, planted on like Bales, and distant one from the other by equal spaces overthwart, beyond these was the secret place. The rest of the Tabernacle was for all the Priests; and this tripartite division of the Tabernacle, resembled the nature of the World; for the third part (which was contain'd within the four Pillars, to which the Priests had no access) did in a manner, represent Heaven; the Seat of God; but the space of twenty Cubits (which was only permitted to the Priest, and was unaccessible to others) resembled the Sea and Land. In the Front where the entrance was, they plac'd five Pillars upon brazen Bales; after these, the Curtains were spread about the Tabernacle, woven of Silk; and embroyder'd with Purple, G Violet and Scarlet Colours; the first of these was spread ten Cubits every way, and was drawn about the Pillars, which separated the Adyt from the other space, and from the sight of men; and all this Temple was call'd Holy. As for the Adyt, that

At that was situated beyond the four Pillars, it was called, the Sanctum-Sanctorum, or Holy of Holies; and this Curtain or Vail was adorned with all sorts of Flowers which the Earth bringeth forth; but there were no Figures of living Creatures to be found there in. The second Vail equalled the first in greatness, workmanship and colour, and it compassed the five Pillars of the Entry; which reaching from the top to the middle of them, and fastned to each of them by a certain Ring, gave access to the Priests that entered the same. To this was there annexed on the outside, another Vail of like height, and woven of Linnen, drawn upon Cords from the one side to the other, by means of certain Rings; which was sometimes spread, and other times (especially on the Holy-days) unspread, lest it should hinder the peoples sight. On the other days (especially such as were cloudy) it was spread, and serv'd for a coverture to defend the painted Vail from the weather, which custom hath continued since the building of the Temple, that the like Vail should be spread in the entrance. Besides this, there were ten other Vails, four Cubits broad, and twenty eight Cubits long, with certain Golden Hooks, enchain'd the one within the other, to the end to conjoin them, so that they seem'd to be one; which being spread, did cover the Tabernacle in the upper part, and the Walls on the sides, and behind, not extending to the Earth by a foot. Moreover, there were eleven other Hangings of equal breadth, but longer; namely, every one of them of thirty Cubits, woven, with as great Art, of Hairs, as the other of Wool; which covering all the rest, and extending to the Earth, resembled the form of a Bed-Chamber; the eleventh serv'd to cover the Entrance. These also were cover'd with certain Skins sewed together which protected the same against the injuries of the weather. For which cause to them that beheld it from far, it seem'd a thing most worthy of admiration. For the Colours of the Tabernacle did in no other fort shine, than as if a Man should have beheld the Heavens. But the Vails of Hair and Skins hung after such a manner about the Entrance of the Tabernacle, that they serv'd to resist the force and outrages of Storms and Tempests.

D Of the Ark, wherein Moses placed the Table of the Law.

After that the Tabernacle was after this manner built, they Erected also an Ark which was dedicated to God, of a certain Wood that was naturally strong, and permanent, and that resisted corruption, in our Native Tongue, call'd Hebron. It was framed after this manner: The length thereof was five hands breadth, and the breadth and height three; and both within and without it was covered with golden Plates, and it had a Cover fitted with golden Hinges, equal on every side. And to every side in length there were fastned two Rings of Gold, driven and riveted thorow the whole whole Wood, and thow them certain Bars of Gold were thrust, that whensoever there were need, it might be carried any ways: For never was it born on Beasts backs, but the Priests bare it on their shoulders: On the Cover thereof there were two Figures of Cherubims, having Wings, according as Moses saw them near the Throne of God: for no Man before him ever had any knowledge of them. In this Ark he placed the Tables, containing the Ten Commandments, in each Table five, two and an half in one Column, and two and an half in the other: and this Ark he plac'd within the Sanctuary.

In the Tabernacle he placed a Table, not unlike to that at Delphos, two Cubits in length, and one in breadth, and of the height of three hand breadths, the Feet thereof, from the midst downwards, were like those feet which the Dorians set to their Beds; but that which ascended from the other half upwards, was square. The body of this Table was surrounded with a Border, standing out four Fingers: And in every of the feet, there were Rings fastned about the top of the foot, through which were put Bars of Wood, gilded, and framed of most firm Wood, which were not thrust thorow the Circle on both sides, but with a Button took hold of the upper Border of the Table, and beneath rested upon another upright Bar, and so serv'd to carry it whithersoever need required. This was wont to be plac'd in the Temple towards the North-Wall, not far from the Sanctuary: and on it were placed twelve unleavened Loaves, set six by six, the one over against the other, and made of two Affars of the purest Wheat, which measure of the Hebrews, contained seven Cotylas of the Athenians; and above these Loaves, two golden Pots filled with Frankincense; but after seven days, other Loaves were set in their place on the Festival day, which we call the Sabbath. The cause of which Ceremony shall hereafter be declared. Hard by the Table near the South-Wall, was placed a Candlestick of gold (but not Massi) of an hundred pound Weight (this Weight the Hebrews call Chinbares, the Grecians name it a Talent in their Tongue) and it was wrought with Bowls, Lillies, Pomegranates, and little Cups; then arising upwards from one Base, it was divided into seven Branches, according to the number of the Sun, and the rest of the Planets; it stretched out likewise into seven Heads, having orderly correspondence the one with the other, on which were planted seven Candles, according to the number of the seven Planets, which branched out toward the East and South, the Candlestick being set side-long. Between this and the Table (as is said) was a little Altar erected for Incense, made of sassafras Wood likewise, and cover'd on every side with a solid Plate, being a Cubit broad from every Corner, and twice as high, on which there stood a little hearth environ'd with a Golden Crown, in which were Rings with their Bars and Staves, whereby it might be born by the Priests in the way. There was another Altar of Wood also before the door of the Tabernacle, cover'd with Plates of Brass, five Cubits square, and three high, decked with gold in like sort, and plated with Brass the hearth, whereof was made after the manner of a Grate, so that the Earth received what-

SUCH was the Tabernacle with all that belongeth thereunto. Now it remaineth to discourse as well of the Vestments of the ordinary Priests, which they call Chanees, as of the Priest whom they name Sar-Hazbachim, signifying thereby the High Priest. And first of all, touching the ordinary Priest. When as the Sacrificer purifi'd according to the purification which is ordained by the Law, addreth himself to Sacrifice: he first of all investeth himself with Manachasses (which is as much as to say, a Trufs or Restrainer, which is a kind of Drawers or Slops, covering the Privities, made of woven Silk) where thorow he thrusts his feet, as in a pair of upper Hofs; and fastens the same about his Loyns: over this he puts a Linnen Shirt or Surplice made of double Linnen (which we call Chetron, and the word signifieth a Linnen Garment or Surplice, for we call Linnen Chetron) this Garment is a Coat coming down to the ankles bound to the Body, having narrow Sleeves about the Arms, and tyed upon the Breast a little beneath the Armholes, with a Girdle four Fingers broad, so loosely wrought, that it seem'd like a Serpents Skin. It was likewise adorn'd with red, purple Hyacinthine, and filken Flowers, but the ground only silk, which being twice doubled about the Breast, extendeth down to the ankles at such time as he desisteth from Sacrifice (and this they seem'd to wear in way of Ornament) but when he is to minister in Sacrifice, then (left blown up by the Wind, it should hinder his work) he casts it on his left shoulder. This Girdle Moses call'd Abaneth, and we, by a word borrow'd from the Babylonians, name it Emian. This Coat was in no manner plaited, and in the neck hath a broad opening, fastned about the two Shoulders with Claps, from the edge of the Collar to the Breast, and the midst of the back: this call'd they Mallabafanets. But on his Head he weareth a Hat (not made with a high Crown, neither comprehending the whole Head, but somewhat more than the half: this is call'd Masneupetes; it resembleth a Crown, and is of woven Linnen oftentimes doubled and fold'd, which in the upper part is cover'd with another

A another Coif of Linen, descending to the Front, hiding those seams of the Crown which were unseemly to be beheld: this is Curiously fitted, lest during the time of Sacrifice it should slip off. Such in general were the Ornaments of the Priests.

The High-Priest altho' being the very fame (omitting none of those things which we have reckoned up) but beside the rest, he puts on a Violet coloured Coat, extending in length to his Heels (we call it Meribir) this he girdeth to him with a girdle of divers Colours (not unlike the former) but that it is fludded with Gold: the skirt of the Vest is bordered with Fringes, to which are tied certain Pomgranates, and Golden Bells intermix'd; so that Between two Pomgranates, there is placed a Bell, and between two Bells one Pomgranate. This Coat is all of one piece without seam, open in two Colours, not shew'd, but long-ways, from the Brest to the middell of the Back.

B The Collar, not athwart, but long-ways, from the Breast to the Neck, of
To it is a Riband or Hem fastned, least the opening should be perceived. It is likewise open in that place where the Hands should be put out. Besides these vestures, he hath a third called an Ephod (resembling the Grecian Garment call'd Epomis), and made after this manner.) It is woven of divers colours, intermixed with Gold; in the midst of the Breast there is a space left open (the Sleeves, and all the rest are in such sort composed that it seemeth to be a Coat) in this void place there is a piece enchaîned of length of a span, embroidered with the same Colours, Gold and Flowers, as the Ephod applied to tie them together with these Buckles. And to the end the space between the Buckles be not slack, the opening is filled with a Hyacinthine Ribband: but on either shoulder are two Sardonyx Stones enched in Gold (instead of Buttons), to tie the Hood or Ephod; in these are engraven the names of Jacob's Sons, in Hebrew Characters, in either Stone six: so that the elder of them were placed on the right, shoulder.

Moreover twelve precious Stones distinguish the Effem or Rational it self, of excellent greatness and beauty, which, for their inestimable price could not be bought by any private Man. They were enched three, and three in four ranks, in certain Corners of Gold, to the end they might not fall out: in the first order was a Sardonyx, a Topaz,

D and a Sardonyx; in the second a Carbuncle, Jafpis, and a Saphire; in the third a Lincurium, an Amethyst, and an Agate; in the fourth a Chrysolite, an Opyx, and a Beryl Stone. In these v. 10, 11, 8 were the names of Jacob's Sons engraven, whom we esteem for the first Authors of our Tribes, every Stone being honoured with a several name according to the order of their Birth. But whereas these Rings (whereof before we have spoken) were too weak, to sustain the weight of the Precious Stones, they fastned two greater in the top of the Rational toward the neck, being eminent above the texture, which might receive the Golden Chains which met at the top of the Shoulders to be fastned with the little Chains, the end whereof was crooked, and conveyed certain Pipes, put thorow the Rings, and were more prominent than the brim behind the Ephod, to fasten the

E Rational, to the end it should neither fway this way nor that way. To the fame Rational also was there a Girdle fewed, dittinguifhed with the faid Colours and Gold; which compaffing the whole; and again knit upon the fcam, was fuffered to hang downwards. And as touching the Fringes, they were faftned to hollow loops of Gold from the one end to the other. Now his Hat was fuch as the other Priests ufed, on which there flood another fewed thereto, and flourifhed with Hyaeyntines: this was invironed with a Golden Crown, in which there were divers Cups of Gold made after fuch fort as may be feen in that Herb which we call Descard, and the Grecian Herbalists, Henbane. And left any Man that hath not heretofore feen the fame, fhould be ignorant of the nature thereof, I have thought good to fet down the description in this place. This Herb is of the

I have thought good to lay down the description of this Plant, which is a Tree of the height of three paces, hath a root like a Turnep or Navel, and Leaves that resemble Smallage or Rocket, out of the stem it putteth forth a certain bud cleaving to the branches of it, invested with a Coat, which it casteth off when the Fruit waxeth ripe. This bud is as big as the joyn of a little finger, having a circumference like unto a Cup; which I will describe more plainly, that the ignorant may the better comprehend it. In the lower part thereof about the bottom it resembleth in roundness a half bowl; and according as it groweth up it is streightned, until being again dilated in the extremity or brim, it ends in a Partition, not much unlike to a Pomegranate cut in the middle; to which there is annexed and groweth a round Cover, as if turned and framed, on purpose, having these eminent Clefts (as I said) like to the middle of a Pomegranate; resembling the pointed and sharp Thorns, and prickling Blades. Now it containeth a certain fruit under the Cover, and the whole Cup is like to the Seed of the Herb Sideritis; Sideritis is Flower is not much unlike that which springeth from the Poppy. the back part of the head, and the two temples; for these Caps came not near the front H or brow. For on the same there was as it were a plate of Gold, on which the Name of God was engraven. Such were the Ornaments of the High-Priest.

I cannot therefore but greatly wonder at the strange and causeless malice which other Nations have conceived against us, as if we were injurious against the Divine Majesty, which (they say) they to much honour. For if a Man mark the composition of the Tabernacle, and examine the habit of the High Priest, and consider all the Sacred Vessels which we use in celebrating the Divine Service, he shall find, that our Law-giver was a Man of a Divine Spirit, and that we without any cause are injured by other Nations. For, if without partiality a Man will duly examine it, he shall find, that all things have been done to represent and figure the World. For the Tabernacle is of thirty Cubits, divided into three parts; whereof two are left for the Sacrifice, as places prophane, and common, signifying the Land and Sea, wherein all sorts of Creatures are conversant; but the third part is sequestered, and reserved for God alone; in like sort, as the Heaven is inaccessible by Men. The Table on which the twelve Loaves of seventy pieces, signifieth the twelve Signs, thorow which every one of the seven Plants pass: the seven Lamps that were therein, represent the seven Planets. The Veils made of four several kinds of stuff, resemble the four Elements: for the Linen seems to represent the Earth, from whence it was drawn and derived: the Purple resembles the Sea, because the Purple colour is made of the blood of a Shell-fish, called K. Murex: the Hyacinth, signifieth the Air; and the Scarlet, denoteth the Fire. The Twined likewise of the High Priest typifies the Earth, for it is made of Linen. The Hyacinth which enclines to Azure, shews the Heaven, the Pomegranates, resemble the Lightning, as the Bell, the noise of the Thunder. The Suron sheweth, that the whole World is composed of four Elements, resembling by its four colours: to which Gold is annexed (as I interpret it) for that Light is annexed to all things; Elsen also is placed in the middle thereof, in such sort, as the Earth obtaineth the middle place of the World. Likewise the Girdle wherewith he is girt, resembleth the Sea, which enfoldeth and begetteth all things. The two Sarkonyx Stones (set as Buttons or Loops in the High Priest's Garment) signify the Sun and Moon. The number of the Gems allude to the number of the Months, or the twelve Houses, or the equal number of parts of that Circle, which the Grecians call the Zodiack. The Thiara or Mitre likewise hath an allusion to Heaven, by reason of its Azure or Hyacinthine colour; for otherwise the Name of God might not be placed therein: and the Triple Crown of Gold, by its brightness, represents his glory and Sovereign Majesty. Let this suffice for the present; for that which we will discourse hereafter, will furnish us with sufficient and ample matter, to shew and set out the Wisdom of our Law-giver.

CHAP. IX.

Of Aaron's Priesthood, and the Laws which appertain to the Feasts and Sacrifices.

After these things were thus order'd, and it remained only to consecrate the Tabernacle, God appeared to Moses, commanding him to establish Aaron, his Brother High-Priest (who, in respect of his virtue, deserved that Title of Honour above all the rest.) For which cause Moses (attending the Congregation) discoursed unto them his virtues, and discovered his good affection, and reckoned up unto them, how many dangers he had suffer'd in their behalf. Every one approved this choice, declaring the forward zeal and love they always bare unto him. Whereupon he shew'd unto them after this manner: The work is now brought unto such an end as I have pleas'd God, and hath been possible for us; and for that you know we are to receive him into this Tabernacle, we ought above all things to have a special care in the Election of such an one, who is to make sacrifice and supplication for us. Touching my self, if the matter depended on my private choice, I should esteem no Man more worthy than my self to execute this Function, both for that naturally Men love themselves, and for that I am well assured, how many travels I have suffered for your sake. But God himself hath judg'd Aaron worthy of this honour, and hath chosen him for his High Priest, in that he excelleth all other in equity and justice; commanding, that he should be invested with the Sacred Robes, and take charge of the Altars and Sacrifices. He shall make Prayers for you unto God, who will hear them willingly; by reason that he hath care of your Race, and will receive them, proceeding from a person whom he himself hath elected. These words of his were grateful unto the People, and they all approv'd the Election which God had made. For Aaron was more capable of that Honour than any other

A other, both by reason of his race, and in regard of the gift of Prophecy which he had receiv'd, and also for the eminent virtue of his Brother. He had at that time four Sons, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. But whatsoever remained of those things which were gathered for the building of the Tabernacle, was employed to make Veils to cover the Tabernacle, Candlestick, Altar, and the other Instruments; to the end, that in their travel they might not be soiled either by rain or dust. And having once more assembled the People together, he commanded them to offer every one of them half a Sicle; (the Sicle is a kind of Hebrew Coin, that is as much in value as four Athenian Dracmas) whereunto they obeyed willingly; The number of them that offered, was six hundred five thousand five hundred and fifty. And they that brought this Money were such as were of a free condition, and betwixt the years of twenty and fifty; and that which was received, was employed in the necessities of the Temple. Then did he purify the Tabernacle, and the Priests in this manner: He took the weight of five hundred Sicles of chosen Myrrh, and the like quantity of Irees; of Cinamon, and of Calamus; (which is a most Odoriferous Drug) the half of the said weight; and he caused all these to be beaten and infused into a Min of Oil of Olive; (this Min is one of our Measures, containing two Choas of Athens) all which he mixed and boyled together, according to the Art of Perfumers, and he made thereof a most Odoriferous Ointment; which he took, and anointed the Priests therewith, and all that which belonged to the Tabernacle, to the intent to purify them: offering many and sundry sorts of Perfumes, of great price, upon the Altar of Gold, (whereof I forbear to speak any further, for fear I should grow tedious to the Readers) Twice a day before Sun-rise and Sun-set, they were to burn Incense, and supply the Lamps of this purified Oil; whereof three were to burn every day upon the sacred Candlestick, in honour of God, and the rest were lighted in the Evening. Amongst them that wrought and finished these things, Beseleel and Eliab were the most excellent and expert Workmen; for whatsoever had been entrupied by others, they in their Art polished and perfected. And they found out many new things, of their own invention: yet was Beseleel judg'd the most excellent of the two.

All the time employed in this work, was seven Months; and at that time was the Year accomplished, which began at their departure out of Egypt. At the beginning of the second Year, in the Month which the Macedonians call Xanthicus, and the Hebrews Nisan, upon the new Moon, they dedicated the Tabernacle, with all things belonging thereto, according as I have made mention: And God presently testified, that both their Gifts and Works were acceptable in his sight; by his presence honouring the Tabernacle after this manner: The Sky being elsewhere clear and fair, over the Tabernacle alone there was a Cloud; not wholly thick, like a Winter storm; nor yet so thin, that a Man could see thorow the same; from whence there descend'd a Dew, that gave testimony of Gods presence unto them that had Faith. Moses having recompend all the Work Masters with such rewards as appertained unto them by desert, offer'd a Sacrifice according as God had commanded him, in the Door or Porch of the Tabernacle, a Bull, and a Ram, and a Kid for their sins; (but with what ceremony these things are done, I will declare, when I treat of Sacrifices, as also what Offerings are to be burnt by fire, and according to the Law are allowed to be fed upon) and with the blood of the slaughtered Beasts he sprinkled the Vestments of Aaron, and purified both him and his Children with Fountain Water and the precious Ointment, to the end they might be sanctified to God. And for seven days space he consecrated both them, and their Vestments, and the Tabernacle, with those things which appertained thereto, with the Oyl above-mentioned, with the Blood of Bulls, and Rams slain every other day; after their kind. But on the eighth day he proclaimed a Holy day and Festival to all the People, and decreed, that every one of them should particularly Sacrifice, according to his ability; and they with emulation (striving to exceed one another) obeyed him, and offered up their Sacrifices, according as it was commanded them.

Whilst thus the Sacrifices were upon the Altar, suddenly they issued a fire from them which kindled of it self; the flame whereof resembled the Light or brightness of Lightning, and consumed all that was upon the Altar. At that time, their hapn'd an affliction to Aaron, the greatest that could befall a Father, yet he supported it with a constant and generous mind: for he was a Man of much Constancy, and such an one as knew, that nothing could befall him without the prescience and providence of God. Of his four Sons, the two eldest Nadab and Abihu, bringing other Sacrifices to the Altar than those that were appointed by Moses, were burnt by the violent flame that issued from the Altar, scorching both their Breasts and Faces, in such sort that they dyed without possibility of being succoured. Moses commanded their Father and Brothers to take their bodies, and carry them out of the Camp, and bury them decently: All the People wept, and were very much amazed at this their Death, so strange and unexpected. But Moses forbade both the Father and his Sons to lament; to the end they might make it appear that being honoured with the dignity of Priesthood, they were more sensible of God's honour, than of their own misfortune. But as touching Moses, he refused all honours which were offered him by the People, neither applied he himself unto any other thing but to the service of God. He went up to the Mountain of Sinai, and entered into the Tabernacle to take Counsel of God concerning those things, whereof he needed to be informed. He demeaned himself like a private Man, not only in his Apparel, but in all other things, continuing a familiar and modest course of life, and challenging no privilege above any Man, but only in those things which pertained to the administration of the Common-wealth.

He reduc'd into writing the Laws and Ordinances touching policy, in due performance whereof if they liv'd they should be both agreeable to God, and live in Union and Peace amongst themselves. And all this he established, following those directions which God instructed him in. But now will I return and bend my stile to speak of that which I omitted in the Ornaments of the High-Priest; for this Apparel of theirs leaveth not any occasion to false Prophets, to execute their wicked impostures; and if there be any such, as dare intermeddle with that which appertaineth to God's Majesty, this habit maketh them know, that God never honoured their Sacrifices with his presence; but he gave visible signs thereof not only to the Hebrews, but to all those strangers who by any occurrence might be Eye-witnesses of the same. For of those Stones which the High-Priest bare on his Shoulders (which were Sardonyxes, whose nature is so well known to all men, that it were unnecessary to speak of it) that which was fastened on his right shoulder, shined very clearly at such time as God was present at the Sacrifice, and cast its rays afar off, that it might be perceived by those that beheld the same contrary to its nature and custom: which truly deserved admiration amongst all Men, except those who through contempt of Religion, do hunt after an opinion of Wisdom. But that which I will now speak of, is more to be admired at, which is, that by the twelve Stones which the High-Priest bare, Enchased in his Rational in the midst of his Breast, God was wont to fore-signify Victory to those that were prepared for Battle. For such brightnes lightned out of them, even before such time as the Army did dislodge or enter Skirmish, that it was manifestly known to the People, that God was present and ready to assist them: for which cause the Greeks that have no aversion for our mysteries, and are convinced by their own Eyes of the truth of this miracle, call it Logion, i. e. Oracle, which we term Essen. This Rational and the Stone Sardonyx gave over to shine two hundred years before I began to write these Antiquities, by reason of God's wrath which he had conceived against us for the breach of his Laws (of which at another time I will more fully treat, and at this time continue and prosecute my intended discourse and purpose.) After the Tabernacle had been thus consecrated, and that which appertaineth to the Priests was set in order, the People transported with joy that God dwelt with them in his Tabernacle, began to Sacrifice and to sing Hymns of Praises, as to him that had driven far from them all fear of evil, and from whom they expected in time to come, far better and more prosperous things, and both in general and in particular they offered gifts unto God according to their Tribes: and the Governours of the Tribes (assembling themselves together two by two) prepared a Chariot and a Yoke of Oxen, so that there were six Chariots to bear the Tabernacle by the way. Furthermore, every one of them offered a Vial of the weight of seventy Sicles, and a Censer containing ten Dariques, and a Coffer or Basin, weighing a hundred and thirty Sicles. The Censer was filled with Odoriferous Perfumes, and the Coffer and Vial served to hold the Meal and Oyl which they were wont to use at the Altar, at such time as they offered Sacrifice. They offered likewise a Calf and a Ram, with a Lamb of one year old, for a Burnt-sacrifice; and a Goat for a Sin-offering. All the other Governours likewise brought every one of them their Sacrifice called Salutary, for every day two Oxen and five Rams, with a Lamb and a Goat of a year old, and sacrificed them during the term of twelve days, every one his day. But Moses ascended no more to the Mountain of Sinai, but entered into the Tabernacle, where he was instructed by God of that which he had to do, and what Laws he ought to make, which are so good and laudable as they ought not to be attributed to humane wisdom: So that our Ancestors observ'd them so religiously during some Ages, that they thought that neither the pleasures of Peace, nor the distresses of War could render them excusable if they violated the same. But I will now cease to speak of these Laws, being resolv'd to compose another Treatise touching them.

The Ordinances of Sacrifices and Purifications, Levit. i.

I will here mention only some few Laws touching Purifications and Sacrifices (in that we have began to speak of Sacrifices). The Sacrifices are of two sorts: some particular, others publick; and these are made after two different manners; for in the one, all is consumed which is upon the Altar, which for that cause are called Holococausts, that is to say, Burned. The other are of thanksgiving, and they are made with Banquets of those that Sacrifice. But first of all I will speak of the first kind.

B The particular person that offers a Burnt-offering brings an Ox, a Lamb, and a Goat of one year old, (yet it is lawful to kill Oxen that are older.) But all those Creatures which must be consumed by Fire, ought to be Males; and after their Throats are cut, the Priests besprinkle the Altar round about with the Blood; then dress the Beast and cut it in pieces, and powder it with Salt, and lay it on the Altar already Charged with cleft Wood, already kindled: after they have well cleansed the feet and entrails, they lay them with the rest; and the Priests take the Skins. Such is the manner of a Burnt-offering or Holococaust. They that offer Sacrifices of Thanksgiving, kill likewise such sort of Beasts without spot, and more than a year old, both Male and Female; and after they have cut their Throats, they sprinkle the blood on the Altar; then take they the Reins, the Caul, and all the fat, with the lobe of the Liver, and the tail of the Lamb, and lay it on the Altar; but the Breast and the left Leg is left to the Priests: and as touching the rest of the flesh, the Priests Banquet therewith for the space of two days; and if then there remain any thing thereof, it is burned. The same Custom and Ceremony likewise is observed in the Sacrifice for sins: but those that are not of ability to offer the greater Offerings, offer two Pigeons, or two Turtles, the one of which the Priests have to feast withal, and the other is consumed with fire. We will treat more expressly of the Sacrifice of such Beasts, at such time as we shall discourse of Sacrifices. For he that hath sinned through ignorance, offereth a Lamb, and a She-Goat at the same time. The Priest besprinkleth the Altar with the blood thereof, not in such manner as is said before, but the Horns of the Altar only: and on the Altar they offer the Kidneys, and the rest of the fat, with the lobe of the Liver: the Priests carry away the Skins, and eat the flesh within the Temple the very same day; because the Law permitte them not to reserve any thing till the next Morning. He that hath sinned voluntarily but secretly offereth a Lamb, according as the Law commandeth, the flesh whereof is in like sort eaten by the Priests the same day. But if the Governours offer for their sins, they Sacrifice in like manner as private Men do, and are different from them in that they bring a Bull, or a Male Kid. The Law also ordaineth, that in Sacrifices both private and publick, there should be fine Flower brought for a Lamb, the measure of an Affer; for a Ram, the measure of two; for a Bull, three; which Flower is first of all mingled and wrought with Oyl, and set upon the Altar to be sanctified. They that Sacrifice likewise do bring Oyl, the half part of a Hin for a Bull; for a Ram, the third part of the same measure; and for a Lamb, the fourth part: This Hin is an Hebrew measure, which containeth two Attique Choas. They bring also the like measure of Wine as of Oyl, and pour out the Wine about the Altar. And if any one to accomplish a vow, without sacrificing offer up fine Flower, he putteth the First-fruits upon the Altar, that is to say, one handful and the rest is taken by the Priests for their maintenance, either fryed by kneading it in Oyl, or making Cakes thereof; but whatsoever the Priest offereth, all that must be burned. The Law likewise forbiddeth to offer the young of any Beast whatsoever with its Dam, if it hath not fed eight days at least. There are also other Sacrifices made for deliverance from sickness, or for other causes; in which Sacrifice they employ Wine to make Cakes, which are eaten with the flesh of the Beasts; of which it is not lawful to reserve any thing against the next Morning when the Priests have taken that portion which belongeth to and sufficeth them. The Law commandeth, that on the common Purse there be every day killed a Lamb of a year old, the one in the Morning, the other at the shutting up of the Evening: and on the seventh day, which is called the Sabbath, that two be offered in that manner as hath been declared. And on the new Moon, besides their daily Offerings, they Sacrifice two Oxen, seven yearling Lambs, and a Wether and a Kid, for the abolition of those sins which are committed through forgetfulness.

G On the seventh Month (which the Macedonians call Hyperbeteon) besides the above named, they Sacrifice a Bull, one Mutton, seven Lambs and a Kid for a sin Offering. The tenth day of the same Month, according to the Moon, they fast till the Evening; and

and on the same day they Sacrifice a Bull, two Muttons, seven Lambs, and a Goat, for a Sin-offering; besides which, they bring two Kids, one of which is sent alive, out of the limits of the Camp into the Desert (on whom all the evil may fall, if so be any threatened to the People) the other is carried without the Camp, into a clean place, where it is burned with the Skin, without reserving any thing thereof. In like manner they burn a Bull, which is not allowed out of the common charge, but at the proper costs of the Priest. This Bull being opened and slain, and the blood thereof (with that of the Goat) being carried into the Tabernacle, he sprinkles the Cover thereof with his finger seven times, and the pavement as often, and the Tabernacle and the Altar of Gold, and all the rest about the great Altar, which is abroad in the Court. After this, they set on the Altar the Reins and the fat with the lobe of the Liver, and the Priest offereth unto God a Mutton for a Burnt-offering. The fifteenth day of the said Month (at such time as it draweth towards Winter) he commanded them to pitch Tents every one for his Family, against the approaching cold Weather which that season is wont to bring; and that when they should enjoy their Country, and enter that City which they should hold for their Metropolis, (by reason of the Temple which should be there builded) they should celebrate a Feast during eight days, in offering Burnt-offering and Sacrifices to God; and that in witness of their thanksgiving, they should bear in their hands a branch of Mistle, and of Willow, tyed together with Wool, and a Bough of Palm likewise, to which a Citron was to be fastened: and that the first day they should Sacrifice thirteen Oxen, and fourteen Lambs, and two Kids, Sheep, with a Goat, for a Sin-offering. Those days that ensued, they Sacrificed likewise a like number of Lambs, and Wethers, with a Kid; and in rebating day by day the number of Oxen, they come back to the seventh. The eighth day they cease from work. On this day (as we have said) they Sacrifice a Calf, a Ram and seven Lambs, and a Kid, for a Sin-offering. These are the Ceremonies of the Tabernacles which have been always observ'd by those of our Nation. In the month Xanthique (which we call Nisan) which is the first Month of the Year, the fourteenth day after the new Moon, the Sun being in Aries, (for at that time were we delivered out of Egypt) he ordained, that every Year we should renew the Sacrifice, which we call the Passover, and which (as I said,) was celebrated the same time that we departed out of Egypt. We celebrate this Feast according to our Tribes, without reserving any thing of that which is offered, till the next day; which is the fifteenth day of the Month, and the first of the Feast of unleavened Bread which followeth that of the Passover; and during seven days, it is unlawful to eat any leavened Bread: and every day are slain two Bulls, one Ram, and seven Lambs, which are all consumed with fire; to which there is added a Kid, for a Sin-offering which the Priests eat. The second day of this Feast of unleavened Bread (which is the sixteenth of the Month) they begin to enjoy the Fruits that are reaped, and till that time untouched. And for that it is very convenient, that God should be honoured with the First-fruits, from whom we receive such abundance, they offer the First-fruits of Barley after this manner: After they have dreyed a handful of the Ears, they beat or thrash it, and cleanse the Barley from the chaff, and offer an Affar of the same upon the Altar to God; and after they have cast a handful of the same on the Altar, they leave the rest for the Priests use, and from that time forward it is lawful for them to reap as well in publick as in private. With these First-fruits, they Sacrifice to God a Lamb, for a Burnt-offering. Seven Weeks after the Feast of the Passover, that is forty nine days, on the fiftieth (which the Hebrews call Asartha, that is to say, fulfill of favours, and the Greeks Pentecost) they offer to God leavened Bread, made of Wheat Flower, of the quantity of two Affars, and Sacrifice two Lambs, which are only offered up to God, and afterwards are prepared for the Priests Dinner, and it is not lawful for them to reserve any thing N thereof till the next day. But the Burnt-offerings are three Calves, two Wethers, and fourteen Lambs; besides two Kids, for a Sin-offering. There is not any Feast wherein they offer not a Burnt-offering, and desist not from all manual labour: but in every one of these there is ordained a certain sort of Sacrifice which they ought to do: and it is first ordered, that they rest from their labours, and after Sacrifice, fall to Banquet. On the common charge they offer unleavened Bread, of twenty four Affars of Flower: and those Loaves they bake two by two the day before the Sabbath; and the day of the Sabbath, in the Morning, they bring it, and set it on the sacred Table, opposing six to six, the one against the other; and by them are placed two Dishes full of Incense: and these things remain after this manner till the next Sabbath, and then O set they new in the place of the first, which are given to the Priests for their maintenance. The Incense is cast into the sacred fire, in which the Burnt-offerings are consumed

A fumed, and in place thereof there is new Incense put. The High Priest also sacrificeth on his own charge, a Gomer of Flower mingled with Oyl, and a little baked by fire; and this doth he twice every day, and bringeth to the fire half an Affar of Flower in the Morning, and the other half in the Evening. But I will treat hereof more expressly hereafter, having for the present, sufficiently spoken already.

Moses separated the Tribe of Levi, and exempted them from the rest, to the end they might be consecrated to God: and he purified them with Fountain-Water, and purged them with solemn Sacrifice, and committed the Tabernacle to their charge, with all the holy things pertaining thereunto, and all the rest which had been made for the cover of the Tabernacle, to the end they might be ministers unto the Priests, their Superiours, who

B were already consecrated unto God. After this, he distinguished the Beasts also; namely, those that were to be eaten, from those that were to be abstained from, (of which we will speak, at such time as occasion is offered us; and will bring proofs, and the reason which induced him to ordain, that some were proper to feed upon, and for what cause he would that we should abstain from others.) He hath generally forbidden all use of blood in meats, esteeming the blood to be the soul and spirit of Beasts. He hath also generally prohibited to eat the flesh of those Beasts that die of themselves; likewise the Calf and fat of Goats, of Sheep and Oxen: He separated them likewise from the Company and Conversation of Men, who were Leprous, and such as were troubled with the Flux of their Seed. And as touching Women that have their Pur-

C gations, he sequestered them for the space of seven days, after which, it was lawful for them to converse with Men. The like decreed he of those that had assisted at the burial of a dead Man, whom he permitted not to converse with the other till seven days were expired. It was also decreed by Law, that he that had a Flux of Seed beyond seven days, should Sacrifice two Wethers, one of which should be sacrificed, and the other given to the Priests. Also that he that hath unnatural pollution, should wash himself with Cold Water. The like must Husbands do after they have had use of their Wives: He likewise order'd that the Leprous should be separated for ever, not permitting them to frequent any Mans Company, but esteeming them as little differing from the dead: And if any one by his Prayers made unto God was delivered

D from this Disease, and his Skin reduced to its native colour, such an one presented himself before God with divers Oblations and Sacrifices; of which, we will speak hereafter. Whence it appears how ridiculous a Fable it is, that Moses fled out of Egypt, because he was a Leper, and that all the Hebrews whom he conducted with him, and brought into the Land of Canaan were troubled with that Disease. For if that were true, Moses would not have made these Ordinances, to his shame: and if any other had proposed them he would have opposed himself against them; especially, since among divers other Nations there are Lepers, who are held in great honour, and who are so far from disdain and contempt, that they have been made Generals of Armies, and Elected for Governours of Common-wealths, having liberty to enter the Temples, and to be present at the Sacrifices.

E What therefore hindered Moses (if he had been infected with this malady) to make such Laws, and ordain such Statutes among those People, who honoured and obeyed him; whereby such as were therewith infected, might be prevented? By which it is manifest, that those things that are objected against him, are rather of malice than probability. But Moses being clean from such sickness, and conversing amongst his Country-men which were untaunted, made these Ordinances for them that were sick, having regard to the honour of God. But of these things let each Man conceive as best liketh him.

F He forbade Women to enter into the Temple soon after their Deliverance, or to assist at the Sacrifices, until forty days were expired (if they had been brought a-Bed of a Son;) but if it were a Daughter, he appointed that the number of the days should be doubled; and that when they should enter, they should present their Offerings to God, whereof one part was consecrated, and the other belonged to the Priests. And if any one suspected that his Wife had committed Adultery, he brought an Affar of Barley-Meal and cast a handful thereof upon the Altar, and the rest was reserved for the maintenance of the Priests; and then the Priest placing the Woman in the Borch which is right over against the Tabernacle, and taking the cover from her Head, writeth the name of God upon a Parchment, and maketh her swear that she hath not violated her faith to her Husband; and wish if she had transgressed the bounds of Chastity, that her right thigh might be put out of joint, her Belly burst, and death follow thereupon: but if her Husband had been inconsiderately drawn into that suspicion through excess of love, then it pleased God at the end of two Months to give her a Son. And after such an Oath ministr'd unto her, the Priest dippeth in water the Parchment on which the name of God was written, and then taking some of the Earth of the Temple, according as he findeth it, and and having mingled the same, giveth it to the Woman to drink; and if she had been un-justly accused, she became with Child, and brought forth happily: but if she had falsified her Faith to her Husband, and forsworn her self before God, then died she a shameful death, in the manner above mentioned. You see what Laws Moses provided for the Sacrifices and Purifications; he furthermore made these Laws which ensue. He generally forbade Adultery, judging it to be a great felicity, if Men demeaned themselves honestly in Marriage: and that both in polittick Estates, and private Families, it was a thing most profitable, that Children should be born in lawful Matrimony.

He condemn'd also as a horrid crime for a man to have the use of his Mother or his Father's Wife, his Aunt, or his Sister, or his Son's Wife: and detesteth it as a most heinous and hideous offence. He prohibited also the use of a Woman when she hath her Monthly sickness; also the lying with Beasts or Boys, by reason that such affections are abominable: and against the transgressors of these Laws he established Capital punishments. He willed also that the Priests should be more chaste than the rest, for he not only forbade them that which he prohibited others; but moreover he enjoyned them not to marry Women that had been cast off, or Slaves, or Prisoners, or Victuallers and Taverners, forsaken by their Husbands for any occasion whatsoever. And touching the High Priest, he permitted him not to marry a Widow, (although it were lawful for the other Priests) and granted him only liberty to take a Virgin to his Wife, and to keep her. The said High Priest is also forbidden to approach a dead Man (although the other Priests are not forbidden to approach their Brothers, Fathers, and Mothers, and Children deceased) requiring that they should be sincere and true in all their words and actions.

He likewise ordained that the Priest which had any bodily defect, should be maintained by the other Priests: but in the mean time that he should not approach the Altar, nor enter into the Temple: willing that not only they should be pure in that which concerned the divine service, but also that they should study and endeavour to be so in all the actions of their life, to the end that no Man might reproach them. For which cause, when they wore the habit of Priests, besides their general obligation to be always pure and sober, they were forbidden to drink Wine; and they were to offer up entire Sacrifices, and no ways maimed. These Statutes did Moses make in the Desert, and caus'd to be observ'd during his life. Afterwards he made others also, which both the

People might practise in that place; and then also when they should possess the Land of Canaan. He gave rest unto the Earth every seventh Year: so that it was neither till'd nor planted (in like manner as he had commanded them to rest from their labours on the seventh day of the Week) and he ordained, that the fruits which the earth of it self brought forth, should be common to all those that would make use thereof, as well to those of the Country, as strangers, without any forbidding, or reservation. He likewise decreed that the same should be done after seven times seven years, and that the year following which is the fiftieth Year, and which the Hebrews call Jubilee, i.e. Liberty, the Debtors should be acquitted by their Creditors, and the Bond-men made free, meaning those that having offended against some Law had been punished with servitude, and M not put to death; and to those, who from the beginning had been possessors of Lands, the same were restored in this manner following. The Jubilee being at hand (which word signifieth Liberty) both he that sold, and he that bought the Land, met together, and cast up the account of the profits and expences that had been reaped and bestowed on the Land: and if it were found that the profits exceeded the expences, he that sold the Land repossessed it: but if the charges exceeded the value of the profits, he payed the surplussage to the Buyer, and retained the Land to himself. And if the profits and expences were equal, the restitution was made to him that had the ancient inheritance. He ratified likewise the same Law in Houses that were bought in Villages or Cities: For if he that sold, counted down the money he had received before the Year was finished, N he compelled the Purchaser to restore him his House; but if he stayed till the Year were fully finished, the possession and free purchase remained unto him that bought it: Moses received all these Laws from God, upon the Mountain of Sinai, and he gave them in writing to the Hebrews, that they might observe the same.

CHAP. XL

The Laws and Customs of War.

After that these Laws had been after this manner provided, Moses addressed himself to O the affairs and Laws of War (forseeing those which his People were to undergo) He therefore commanded the Princes of the Tribes (the Tribe of Levi only excepted) to

A to take a precise view and muster of those Men that were able to bear Arms (for the Levites were Sacred, and exempt from those Functions) and the search being made, there were found 603650 fighting Men, betwixt the years of twenty and fifty. But in the place of Levi, he put the Tribe of Manasse the Son of Joseph and Ephraim, in the place of his Father Joseph: According as Jacob had entreated Joseph to give him his Sons, that he might adopt them (as hath been before declared.) When they pitched the Tabernacle, it was planted in the midst of the Camp, guarded and defended with the Tribes, which were encamped three by three on every side. There were certain ways or paths likewise laid out between them, and a Market-place, and Shops for all sorts of Merchandize disposed by order, and Workmen and Artizans of all Occupations, travelling in their B Shops; so that to look upon it, it resembled a City.

The Priests first were placed next the Tabernacle, and after them the Levites (for there was a view also made of them, accounting all the Males exceeding the Age of thirty days; and they were found to be 23880.) During all the time that the Cloud before-mentioned cover'd the Tabernacle, as a token of God's presence, the People remain'd always in the same places; and if it departed from the same, then remov'd they likewise. Moses invented also a certain kind of Trumpet made of Silver, after this manner. In length it was almost a Cubit, and it was like the narrow whistle of a Pipe, but a little thicker; it had but one hole at which it was to be blown, and the end thereof was like a little Bell, in form of an ordinary Trumpet. They call it in the Hebrew Tongue Asaphra. There were two of them, whereof the one serv'd to call the People to Publick Assemblies; and the other, to summon the Princes of the Tribes, when they were to consult about Affairs of State; and if both of them were sound'd, then all in general gather'd together. When the Tabernacle was remov'd, this manner was observ'd; as soon as the first Charge was sound'd, they that were incamped towards the East, dislodg'd; at the second Charge, they to the Southward, disincamp'd; then was the Tabernacle unpitch'd, and carried in the midst, six of the Tribes marching before, and six after: The Levites were all about the Tabernacle. And when they sound'd the third time, the three Tribes toward the West remov'd: And at the fourth sound, those on the North follow'd them. They made use also of all these Trumpets in the Divine Service, both on the Sabbath and other days. Then also was the first Passover Celebrated by our Forefathers with solemn Offerings after their departure out of Egypt, they being in the Desert.

CHAP. XLI.

Sedition against Moses, through the scarcity of Victuals: And the punishment of the Rebels.

N OT long after this, they remov'd their Camp from the Mountain of Sinai: And after certain encampings (of which we will speak) they came to a place which is call'd Iseremoth: There the people once more began to murmur, and to revive their Seditions, and lay the fault of their laborious Pilgrimage upon Moses; charging him, That by his persuasion, they had left a fertile Country; and now not only were destitute of the plenty thereof, but also instead of hoped felicity, forc'd to wander here and there in extreme misery, so that they had not so much as water to drink; and that if Manna likewise should fail them, they must all inevitably perish for want of sustenance. Hereunto added they divers Contumelies, which were every where cast upon him, though a man of so great desert and consequence. Mean while there arose one amongst the People, who (admonishing them of the forepals'd benefits receiv'd by the hands of Moses) counsell'd them to be of good courage; assuring them, that at that time they should not be frustrate either of that hope, or help, which they expected at God's hands. But the People were the rather incensed by these words, and more and more whetted their Spleens against the Prophet: Who seeing them so desperate, exhorted them to be of a good courage: promising them, that although by injurious speeches he had undeserv'dly been offended by them, yet he would obtain of God for them store of Fleish, not for one day only, but also for many. But they being incredulous, and some one amongst them demanding, how he could make provision for so many thousand men? God (saith he) and I, although we be evil spoken of by you, yet will we never desist to be careful for you, and that shall you shortly perceive. Scarce had he spoken this, but that all the Camp was filled with Quails, of which every one took as many as he would. Yet God, not long after punish'd the infolency and mutiny of the Hebrews, by the death of no small number: From whence at this day the place hath its name, which for that cause was impos'd thereon, and it is call'd Cabrothabi; that is to say, The Sepulchres of Concupiscence.

Of the Spies that were sent to search the Land of Canaan: And how returning to the Israelites, they discourag'd them with fear.

Hellio & Ruffinus, chap. 17.
ad 24.

BUT after Moses had led them out of that place, and brought them into a Country not so apt for habitation, nor far from the Borders of the Canaanites, call'd Pharon; he called the People to a Council, and standing up in the midst of them, spake after this manner:

God (saith he) having decreed to grant you two great Benefits, Liberty, and the Possession of a happy Country, hath made you already enjoy the one, and will shortly make you Masters of the other. For we are upon the borders of Canaan; from whence both the Cities and Kings are so far from driving us, that the whole Nation being united together, is not of power to expel us. Let us therefore address our selves very confidently to attempt the matter; For neither without fight, will they resign the Title of their Country unto us; nor without great conflicts, can we obtain the Palm of Victory. Let us therefore send out certain Spies, to discover the Forces of the Country, and how great their power is: But above all things, let us be at unity one with another, and let us honour God, who assisteth us in all dangers, and fighteth for us.

Moses sendeth
Spies to search the Land of Canaan.

After Moses had spoken this, the People (applauding his Councils) chose Twelve out of the Noblest Families of the Tribes, to go and view the Country; out of every Tribe one; who beginning from the parts extending towards Egypt, visited all the Country of the Canaanites, until they came to the City of Amath, and the Mountain of Libanus. And having consider'd both the Land, and the nature of the Inhabitants, they return'd home again, having spent forty days in this Journey. Moreover, they brought with them such fruits as the Country yielded; and by the beauty thereof, and by the abundance of riches (which they reported to be in that Country) they encourag'd the hearts of the People to fight valiantly: But on the other side, they diffus'd them with the difficulty of the Conquest, saying, that there were certain great Rivers unpassable, both for their wideness and depth; that there were therein also unaccessable Mountains and Cities, fortifi'd both with Walls and Bulwarks. Moreover, they told them, that in Hebron they saw a race of Gyants; and that they had seen nothing so terrible since their departure out of Egypt. Thus the fear of these Messengers, brought the rest of the multitude into a dangerous confederation and perplexity: Who conjecturing by their discourse, that it was impossible to conquer the Land, dissolving the Assembly, returned each to their Houses, lamenting with their Wives and Children, saying, That God had only in words promis'd many things, but that they saw no effects of them. Moreover, they blam'd Moses, and revil'd both him and his Brother Aaron, the High-Priest. And thus spent they all the Night in disquiet, venting their discontents both against the one and the other. But on the morrow they re-assembled their Council tumultuously, with intention to stone Moses and his Brother, and then return back again to Egypt, from whence they came. But two of the discoverers (namely Josuah the Son of Nave, of the Tribe of Ephraim and Caleb, of the Tribe of Juda) seeing this disorder, and fearing the consequences of it, they went into the midst of them, and appeas'd the multitude: Praying them to be of good hope, and not to accuse Almighty God of unfaithfulness, by yielding certain slight belief to some, who spreading vain rumours of the affairs of Canaan, had terrified the credulous multitude; but rather, follow them, who both would be the Actors and Conductors also of them in the Conquest of the Country: And that neither the greatness of the Mountains, nor the depth of the Rivers, could hinder them, that like Valiant men were prepared to attempt, especially God being their Guide, and ready to fight for them in that Battel. March forward therefore (said they) and laying aside all fear (and being assured of the divine succors) follow us with a bold courage whithersoever we lead you.

Fig. 6.
Josuah and Caleb appease the people.

Hellio & Ruffinus, chap. 18.

With these words labour'd they to appease the tumultuous multitude. In the mean while, Moses and Aaron falling prostrate on their faces, besought God, not for their own safety, but that it would please him to restore the despairing multitude to a better mind, who were troubled with so many present necessities, and vain apprehensions of the future. Whereupon suddenly a Cloud appear'd on the Tabernacle, and gave testimony, that God was there present. Which when Moses perceiv'd (being full of confidence) he press'd into the midst of the multitude, and told them, That God was provoked to take punishment of the outrage which they had committed against him; yet not so severely, as the iniquity of their sins deserved, but in that discipline which fathers are accustomed to use, for the amendment of their Children. For at such time as he stood before God in the Tabernacle, and besought him with tears for the safety of the multitude, God had recounted unto him how many

A many benefits and favours they had received from him, and how ungrateful they shewed themselves towards him: and that at the present being transported with passion and fear, they had given more credit to the reports of the Spies, than to his promises. Notwithstanding all before Christ's Nativity, 1509. which, he would not utterly consume them all, nor exterminate their whole Race, (whom he had honoured above all the Nations of the earth) but for punishment of their sin, they should not possess the Land of Canaan, nor taste the sweetness and plenty of its fruits; but they should live in the Desert, without House or City, for the space of forty years. Tet hath he der in the Desert forty years. promised (said he) to give the Country to your children, whom he will make Lords of the Goods, and Heirs of those Possessions of which you have rendered your selves unworthy by your murmuring and disobedience.

B After Moses had discourg'd these things in this manner, the People were in great forrow and Calamity, and besought Moses, that he would appease God's wrath conceived against them, beseeching him, that forgetting their faults that were past in the Desert, he would make good his promises to them. Moses answered them, That God was not incensed against them according to the manner of humane weakness, but that he had given a just sentence against them. In this place it is not to be supposed, that Moses (who was but a man only) did appease so many multitudes of displeased men, but that God assisted him, and brought to pass, that the People were wrought upon by his words (having by divers disobediences, and by the calamities whereinto they were fallen, known, that obedience was both good and profitable.) But what greater proof can

C be desired of the eminent virtue of this Law-giver, and of the strange Authority he acquired thereby, than that not only they who lived in his time, but even at this day, there is not any one amongst the Hebrews, but takes himself obliged to obey the Ordinances made by him, and regards him as present and ready to punish the Transgressors of the same? There are besides, divers great and evident signs of the more than humane virtue which was in him: and amongst the rest, this was not the least, That of certain strangers that have travelled out of the Regions beyond Euphrates, a four months journey, to their great charges, and with no less peril, to honour our Temple, and offer Sacrifice; yet some have not obtained licence or permission to offer, in that by our Laws it was not lawful for them to do it, and some other, without sacrificing, (others

D the Sacrifice half finished, the rest not permitted to enter the Temple) have returned back again to their homes, without finishing their purpose, chusing rather to submit to Moses's Law, than to satisfy their own wills; and that without the least repining or complaint. So much did the opinion once conceived of this man prevail, that he is esteemed more than a man, but of the consideration, that he had received Laws from God, and delivered them to men. Of late also, (not long before the Wars of the Jews, during the Empire of Claudius, when Ismael was High Priest amongst us) so great a Famine oppressed our Nation, that an Assar of Meal was sold for four drams, and there was brought to the Feast of Azymes the quantity of seventy Corei, (which make thirty Sicilian and forty Athenian Medimni, almost two Bushels of ours) none of the Priests dur

E were so bold as to eat one grain of it, (notwithstanding the Country was in that extremity) fearing the Law, and God's displeasure extended always against sins concealed. For which cause, we ought not to wonder at that which hapned at that time, considering, that the Writings left by Moses, are in such force, even at this day, that they themselves who hate us, confess, that God instituted our Government by the means and ministry of Moses, and his virtue. But of these things, let every man think as it pleaseth him.

Numb. 14. 4.
The Israelites,
without Gods or Moses command, devised how to affail the Enemies.

WHEN thus the Hebrews passed their lives in great penury and perplexity in the Desert, groaning under the burthen of their grievous Afflictions: there was nothing that more distracted and disordered them than this, That God had forbidden them to fight with the Canaanites. They would now no longer give ear unto Moses, (who perswaded them to Peace) but growing confident in themselves, that both without his conduct and counsels, they might easily obtain Victory over their Enemies; they accused him, as if he sought after no other thing, but that they being daily pressed with great wants, might be enforced continually to depend upon his counsels. Whereupon they resolved upon a War against the Canaanites, presuming with themselves, that God would favour them, not only in regard of Moses, but also for that he had a general care of their Nation, ever since the time of their Forefathers, whom he had always held under his protection; and by reason of those virtues, he had already granted them liberty. They had likewise that if they fought valiantly, God would give them Victory; that they were strong enough to overcome their Enemies, though they were left to themselves; yet, though Moses should endeavour to estrange God from them. In a word, that it was more for their advantage to govern themselves; and that being redeemed from the servitude of Egypt, they ought not to suffer Moses to tyrannize over them, or to conform their necks under his yoke; in a vain belief, that God had only discovered to Moses, that which was good for them, by reason of the affection which he bare him: As if all of them were not derived from the loins of Abraham, and that he only were the Guide of all, in foreknowing the things that should happen unto them, by particular instruction from God. That prudence obliged them to condemn his pride, and fix their trust only upon God, for conquering the Country which he had promised them, in spite of Moses's contradiction; who for this cause hindered them, pretending the Authority of God for it. That therefore considering their necessity, and the Desert, which daily more and more aggravated their misery, they should prepare themselves courageously to march against the Enemy, the Canaanites; hoping, that God would be their Guide; so as they needed not the assistance of their Law-giver. When this sentence was approved by a general consent, they flock out in multitudes against their Enemies: who neither affrighted by their boldness nor multitude, valiantly resisted them, who desperately charged them: so that (the better part of the Hebrews being slain) they pursued the rest (enforced shamefully to turn their backs) even unto their Camp. This overthrow (happening besides all mens opinion) wondrously dejected the minds of the multitude, so that they grew desperate of all future good fortune; concluding, that God had sent and inflicted that plague upon them, because without his counsel and order they had enterprised the Battel. But when Moses saw that his Country-men were dismay'd with the overthrow which they had received, and the Enemy grown proud with their

A their late Victory, fearing likewise left (not content with their present success) they should attempt further, he determined to retire his Forces back again into the Desert. And whereas the People promised thenceforward to be obedient to him, (being taught by their own misery, that nothing would fall out prosperously unto them, without the counsel and conduct of their Guide) they disincamping themselves, retired into the Desert with this resolution, that they would no more attempt a Battel against the Canaanites, till they received a sign of their good success from Heaven. But even as in a great Army it customably falleth out (especially in time of trouble) that the common multitude wax head strong and disobedient to their Governours, so did the like also happen amongst the Jews. For whereas they were in number 600000, and even in their better Fortunes sufficiently disobedient to their Governours, so much the more were they exasperated by their wants and misfortunes, both amongst themselves, and against their Governour. For which cause there arose so great a Sedition, as neither among the Greeks or Barbarians the like was ever heard. Which things, without doubt, had overthrown them, being brought into so desperate an estate) had not Moses (forgetting the injury he had received, which was no less than a purpose to stone him to death) succoured and relieved their distressed Fortunes. Neither did God utterly abandon the care of them: but although they were contumelious against their Law-giver, and transgressed also against the Laws which he had delivered them by Moses, yet delivered he them out of that danger; of which (without his special Providence) there could be expected no other but a lamentable issue. This Sedition, as also how Moses governed the estate when the troubles were ended, we will now declare, having first expressed the cause thereof.

gainst Moses.

C H A P. II.

The Sedition raised by Chore against Moses and his Brother, for the Priesthood.

CHORE (a Man noble by Birth, and famous for his wealth amongst the Hebrews, and endowed with a certain kind of popular Eloquence) seeing Moses placed in the highest place of Authority, was filled with jealousy and envy thereof. For although he were of the same Tribe and Kindred, yet he thought it a great indignity to himself, to be held his inferior, being both more potent in Riches, and his equal in Parentage. For which cause, he began to murmur and complain to the Levites, (which were of the same Tribe with him, and his Kinsmen) telling them, That it was not to be suffered, that Moses, under a pretext of Communication with God, should by ambitious policy (to other mens prejudice) only study his own glory; having of late, against all sort of reason, given the Priesthood to his Brother Aaron, and distributed other dignities, at his own pleasure, like a King without the suffrage and approbation of the People. That this injury done by him, was not to be endured, by reason that so covertly he had insinuated himself into the Government; that before it could be observed, the People would be brought into servitude. For he that knoweth himself to be worthy of a Government, endeavours to obtain the same by the consent of the People, and not by force and violence; but they that despair by good means to attain thereto, do notwithstanding abstain from force, lest they should lose the opinion of their goodness and honesty; yet endeavour they by malicious subtilties to attain thereunto. That it concerned the Commonwealth to check the attempts of such men, lest of private, they at last grow publick Enemies. For what reason (said he) can Moses give, why he hath bestowed the High Priesthood on Aaron and his Sons? If God had decreed, that this honour should be bestowed on one of the Tribe of Levi, there were more reason that I should have it, who am of the same Kindred with Moses, and who surpass him both in riches and age. On the contrary, if this honour appertain to the most ancient of the Tribes, that of Reuben ought by right to enjoy it, namely, Dathan and Abiram, and Phalal, who are the most ancient of that Tribe, and the most powerful in riches. These things I spake Chore, under colour and pretence of the good of the Commonwealth, but in effect only to raise a Tumult amongst the multitude, and intrude into the office of the High-Priest. Which discourse of his passing by little and little, from one ear to another, amongst the multitude, and multiplied by the envious, and such as malignant Aaron, at last brought all the Tribes into a mutiny: so that 250 of the chiefest Nobles grew at length to be partakers of Chore's Conspiracy; and all of these conspired together to take away the Priesthood from Moses's Brother, and to transfer it to him. The People likewise were in such fortification, that they sought to stone Moses; and ran all of them consensually with noise and uproar, crying out before the Tabernacle of God, that the Tyrant was to be cut off, and the People delivered from thralldom, who under pretext of Religion, had insupportable thralldom imposed on them. For if it were God that had chosen him to be High-Priest, he would have preferred such an one to the dignity who had been worthy, and would not have conferred it on those who were far inferior to others:

others: That if he had decreed to bestow it on Aaron, he would have remitted the election to the People, and not left the disposition thereof to his Brother. Although Moses was informed of Chores treacherous Calumnies, and saw the People highly incensed, yet was he nothing at all abashed thereat: but being satisfied in his Conscience, that he had governed the estate uprightly, and well assured, that his Brother obtained the Priesthood, not by his favour, but God's election, he came into the Congregation; where he uttered not one word against the People, but addressing himself to Chore, he expostulated with him, and accused him with great vehemency, being (besides his other qualities) by nature eloquent and fit to speak in publick Assemblies.

I think (saith he) Chore, that both thou and every one of these (Pointing with his finger at the 250 Men of his faction) are worthy of honour; yea, I contemn not the rest of this Assembly, although they are not to be compared to you in Riches, and other endowments. But neither doth Aaron therefore possess the Priesthood, because he is richer (for thou hast more ample possessions than either of us) neither because he is more noble, (for God hath equally imparted the same unto us all, having given us one and the same Grandfather) neither have I been moved thereto by Brotherly affection, to bestow that on him which was due unto others. For had I considered any thing but God, and the obedience I owe to him, I should rather have taken this honour to my self, than have given it him; since there is no man more near to me than my self. For what wisdom had it been in me, to expose my self to those dangers which they incur, who commit an injustice, and suffer another man to reap the advantage of it? But God forbid that my Conscience should be stained with any such sin: were I guilty of this fault, God would not leave me unpunished, who had contemned him, nor you ignorant of what ye ought to do, in order to please him. 'Tis he, not I that chose the High Priest; and by this means he hath acquitted me of that accusation, which in this respect might be brought against me. But though Aaron hath obtained this degree, (not by my favour, but by God's own appointment) yet notwithstanding he referreth and remitteth the matter to the publick disposition and order of you all; neither requireth he any prerogative, for that he hath already exercised the charge, but esteemeth it to be the greatest good fortune that may befall him, to see your Mutinies and Seditions cease, although with the loss of that honour which he hath received from your own election. For neither have we been guilty of disrespect towards God, in accepting that which it pleased him to give us; nor on the contrary I could we refuse it without impiety. But since it is a thing most reasonable, that he who gives, should confirm the gift which he hath given; God therefore shall once again determine, who amongst you, shall be chosen to offer Sacrifice unto him, and to take charge of those things which appertain to Religion. And surely Chore will not be so bold as to pretend by the desire he hath to this dignity, to deprive God of the Authority to dispose the same as best liketh him.

Cease therefore to mutiny amongst your selves, and to be tumultuous upon this occasion; let every one of you that desire the Priesthood, to morrow bring each of you his Censer with perfumes, and fire from his house. And thou, O Chore, be not ashamed to yield unto God, and to expect his judgment, without going about to raise thy self above him: but come thou also amongst the rest of the Competitors in this honour, to hear the decision. Neither see I cause, why Aaron should not be there also present, to be judged with thee, in that hitherto he hath virtuously and uprightly behaved himself in the execution of that office, and is likewise of the same Tribe and Race that thou art of. Ye shall all offer Incense in the presence of the People, and let him whose offering shall be most acceptable in God's sight, be declared and established High Priest: so shall I be acquitted of that slander which is wrongfully urged against me, of having (by my particular grace and favour) bestowed the office of the Priesthood on my Brother.

After Moses had spoken in this manner, the People gave over murmuring, and the suspicions which they had conceived against Moses: approving in themselves all that had been spoken, as being profitable for the Commonwealth. So the Assembly separated.

C H A P. III.

How the Authors of the Sedition were slain by God's judgment, and the Priesthood confirmed to Aaron and his Sons.

THE next day the People re-assembled, to assist at the Sacrifice; and to see the controversy decided amongst the Competitors: neither was this Assembly without some tumult; for the whole multitude were in suspense, in expectation of the event; and some of them were desirous that Moses might be convicted of deceit. But the wisest sort, desired to see an end of the Sedition; for they feared lest the Commonwealth should be utterly ruined, if the Tumult should proceed any further. The multitude likewise (being naturally desirous of novelty, and prone to speak evil of their Magistrates) were diversly disposed upon every occurrence. Moses sent his servants to Abraham and Dathan, to summon them to appear (according to the accord) to attend the issue of the Sacrifice. But their answer was, that they would not obey him, nor any longer permit him to assume to himself a Sovereign authority over them. Which when Moses understood, he took divers of the Elders of the People with him; and though he was established by God to command over all in general, yet he did not intend to go in person to these Revoltors. Now when Dathan and those of his faction understood that Moses with the Nobles were coming unto them, their Wives and Children came out of their Tents to wait for him resolutely, having with them also their Servants, who were armed to oppose themselves against Moses. If so be he should offer them any violence. He no sooner drew near to them, but lifting up his hands unto Heaven, he cried out with a loud voice in the hearing of the whole Multitude, and prayed after this manner: O God (said he) Thou art Lord over all that which either Heaven or Earth, or Sea containeth; thou art a sufficient witness to me of all mine actions, for that I have managed all things by thy will; and thou art he who hast given me power to execute my purposes: thou that always in commemoration of the Hebrews hast been my perpetual help and assistance, hear this my prayer. For nothing that is either done, or thought, is hid from thee: for which cause I hope thou wilt not disdain to testify and justify my truth, and manifest the ingratitude of these Men. Thou knowest, Lord, every thing that hath passed in the first years of my life; not for that thou hast heard it; but for that thou hast seen and been present at it; Thou knowest also all that hath happened to me since, nor is this People ignorant thereof: But because they maliciously interpret my management of affairs; be pleased, O my God, to give them a testimony of my innocence. At such time as I led a peaceable life; and that by thy help and my labour, and my Father-in-law Raguel's favour, I lived quietly and happily, I forsook the possession of my goods, and the fruition of my peace, to engage my self in these miseries which I have suffered for these Men: and particularly for their liberty; and now likewise for their safety, I have most readily undertaken grievous travels: Now therefore since I am grown into suspicion among these Men, who by my care and providence have escaped so many mischiefs and miseries; thou that appearest unto me in that fire on the Mountain of Sinai, and vouchsafest both to speak unto me, and to confirm me by the sight of miracles, who in thy Name didst send me a messenger into Egypt; who hast abated the pride of the Egyptians, and hast given us means to escape from their Servitude; and hast humbled Pharaoh's power, when we were ignorant of our way, by giving us a passage through the Sea; in whose bottom afterward the Egyptians were drowned; who gavest us Arms, when we were naked; who madest the bitter water, savory, and fit to be drunk of; and in our scarcity of water, thou didst drink for us out of the bowels of the hard Rock; and when we found no meat in the Land, didst send it us from the Sea; Moreover (as a thing never before heard of) thou didst send us meat from Heaven, and hast established our estate with admirable and holy Laws: Be thou, O Lord, my Judge in all things; and my impartial witness, that I have not been corrupted by any bribe of any particular Hebrew; to favour his justice; nor suffered a poor Man's just cause, to lose his right against a rich adversary. And now having administered the Commonwealth with all sincerity, I am called in question for a crime, whereas I am altogether guiltless: as if I had conferred thy Priesthood on my Brother for private affection, and not by thy command; make it known that all things are disposed by thy providence, and that nothing is brought to pass by casualty, but by thy special ordinance; And to shew that thou hast care of the Hebrews, testify the same by thy just punishment inflicted on Dathan and Abiram, who accuse thee to be insupportable; and boast that thou art circumvented by my subtilties. But thou shalt make thy revenge most notorious upon the unbridled detractors of thy glory; if they perish after no common manner.

but let the earth, which they unworthily tread upon, open its self and swallow them up with all their Families and substance. By this means both thy power will manifestly appear unto the World, 2458. before Christ's Nativity, 1509. men, and thou shalt leave an example to posterity, Shamo Man hereafter shall dare to think otherwise of thy Majesty than becometh him; and my Ministry shall be proved to proceed from thy direction. But if these Crimes be truly urged which are enforced against me, then let the curse return and light on mine head; and let those whom I have cursed, live in safety. Bat, Lord, after thou hast inflicted punishment upon those that disturb thy People, keep the rest of the multitude in peace, concord, and observation of thy commandments; since it is contrary to thy justice that the innocent multitude of the Israelites should answer their misdeeds and suffer their punishments. Whilst he spake these words, and intermixed them with tears, the earth presently trembled, and shaking, began to be agitated (after such a manner as the waves of the Sea are by the winds in a great Tempest.) Hereat were all the People amazed; and soon after with a dreadful noise the earth opened, and swallowed up the seditious, with their Families, their Tents, and all their Goods, so that nothing remained of theirs to be seen. Whereupon in a moment the earth closed again, and the vast gaping was shut, so that there appeared not any sign of that which had happened. Thus perished they all, leaving behind them an example of God's power and judgments. This accident was the more deplorable, in that there were none of their kindred or allies that had compassion of them: so that even those that had sided with them, praised God's Justice with joyful acclamations, esteeming them unworthy to be bemoaned, but to be held as the plague and perversers of the People. After that Dakibah with his Family was extinguished, Moses assembled all those that contended for the Priesthood together, committing again the election of the Priesthood unto God, concluding that that honour should be ratified to him, whose sacrifice was most acceptable in God's sight. For which cause the two hundred and fifty Men assembled themselves, who were both honoured for the virtue of their Ancestors, for their own abilities; with these also Aaron and Chore, and all of them offered with their Censers before the Tabernacle, such Perfumes as they brought with them; when suddenly so great a fire shone, as the like was never seen, either breaking forth from the bowels of the burning Earth, kindled in Forests by the Sun and Winds, but such an one as seemed to be kindled by God himself most bright and flaming; by force and power whereof those two hundred and fifty (together with Chore) were so consumed, that there scarce appeared the least relique of their carcases; only Aaron remained untouched, to the end it might appear that this fire came from Heaven. These things thus brought to pass, Moses (intending to leave a perpetual memory to posterity of that punishment) to the end they should not be ignorant thereof, commanded Elsazar the Son of Aaron to consecrate their Censers, and fasten them to the Brazen Altar; that by reason of this Monument, all Men might be terrified, who think that the Divine power can be circumvented by humane policy.

C H A P. IV.

What things hapned in thirty eight years space to the Hebrews in the Desert.

After that by so evident an Argument it appeared sufficiently, that Aaron, neither by sinister insinuations, nor by the favour of his Brothery but only by God's election, had obtained the Priesthood; he ever after held it without any contradiction. Yet for all this, a new sedition brake out among the People with greater fury than at first, by reason of the Subject which occasioned it. For though they were persuaded, that all that had happened was brought to pass by God's order and will, yet they imagined that God wrought these things in favour of Moses; to him therefore imputed they all these things, as if God had not punished those Men through indignation against their sins, but only upon Moses sollicitation: and they alleged, that Moses (having given this main unto the People, by the loss of so many Noble Men, who, as they said, perished only for the zeal they bare to God's Service) not only had done them open wrong; but, which was more, had assured the Priesthood to his Brother after such a manner, that henceforward no Man durst pretend to the same, seeing how miserably those others were punished by a violent death. Moreover, the Kinsmen of those that were slain, solicited and stirred the People, praying them to restrain the Pride and over great power of Moses, in that it lay in their power easily to perform the same. But Moses perceiving that the People were incensed, and fearing lest once more they should fall upon some Innovation, whereby some great mischief might succeed, he assembled them together, and gave audience to their accusations; and without replying any ways (for fear he might the more incense

A incense them) he only commanded the heads of the Tribes, to bring every one a rod whereon the name of each Tribe should be written, promising that the Priesthood should remain with them, in whose rod God should shew any sign. Which propol being allowed by all, both they and Aaron brought their rods with their inscriptions; and Aaron had written on his the name of the Tribe of Levi. These Moses laid in the Tabernacle, and the next morning brought them forth every one, (which were easily known by the People to be the same which the Princes of the Tribes had brought, by the marks which they had made upon them) and they saw that all theirs remained in the same form which the day before they retained, when Moses took them; but out of Aaron's Rod there grew Branches and Buds: and which is more to be wondered at, it bare ripe Almonds, because it was of the Wood of the Almond-tree. The People amazed at the strangeness of this spectacle, changed their hatred against Moses and Aaron, into admiration of the judgment which God gave in their favour; and forbore any more to repugn against God, or to oppose themselves against Aaron's Priesthood. Thus three times confirmed by the approbation of God, by all men's consent he remained High-Priest; and the People of the Hebrews turmoiled with long seditions, at last by this means became settled in peace and quietness. But after Moses had made the Tribe of Levi (which was dedicated to God's service) free and exempt from warfare; (for fear lest they should employ themselves in providing necessaries for their maintenance, and so grow negligent in the service of God) he ordained, that after the Land of Canaan should be conquer'd, Forty eight of the best Cities, with their Lands within two Miles compals, should be given to the Levites. Moreover, he commanded that the Tenths of all the yearly Fruit that was gathered by the whole People should be given to the Levites and Priests; which hath been ever since invariably observed. Now must I declare what things are proper to the Priests. Of the forty eight Cities which were granted to the Levites, he commanded them to give thirteen to the Priests, and the tenth part of the Tythes. Besides, he ordained that the People should offer to God the first-fruits of whatsoever the earth yieldeth: and that the first born of four-footed Beasts allowed for sacrifice, if a male, should be delivered to the Priests to sacrifice, to the end they might be nourished with all their Family in the sacred City of Jerusalem; and that for those which the Law forbids to eat, there should be paid by the owners, in lieu of a firstling, a Sicle and a half; and for the first-born of a Man, five Sicles. He allotted them likewise the first-fruits of Sheep shearing; and those that baked Bread of new corn were to give them Cakes. But when they who are called Nozarites (because they let their Hair grow and taste no Wine) have accomplished their vow, and come to present themselves in the Temple to cause their Hair to be cut, the Beasts which they offer in sacrifice belong to the Priests. And as for those that have consecrated themselves to the Service of God; when they desire to be dismissed from that ministry (whereunto by voluntary vow they bound themselves) they must pay money to the Priests; a Woman, thirty Sicles, a Man Fifty; and those that have not so much money, refer themselves to the discretion of the Priests. And when any Man kills a Beast to eat in private, and not to offer to God, he ought to give the Priests the fat Gut, the Breast and the right Shoulder. This is the allowance which Moses assigned to the Priests, besides what the People offer for sins, as we declared in the precedent Book: and whatsoever is contributed by the People to the order of the Priests, he commanded that both their Wives, Children and Servants should be made partakers of the same, except those things which are offered for sins of which only the Men which are employed in Divine Service may eat, and that in the Tabernacle, and the very same day that such Sacrifices are offered. After all these Constitutions were made by Moses, and the Mutiny appeased, he removed the Camp to the borders of Idumaea, where he sent Ambassadors to the King thereof, desiring him to grant them free passage, on condition to give him what assurance he would demand, that no violence or injury should be offered to his Country, and that he would pay for whatsoever victual or water either he or his Army should receive. But the King setting light by the Ambassage, denied them passage, and with a well furnished Army marched forth against Moses to withstand him, if contrary to his will, he should attempt to pass thorough his Country. Moses asked counsel of God, who forbade him to begin the War first, and commanded him to retire back again into the Desert. At that time died his Sister Mary, the fortieth year after their departure out of Egypt, and the first Moon of the Month Xanthique: she was Magnificently interred. At the common charge, on a certain Mountain called Seith. And after the People had mourned for her thirty days, Moses purified them after this manner: The High-Priest killed near the Camp, in a very clean place, a young red Heifer without blemish, (which

(which had never yet born the yoke) and dipping his finger in the blood thereof, he seven times besprinkled the Tabernacle, and then put into the fire the whole Heifer, with the Skin and Intrails, casting in also a branch of Cedar, with a little Hyfop, and Scarlet Wooll. A man clean and chaste gathered up all the ashes, and put them in a clean place; and all that needed to be purified, either for having toucht one dead, or been present at a Funeral, cast some of these ashes into Fountain water, wherein they dip a Branch of Hyfop, and therewith besprinkled themselves the third, and the seventh day; after which they passed for purified. Moses likewise ordained, that the like Ceremony should be used, when they had conquered the Country whereof God had promised them the possession.

But after the Army (that had so long mourned for the dead Sister of the General) were thus purified, he led them thorow the Defart, into Arabia: and arriving in a place (which the Arabians account for their Metropolitan City, in times past called Arce, and at this present Petra) he spoke to Aaron to ascend up a high Mountain, which serves for bounds to the Country; because it was the place where he was to yield up his soul to God. Aaron went up, and in the sight of all the Army, standing on a High place he put off his Priestly ornaments, and gave them to his Son Eleazar, to whom by eldership the succession appertained. And thus (in the sight of the People) he died in the hundred twenty and third year of his age, on the first Moon of the month of August called by the Athenians, Plectumbeon; by the Macedonians, Lous; and Sabbas, by the Hebrews. Thus Moses lost in the same year his Sister and his Brother, and all the People mourned for him thirty days. After this Moses removed his Camp from thence, and pitched his Tents near unto a River called Arnon (which springeth from the Mountains of Arabia, and runneth along the Defart, and then entreth into the Asphaltique Lake, separating the Region of the Moabites from that of the Amorites.) The Country is so fertile, that it suffices to maintain all the inhabitants, though very numerous. To Sehon, King of this Country, Moses sent Ambassadors, desiring passage thorow his Kingdom, under such assurance as should best please him; that no wrong should be offered, neither to his Country, nor the Inhabitants thereof: and he would pay the price of whatsoever his Shoulders took either in Victuals, or Water. But Sehon refused him, and Arming his People, pitched his Tents on the Banks of Arnon, being ready to oppose the Hebrews, if they presumed to pass the River.

CHAP. V.

Moses overcometh Sehon and Og, Kings of the Amorites, and distributeth their Country by Lot, unto two Tribes and an half of the Hebrews.

BUT when Moses saw the Amorites disposed to hostility, he judged that the injury and contempt was not to be endured, and considering the Hebrews were an untractable kind of Men, and such, as idleness, and want together, might persuade to renew their former seditions and tumults; in order to prevent all the occasion, he asked counsel of God, whether he would permit him to force his passage by the Sword? God not only allowed his purpose, but also promised him Victory; whereupon he determined upon a War with great confidence, and animated and encouraged his Troops; telling them, that the time was now come, wherein they might enterprise their long desired War with God's approbation and encouragement. They rejoicing at this liberty that was granted them, presently too Arms, and being ranged in Battle, halted to charge the Enemy. On the other side, the Amorite (as soon as he saw them march forward, and begin the onset) forgetting his former fierceness, was both himself terrified; and his Souldiers (who before the sight of their Enemies, were as cruel and bloody as Lyons) now waxed as fearful and as meek as Lambs. So that they scarcely had endured the first assault, but they fled; reposing the whole hope of their safety in their retreat to their Walled Towns, (which notwithstanding did nought at all avail them.) For no sooner did the Hebrews perceive, that their Enemies began to flee, and that their ranks were broken, but they more eagerly charged them, and put them to the rout. And being extremely nimble, and lightly Armed, and besides very expert in using the Sling, and all other Weapons proper for fighting at distance, either they overtook such as fled, or with their Slings, Darts and Arrows, stops the flight of those whom they could not overtake. So that there followed a very great slaughter, especially near the River; because those that fled being not less molested with thirst, than with the pain of their wounds, (in that it was Summer-time) went thither to drink in great multitudes. Their King, Sehon, also was slain in this Fight, and the Hebrews spoiled those that were slain, and took many

A many Prisoners. They had likewise great abundance of all kinds of Fruits (in that the Harvest was not as yet gathered.) Thus passed the Army thorow the whole Country, foraging, and spoiling the same without any resistance; by reason that the Enemy, and all his Forces were defeated. This was the destruction which hapned to the Amorites, who neither used their Council prudently, nor managed their War valiantly. But the Hebrews possessed their Country which is inclosed between three Rivers, after the manner of an Island. For Arnon terminates the Southern Coasts thereof, and Jabac the Northern, (which flowing into Jordan, loseth its name) the Western Coasts are water'd by the River of Jordan. Amidst this prosperity of the Israelites, there arose a new Enemy against them; Og King of Galaad, and of the Country of Gaulanitis, was coming as a Friend and Companion to assist Sehon, and understood the loss of the Battle; yet being very daring, he was in hope to obtain a Victory, and determined to make trial both of his own Mens and his Enemies valour: which hope of his failed him, for he both died in the Battle, and his whole Army was likewise defeated. Moses no sooner passed over the Flood of Jabac, but entering Og's Kingdom, he overthrew one City after another, and destroyed all the Inhabitants thereof, who were exceeding rich. Og was a man of a most gigantic stature, and prodigious strength; his Bed which was of Iron, and which was found in his chief City called Rabatha, was four Cubits in breadth, and nine in length. This success did not only bring present advantages to the Hebrews, but also opened them a way to greater Conquests; for they took sixty well fortified Cities which were under his Government: so that there was not any of the meanest Souldiers but were greatly enriched with pillage. After this, Moses removed his Camp toward Jordan, and pitched it in a broad Plain near the City of Jericho (which is rich and fruitful, and aboundeth with Palm-trees and Balm.) And now were the minds of the Israelites in such sort confirmed, that they desired nothing more than War and Battle; and Moses thinking good to make use of this their forwardness, (having sacrificed to God in way of Thanksgiving, and feasted the People) he sent part of them armed to destroy the Country of the Madianites, and to force the Cities of that Region: which War had this Original.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Prophet Balaam.

WHEN Balaam King of the Moabites (who was both an old Friend and Confederate with the Madianites) saw the progress of the Israelites, he began to suspect the security of his own fortune and estate: for he knew not that God had inhibited the Hebrews to attempt the Conquest of any other Country but the Land of Canaan. And therefore more rashly than prudently, he resolved to oppose them: and for that he durst not assail them in Battle, whom he knew elevated with the success of many Victories; yet desirous to hinder them from proceeding any further, he sends Ambassadors to the Madianites to consult with them what was fit to be done. The Madianites knowing that beyond Euphrates there lived a famous Prophet called Balaam (who was their especial Friend) sent some of their most honourable Princes together with Balaam's Ambassadors, beseeching him that he would come unto them, and curse the Israelites. The Prophet entertained the Ambassadors with great humanity, and asked counsel of God concerning what answer he should give them: God forbid him to do that which they desired. And so Balaam told them, that he wanted not will to gratifie them, but that God, to whom he owed the gift of Prophecy, forbid him; for that Army which they desired should be cursed, was dearly beloved of God. For which cause he gave them counsel to make peace with the Israelites upon any conditions: which said, he dismissed the Ambassadors. But the Madianites (being instantly requested by Balaam) once more sent their Ambassadors to Balaam, who desirous to satisfy them in their demands, consulted with God. But God (offended with him) commanded him to assent to the Ambassadors: and he not conceiving that God spake thus to him in his anger, because he had not obeyed his order, departed onward with the Ambassadors. But as he travelled upon the way, the Angel of God came and met him in a narrow place, between two stone walls; which when the She-ass, whereon Balaam was mounted, perceived, she started out of the way, and crushed her Master against one of the walls; and neither by the strokes which he gave her (being grieved by his bruise) nor by any other means, could she be drawn forward. Whilst the Angel kept his station, and the Prophet continued tormenting the Ass, God caused the Beast to speak to Balaam with a humane and articulate voice: blaming him, for that having never before that time received damage by her, he had so cruelly tormented and beaten her; and understood not that God did prohibit him from the performance of that which he desired. As he stood amazed at the Prodigy, an Angel appeared to him, blessing him, and telling him that the As's was not in fault, but that himself deserved to be punished for resisting God's will. These words increased Balaam's astonishment and he prepared himself to return back again: but God commanded him to continue his intended journey, charging him to say nothing but that which he should inspire to him.

After God had given him this charge, he went unto Balac, who entertained him honourably, and caused him to be brought to a certain Mountain, from whence he might behold the Hebrew Camp. Balac also himself being Royally attended, accompanied the Prophet, conducting him unto a Mountain, which was but sixty Furlongs from their Camp. Balaam having well considered it, desired the King to build seven Altars, on which to offer seven Bulls, and seven Rams. All which being readily executed by the King, he offered a burnt Sacrifice, to the end he might preface on which side the Victory would turn; which done, he addressed his Speech in this manner toward the Army of the Israelites.

Happy People, of whom God himself vouchsafeth to be the Conductor, on whom he bestoweth so large blessings, and abundance of riches, and over whom his Providence incessantly watcheth! No other Nation shall equal you in the love of virtue; your Successors also shall surpass you, because amongst men God only favoureth you, and taketh care that no Nation under the Sun shall either exceed or equal you in happiness. You shall likewise possess that rich Land which he hath promised you: and your posterity shall be perpetual Lords thereof; and the glory of your name shall fill both the whole Earth and Sea; and so shall your Nation be multiplied, that there shall be no place of the World where it shall not be diffused. Blessed are you (most worthy Army) and deserving great admiration, being composed of the descendants of one single Man. The Land of Canaan at this present will suffice you, but know that hereafter, the whole World will not be too great for your inhabitation; so that both in the Islands, and in the Continent, you shall live in so great number, that you shall equal the Stars of the Firmament. And though you are like to grow so innumerable, yet notwithstanding God will furnish you with all sort of good things in abundance, in Peace, and in War, he will render you victorious. Wherefore we ought to wish that our Enemies may refuse to take Arms, and to assault you, since they cannot do it without their own total destruction. So greatly are you favoured and loved by God, who takes pleasure to abate the proud and great, and to raise the weak and humble.

Thus spake Balaam in his prophetic spirit, being inspired by the Spirit of God. But Balac was much incensed against him, exclaiming that he had not kept his promise; and by great Rewards he had been by his Confederates drawn thither to curse them, and instead of Execrations against them, he had given them the greatest Benediction. The Prophet thus answered.

Thinkest thou (said he) that I lie in my power, as often as destinies are to be discovered, to speak or conceal what we list, at such time as God speaketh in our mouths? No, he himself causeth us to utter those words which pleaseth him; and he publisheth those Oracles by us, which neither we know, nor ever thought upon. I have not forgotten the Request of the Madianites, and I came hither, to execute that which they desired at my hands; but God is more powerful than my will, who contrary to the will of God, and for the particular favour of men, had purposed to speak otherwise: but as soon as he entered into our hearts, he becomes absolute master of them. Truly I had determined in my self to speak nothing in their praises, neither was it in my mind to reckon up what God had decreed to bestow upon that Nation, but because he hath purposed to advance their felicity and glory, he put these words into my mouth. Nevertheless (since it is my desire to gratify both thee, and the Madianites, whose Prayers I ought to consider) let us erect new Altars, and prepare other Sacrifices, and make trial if God perhaps will be moved to grant me licence to curse this People. Hereunto

Balaam gave consent; the Sacrifices were renewed: but Balaam could not obtain of God permission to curse the Israelites. On the contrary, falling on his face, he predicted the misfortunes of those Kingdoms and Cities which should oppose them, of which some are not as yet built; but by such things as have already happened to those that we know both on the Continent, and in Islands, even to our days: we may gather most assuredly, that what remaineth of this Prophecy to be fulfilled, will surely take effect. Balac being much displeased, that the Israelites could not be cursed, sent Balaam back again without honour: who, as he came near Euphrates, desired to see the King and the Princes of the Madianites, to whom he spake thus: Since it is your desire, O Kings, and you Princes of Madian, that I gratify you, although it be against the Will of God, you shall hear all that I can say to you. Hope not that any thing can extinguish the Race of the Hebrews, either by War or Pestilence, or Famine, or any other chance; for God hath care to preserve that Nation from all evil, so that no mischief can fall upon them, whereby the whole multitude may be extinguished:

A tinguished: though they may come into some affliction for a time, yet they will afterwards flourish more than they did before, being by such chastisement rendered more wise. But if you desire to obtain some short Victory over them, by this my counsel you shall bring your wishes to effect. Send to their Camp the fairest of your daughters, as trimly decked and beautified as is possible, who by their beauty may conquer, and by their love allure their hearts; let them wander about, and offer themselves to the conversation of the youngest and bravest amongst them: and as soon as they see them enamoured, let them pretend to go away: and being desired to stay, let them not yield, except they will be persuaded to forsake their Country, Laws, and the service of God from whom they received them, and to adore the gods of the Madianites and Moabites. For by this means they shall incense God's wrath against themselves. Having given this advice, he departed. Now when the Madianites (according as they were counselled) sent out their daughters, the younger sort of the Hebrews became intangled with their beauty: and conversing with them, desired them not to deny them the pleasure and enjoyment of their beauty: The young Women seeing them enamoured, made semblance of a desire to leave them, and depart. Whereupon the young Men earnestly intreated them to tarry, and promised to marry them, swearing, that they would not only love them as their Wives, but render them absolute Mistresses of themselves and all their Goods. These promises they sealed with Tears; and the Women answered after this manner: Valiant young Men, we want not at home either riches, or the affections of our Parents and friends; neither come we hither to you for want of these things, or to make sale of our beauties: but considering you as strangers, for whom we have great esteem, we have not disdained to shew you this civility. Now therefore because you say you love us; and are so troubled at this our departure, we have thought good not to gain say your entreaties; if therefore you will plight your faith, and promise us marriage (which is the only condition that we demand) we will willingly live with you as your lawful Wives; but we fear lest when your lusts are satisfied, you will with shame and contumely send us back again to our Parents; which so reasonable apprehension of ours you ought to pardon. Their passionate Lovers promised to give their faith in what manner soever, and refused no condition (by reason of their extreme love.) Well then (said the Virgins) since you are so pleased, and that you have Customs so different from other Nations, that you use only certain meats and drinks; it is necessary, if you will marry us, to adore our gods. For by no other argument can you persuade us, that your love is unfeigned, except you honour, as we do, the same gods: neither shall you be blamed, if you honour the gods of that Country into which you are come, considering that our gods are common unto all Nations, whereas your God is adored by none but your selves. Thus therefore (said they) either to conform your selves in opinion with other men, or seek out another World wherein you may live according to your particular ways and customs.

The Hebrews blinded with the love which they bare to the Virgins, liked well their words, and consented to that which they said, suffering themselves to be seduced according as they were invited; so that they transgressed the Ordinances of their Fathers in following strange gods, to whom they offered Sacrifice, according to the manner of the Country. They also left to eat all those meats which were prohibited them by the Law; and addicted themselves to all kinds of pleasure, according as the Women persuaded them; so that the whole Army was infected with dissoluteness and disorder (amongst the younger sort) and a worse mutiny arose thereby than the precedent, by reason whereof it was to be feared, the whole course of Law and Government would be perverted: For the youth once having had a taste of these foreign and lascivious fashions, were unfavourably transported with the same: and if there were any more excellent than others in Nobility, they, together (with the rest of the multitude) were wretchedly corrupted. Zambrias chief of the Tribe of Simeon, married Cosby the Madianite, daughter of Zur, a Prince of the Country, and so please her, sacrificed after the manner of the Country, contrary to the Law of God. During this state of affairs, Moses being afraid lest some more grievous mischief should succeed, called the People together, and accusing no man in particular (for that he was unwilling to cast thole into desperation, who whilst they thought their fault lay hidden, might be reduced to a better mind) he exhorted them, That it was a thing unworthy their virtue, and that of their Ancestors, to prefer pleasure before their Religion. That it behoved them whilst they had time, to repent, and to shew themselves to be valiant men; not by contemning all holy and divine Laws, but by repressing their disordinate Passions. That it was a strange thing, that having in the Desert lived modestly, they should now in a plentiful Country grow so dissolute and disordinate, as to lose that merit in effluence, which they had acquired in necessity: By such like speeches, he endeavoured to reclaim the youth, and to reduce them to a better mind; whereupon Zambrias rising up, spake after this manner: Moses (saith he) use thou, if thou please, thine own Laws, whereunto by long time thou hast added authority; without which thou wouldest long ago have perished.

fered punishment for them, and learnt at thine own cost, that the Hebrews ought not to be H deluded by thee: For my self, thou shalt never tie me to thy tyrannical decrees; for hitherto before Christ's birth thou endeavouredst nothing else, but under pretext of Law and Religion to bring us into servitude and subjection, and thy self to power and sovereignty, by forbidding us the pleasures and liberties which all men that are born free, ought to enjoy. Was there any thing worse in our Egyptian thralldom, than the power which thou assumest to punish every man by the Laws of thy own making; whereas thou thy self art more worthy to be punished, in that thou despisest those of all other Nations, and wilt have none but thine observed, and so preferrest thy own particular judgment before that of all other Men whatsoever: But as touching that which I have done, in that I suppose it to be well done, am not afraid to confess in this Assembly, that I have taken a stranger to wife: thou hearest mine actions from mine own mouth, as from a free and resolute man; neither do I desire that they should be hidden. 'Tis true also, that I sacrifice to the gods to whom thou forbiddest to sacrifice, because I think not my self bound to submit to the tyranny, of learning nothing that pertains to Religion but from thee alone; and I take it as no obligation to me for any man to assume, as thou dost, more authority over me than I have my self. Whilst Zambrias spoke thus both for himself, and others of his Faction, the People silently expected the issue of this great quarrel, especially for that they saw their Law-giver would not contend any longer, lest he should make an insolent man more outrageous; and least others, in imitation of him, growing impudent in their speeches should stir up Tumults amongst the People: so the Assembly for this time was dissolved, and perhaps the mischief had gone further, had not Zambrias been suddenly cut off in K the manner I am going to relate. Phinees (who as well for his own excellent qualities, as the dignity of his Father Eleazar the High-Priest, and his great Uncle Moses, was accounted the most considerable of those of his age) was much discontented with Zambrias's contumacy; and least by his impunity the Law might grow into contempt, he resolved to be revenged upon the Transgressors, well knowing how much the example of great men prevaileth either way. And being of no less courage than zeal, he repaired to Zambrias's Tent, and at one stroke slew both him and Cosby, his wife. By this example, many of the youth being animated by this worthy act, to do justice on those that had committed the like offence, slew a great number of them with the Sword, and a Pestilence, (which was sent by God's judgment) destroyed not only all the rest, but also L those, who when by reason of Conflagration they ought to have restrained and dissuaded their Kinsmen from Lewdness, yet either dissembled or encouraged them in their Lust; the number of those that perished on this manner, was 14000 men. At the same time, Moses (being incensed against the Madianites) sent out an Army to destroy that Nation, of which Expedition we will presently discourse, after we have annexed that which must not be omitted in this History, as tending to the praise of our Law-giver. Though Balaam, sent for by the Madianites, to curse the Hebrews; which he could not do, being hindered by the Providence of God, had afterwards given that counsel to the Enemy, by means whereof, within a little space, a great multitude of the Hebrews were corrupted in their Religion; yet Moses hath done him the honour to insert his Prophecy in his Writings: although it had been easie for him to have deprived him of the glory, and to have appropriated it to himself, by reason that there was not any Witness that might contradict him; yet he hath not neglected to give testimony, and to make mention of him in his Writings: yet let every one think of this, according as it shall seem good unto him. But Moses (as I began to say) sent an Army of 12000 Men against the Madianites, chusing out of every Tribe a Thousand, and appointed Phinees Captain over those Forces, by whose courage (as a little before I have declared) both the Laws were vindicated, and Zambrias, that brake them, punished.

C H A P. VII.

The Hebrews fight against the Madianites, and overcome them, Numb. 31.

BUT the Madianites (having intelligence that their Enemies drew near them, and that they were not far from their borders) gathered their Forces together, and beset all those passages of their Country, by which they thought their Enemy might break in, preparing themselves to repel them with force and valour. Yet no sooner did Phinees with his Forces charge them, but upon the first encounter to great a multitude of the Madianites was slain, that the number of the Carcasses could hardly be reckoned. Neither were their Kings saved from the Sword: these were Och, Sur, Robeas, Ubes, and Rechem, (from whom the chiefest City of the Arabians deriveth its name, and at this day retaineth the same, and is called Rechem, and by the Grecians Petra.) The Hebrews having thus put their Enemies to flight, ravaged the whole Region, and carried away with them great spoils;

A spoils; and killing all the Inhabitants thereof, both Men and Women, they only spared the Virgins, according to the command Phinees had received from Moses: who returning home with his Army in safety, brought with him a memorable and glorious prey: of Oxen, 52067; of Asses, 60000; of Gold and silver Vessels, an incredible number. Which the Madianitis were wont to use for their domestick occasion for great was their great Riches and Luxury. There were also led Captives about 30000 Virgins. But Moses (dividing the prey) gave the fiftieth part thereof to Eleazar, and the Priests, and to the Levites another fiftieth; the remainder, he distributed amongst the People, who after this Batel lived in great security, having gotten Riches by their Valour, and Peace also to enjoy the same. Now for that Moses was well stricken in years, he appointed Jothua to succeed him in the Offices both of a Prophet, a Prince, and a Governor; for God had so commanded, that he should make choice of him to be his Successor in the Principality; for he was most expert in all divine and humane knowledge, being therein instructed by his Master Moses. About that time, the two Tribes of Gad, and Reuben, with the half Tribe of Manasses (being abundantly stored with Cattel, and all other manner of Riches) by common consent, requested Moses to give and assign to them in particular the Country of the Amorites, which not long since they had conquered by the Sword, for that it was full of rich Pastures. But he (suspecting that through fear, they sought to withdraw themselves from the War with the Canaanites, under pretext of care of their Cattel) sharply reproved them, saying, that they were fearful; and that their desire was to possess that Land which was conquered by the Valour of the whole People, to the end they might lead their lives in idleness and pleasure; and not to bear Arms with the rest of the Host, to help them to possess the Land beyond Jordan, which God had promised them, by overcoming those Nations which he commanded them to account for their Enemies. These Tribes, left he should seem to be deservedly incensed against them, answered, that neither through fear they fled danger, neither through sloth shunned labour, but only designed to leave their prey in commodious places, to the end they might be more fit to follow the War: saying, that they were ready (if so be they might receive Cities for the defence and receipt of their Wives, Children, and Substance) to follow the rest of the Army whithersoever they were conducted, and to adventure their lives with them, for the common interest. Moses satisfied with their reason in the presence of Eleazar the High-Priest, and Jothua, with the rest of the Magistrates, granted them the Land of the Amorites, with this condition, that (together with the rest of the People) they should march against their common Enemies, till the War were accomplished according to their desire: accordingly having received that which they demanded, they built them walled Cities, and left their Children, Wives and Substance in the same. Moses also built ten Cities in that Region (which are to be reckoned in the number of those 48 above mentioned) in three whereof he appointed Sanctuaries, and places of refuge, which they only might take benefit of, who fled thither for Casual Homicide; and he appointed them their term of Exile, till the time of the death of the High-Priest, under whom the Manslaughter was committed, at which time they might safely return into their Country. And during the time of their Exile, it was lawful for any of the Kin to take revenge upon the Offender by killing him, only at such time as he was found without the City of Refuge: which right he gave only to those that were a-kin, but not to others. Now the Cities of Refuge were these; in the Confines of Arabia, Bezora; in the Region of Galadena, Arimanum: in the Country of Bazan, Gaul. Moses also ordained, that after the Conquest of Canaan, three more Cities of the Levites should be appointed, to the end that they might give refuge and habitation to such sort of Offenders. At that time, when one of the Magistrates, called Salpates, of the Tribe of Manasses, was dead, and had only left place. F Daughters behind him, the Governours of the Tribe came unto Moses, and asked his counsel, Whether they should inherit the Lands of their Father: Moses answered them, That if they married within their Tribe, they should inherit; but if they made choice to marry themselves into another Tribe, then they should lose their Patrimony in their own: and for this cause made he this Ordinance, to the end that every Tribe should continually possess its proper inheritance. But whereas now there remained but thirty days only, to fulfil the number of forty years since their departure out of Egypt, Moses summoning an Assembly in that place near to Jordan, where now the City of Abila is situate, environed with fields beset with Palm-trees, as soon as he saw the People ready to hear him, spake unto them after this manner.

Moses exhorts
the people to be obedient to God's will.

The promise

Obedience to
strates.

My dear friends, and companions, in my long Travels, with whom I have run through so many dangers, since it is thought requisite by God, and mine age (amounting to the number of one hundred and twenty years) required no less, that I must depart out of this life; and since it seemeth not good in God's sight, that either I should be agent or assistant in your affairs beyond Jordan: I have resolved to imply that little space of life which remains to me, in order to establish your felicity according to the Grace that is given me; and to provide that by laying open the way unto you that leadeth to the same, I may oblige you to retain some affection for my memory. Give I therefore ear unto me, that when I have first declared unto you, wherein both your felicity and the happiness of your posterity consisteth, and have left this perpetual testimony and monument of my intire love towards you, I may willingly depart out of this life: For well I know that I deserve to be credited by you, both for that hitherto I have incessantly (in studying for your profits) never deceived you, and because the sentiments of our souls are never so pure as when they are ready to be separated from the body. Ye sons of Israel, there is but one only way whereby men attain to felicity, to wit, the favour of God, which he only gives to those that deserve it, and withdraws from those that offend him. Towards him if you continue dutiful (according as he requires, and in such manner as I by his direction have instructed you) you shall never, as he requires, and to draw all men to envy your happiness: and which is more, it shall fail to increase in virtue, and you have now obtained, shall be perpetual; and that which you want shall shortly be plentifully bestowed on you. Only take heed to be obedient to God's Will and Commandments: and never prefer any other Laws before those I have given you, or through Commandments: and never innovate any thing in your Religion. Which if you shall perform, you shall excel all other Nations in War, and be invincible by your enemies: for by God's assistance all things are possible. Moreover there are great rewards (in all the course of life) proposed unto virtue, which is also to it self a great reward: besides, by it all other blessings are easily obtained; and if you practise it among your selves, you shall both lead a blessed life, and obtain immortal glory, not only amongst strangers, but also to all posterity. These things are you to hope for, if neither you your selves violate those Laws, (which by God's command, and my means) are prefigured to you, nor suffer any other to violate the same, but in your selves continually meditate upon the understanding and use thereof. As for my self, I depart this life in fullness of joy, and the comfort to leave you in great prosperity, commending you all to the Laws of piety and prudence, and the virtue of your Guides and Magistrates, who hereafter are to take care of your safety and felicity. God likewise, under whose conduct you have lived, (and to whose favour you owe whatsoever you have received by me) will not fail to take care of you; but as long as you shall honour both him and piety, so long shall you remain in security under his protection; neither shall you want such men, who shall give you excellent instructions; whose counsels if you obey, you shall be fortunate (namely Eleazar the High-Priest, and Joshua, with the Senate and Magistrates of the Tribes) towards whom beware lest you grow stiff-neck'd; knowing and remembering this, that he that is instructed to obey well, will, when he shall attain unto dignity, govern well. Neither imagine to your selves that liberty consisteth in disobeying your Superiors, as hitherto you have done; from which sin if hereafter you shall keep your selves, you shall see your estate become still more flourishing and fortunate: And God forbid that you should ever be so exasperated against him, as you have been sometimes incensed against me. For you may remember, that I have been more often in hazard of my life by your means, than by the enemy: Which I speak not to upbraid you, for I would not leave you afflicted with the remembrance hereof, at the hour of my death, (who even at that time entertained the injury with a quiet mind) but to the end that being by me admonished, you may henceforward be wiser in those things which hereafter shall concern you, and lest you should grow contumelious against your Governours, being made proud with affluence of your riches, which you shall enjoy at such time as you have passed over Jordan, and conquered Canaan. Otherwise if made more insolent by these blessings you fall into contumacy, and contempt of virtue, God's favour will never be extended towards you; and if by your sins you shall incense him against your selves, you shall both lose the Land which you have conquered by your courage, by being shamefully oppressed by your Enemies; and being dispersed over the face of the whole earth, both the Land and Sea shall be full of the marks of your servitude; which if it should come to pass, then were it too late to repent you, that you have not observed his holy Laws. Wherefore to avoid this danger, suffer not any one of your Enemies, after your victory is once gotten, to live; and think it most conducive for your affairs, to kill all, without sparing any; for fear lest living with most conducive for your affairs, to kill all, without sparing any; for fear lest living with them, and being intangled in the like customs and delights, you fall into Idolatry, and abandon

A abandon your Country, Laws and Institutions. Moreover, I command you to destroy their gods, their Altars and Temples, as many as you shall meet with, and so to ruin all the woods consecrated to their false gods both with Fire and Sword, that there may not remain any token or memory of them any more; For so shall you more safely maintain the possession of the goods which you enjoy. But lest through ignorance of better things you become depraved, by God's commandment I have written you Laws, and a form of administration, both of the commonwealth, and your private estates: from which if you shall no ways divert, or wander, you shall prove the most fortunate People of the earth.

B When he had spoken these things, he delivered them a Book, containing in Writing their Laws, and customs of good life: which when they had received, they melted into tears, and now lamented both for the loss of their Captain, and for that they remembered how many perils he had suffered for their sakes, and how diligently he had procured their safety and security; and their sorrow increased, by their belief that they were not like to have ever again so good a Prince: and they feared likewise that God would not hereafter be so favourable unto them, in that they had not a Moses to pray for them. These thoughts produced in them a repentance of those things which (through fury) they had committed against him in the Desert, so that all the People (breaking out into tears) would admit no consolation. But Moses comforted them, and desiring them to give over weeping, encouraged them to observe faithfully the Laws of God: and so for this time the assembly dissolved. But before I proceed, I have thought fit to declare in this place what these Laws were; to the end the Reader may know how worthy they are of the virtue of so great a Law-giver as Moses, and see what our customs have been, even from the first institution of our Common-wealth. For all those things are extant which this Man wrote, so that we need not feign or affix any thing by way of ornament: we have only changed the order; and those Laws which he scatteringly set down according as he received them from God, we have generally digested into their places: whereof I thought good to admonish the Reader; for fear lest hereafter any of our Tribes coming to the view hereof, should rashly accuse me, of not having faithfully delivered the Writings and Institutions of Moses. First will I reckon up those Laws particularly which appertain to the public institution and policy of our Nation; but those that concern private customs and contracts, either betwixt our selves or foreign Nations, I have deferred to be discoursed of in that Commentary, wherein (by God's assistance) I intend to speak of our manners, and of the reasons of those Laws.

After you have conquered the Land of Canaan, and built your Cities, you shall in security reap the fruit of the Victory, if by observation of these following Commandments, you shall render your selves well-pleasing to God. Let there be one sacred City in the region of Canaan, situate in a commodious and fertile place, which God shall make choice of: in the same let there be one only Temple built, and one Altar erected of rough and unpolished stones, but chosen with such care, that when they shall be joined together, they shall appear decent and agreeable to the sight: let not the Ascent of the same be made by steps, but let the earth be easily and safely raised. But in any other City let there be neither Altar nor Temple; For God is one, and the Hebrew Nation is one. Whosoever shall blaspheme God, let him be stoned to death, hanged on a Gibbet for a day, and afterwards ignominiously and obscurely buried.

Let all the Hebrews, from their several Provinces, assemble themselves thrice in the year in the sacred City and Temple, that they may give thanks to God for the benefits they have received, and by their prayers implore his future assistance; and that by their conversation and mutual entertainments, they may increase their benevolence and love one towards another. For it is reasonable that they should know one another, who are of the same stock, and are governed by the same Laws. For which purpose nothing is so fit as their meetings after this kind of manner, which both by the sight and conversation cause deeper impression in the memory; as contrariwise, they that never see one another pass for strangers one to the other.

Besides, let the tenth part of the Fruits (besides them that are due to the Priests and Levites) which you are accustomed to sell in your Markets (being reduced into ready money) be spent on Sacrifices and Banquets in the Sacred City. For it is just to celebrate Feasts to God's honour, of the fruits of the earth, which we have received from his hands.

Let no Sacrifice be made of the Hire of an Harlot: for neither doth any thing de- light God which is gotten by ill ways: or is there greater uncleanness, than the shameful and unlawful mixture of our bodies.

Likewise if any man take reward for covering a bitch (whether she be for the chafe, H or for the flock) it is not lawful to make sacrifice unto God thereof. Let no man speak ill of those gods which other Countries reverence. Let no man spoil any strange Temple, nor take that which is dedicated to any god. Let no man wear a Garment woven of Linen and Woollen, for it belongeth only to the Priests.

Every seventh year, when the People shall be assembled together in the sacred City to sacrifice at the Feast of Tabernacles, the High-Priest from a high Pulpit (from whence he may be heard by the whole multitude) shall read the whole Law publicly; so that neither Women nor Children shall be kept from hearing the same, nor yet slaves and bond-men. For it is good that they retain the perpetual memory thereof, always imprinted in their minds: for so shall they sin the less, in that they understand what is decreed in the Law. And the Laws likewise will be of more force in the conscience when they themselves shall hear the punishments which they threaten, and with which those that dare to violate them shall be chastised: so that the will to perform the Law shall never be inwardly extinguished; and besides the remembrance will live in them, how many plagues they incur by contempt thereof. Let children especially learn these Laws, than which discipline there is not any more profitable for them, nor more conducive to their felicity. For which reason, twice a day, in the morning and in the evening, they shall be minded for what benefits they are bound to God, and how he delivered us out of the bondage of Egypt. For it is a thing in nature reasonable, to give thanks to God, as well in acknowledgement of the Goods which we have before time received, as in expectation of his future mercies. The chief of these things also are to be written over our doors, and worn on our arms; and those things which declare his power and beneficence, are to be born about, written on the head and arms, that the remembrance of God's goodness towards his People may continually be renewed. In every City let there be chosen seven Governors, such as are approved in Virtue, and able for Justice. Let each one of these Magistrates have two Ministers of the Tribe of Levi. Let those that are appointed Judges in the Cities, be held in high reputation; so that in their presence no man presume either to utter contumelies, or injurious speeches; for so shall it come to pass, that men accustomed to reverence good men, shall also exercise themselves in piety and reverence towards God. L Whatsoever seemeth good to the Judges to decree, let that be held inviolable; except it be apparent that they are corrupted with money, or that they be manifestly convicted of wrong judgment. They ought likewise to judge without respect of interest or dignity, and prefer justice before all other things; for it is contumelious to God, to suppose, that he is weaker than they, for whose sake they wrest the Law, contrary to justice, which is the power of God. He therefore that giveth judgment in favour and partiality to great men, maketh them greater than God himself. And if the Judges cannot determine of the matter in question (as it oftentimes falls out) let them refer the cause to the Holy City, and there shall the High-Priest and the Prophet, with the assistance of the Senate, determine that which shall be convenient.

The testimony of one witness shall not be received, but of three, or at least of two; whose testimony shall be made good by the examination of their behaviour and life. As for women, it is not lawful for them to bear any witness, by reason of the levity and temerity of that sex. Neither is it lawful for a bond-man to bring in testimony, by reason of his degenerate and ignoble mind; for it is to be suspected, that either for lucre sake, or for fear, he will depose an untrue testimony. And if any false witness shall be convicted of perjury, let him be subject to that penalty which he should have endured that should have been cast by his false accusation. If man-slaughter be committed in any place, and the Offender cannot be found out, and it appear not likely, that the man was slain out of malice, let there be a diligent and careful inquisition made (with rewards proposed to the discoverer;) but if no probabilities or conjectures can be gathered, then let the Magistrates of the Cities adjoining to the place where the slaughter is committed, and the Elders of the same, assembled together, and measure from the place where the dead body lieth: and let the Township that is found to be nearest, and the inhabitants thereof buy a Heifer; which they shall bring into a place unlaboured and unplanted, where the Priests, and the Levites, having cut the nerves of the Neck, shall wash their hands, and lay them upon the head of the said Heifer, and protest with a loud voice, that they, and the Magistrates with them, are not defiled with that Homicide; that they did it not, nor were they present when it was perpetrated; and they shall call and pray to God to avert his anger, and not to permit that any such misfortune ever fall out in that Country.

Aristocracy

A Aristocracy is without doubt a very good kind of Government, because it puts the authority into the hands of more honest and good men; take therefore heed that you desire no other form of Policy, but retain and continue the same, having no other Superiors but the Law which God gives you; For it sufficeth you that God is pleased to be your Governour.

Yet notwithstanding, if you shall chance to desire to have a King, see that ye elect one of your own Nation, who in all things may be studious to procure justice, and all other virtues, attributing more to God and the Laws than to his own wisdom and conduct. Let him not undertake any thing without the advice of the High-Priests, and the Elders. Let him not have divers Wives, neither let him delight to get great Treasures, or multitude of Horses: lest thereby he become so insolent, as to raise his power and will above the Laws: and if you see him affected to these things, beware lest he grow more puissant than is expedient for you.

It is not lawful for any man to remove the Land-marks either of his own Land, or any other mans whatsoever; for by them is peace preserved: But they ought to remain for ever firm and immoveable, as if God himself had placed them: since such an alteration may give occasion to great contentions, and those whose avarice cannot suffer, that bounds be set to their greediness, are easily led to contempt and violate the Laws.

If a man plant a piece of Ground, and the Trees fructify before the fourth year, the first fruits thereof shall not be offered to God, neither shall any man eat thereof by reason that they are abortive fruits: and that which is contrary to nature, is neither fit to be offered to God, nor convenient for the use of man. But all that fruit that shall grow in the fourth year (for then is the time that the Trees should bear) shall be gathered and brought into the holy City (together with the Tenth of all other fruits) and they shall be eaten during the Feast which the owner thereof maketh to his Friends, and with Orphans and Widows; but in the fifth year it shall be lawful for him to gather the fruit for himself.

Now not a Field that is planted with Vines, for it sufficeth that it nourisheth one sort of plants: so that it needeth not to be laboured and manured with the Plough. D Land is to be plowed with Oxen, and no other sort of Beasts yoked with them; but the tillage must always be performed by Beasts of the same kind.

The Seeds also ought to be clean and without any mixture; so that two or three sorts ought not to be sowed together; for nature alloweth not a commixion of things that are different.

It is not lawful also to cover the female with the male of another kind, lest this example should draw men to abominable mixtures, and to a contempt of that sex which is appropriate to them; for it often falls out, that from small beginnings, effects proceed of great and dangerous consequence. For which reason nothing ought to be admitted, by the imitation whereof, there may chance to grow a corrupting of good manners; whence it is that the Laws regulate even the lightest things, to the end to retain every one within his duty.

They that mow and reap Corn, ought not to gather up all the ears too exactly; but leave some for those that are in necessity, to the end to succour them. They likewise that plant Vines, ought to leave some clusters for the poor, and some fruit on the Olive-Trees, to the intent that they that have none of these, may gather something for their relief: for the owners of the Field shall be so far from suffering damage by the negligent gathering of their Corn, that on the contrary they shall draw profit from their charity: for God will bring to pass that their Land (who regard not their particular profit, but have care of the nourishment of those that are in necessity) shall be far more far and fertile to bring forth its fruit.

Neither is the mouth of the Ox to be muzzled, at such time as he treadeth the Corn in the Mow: For it standeth not with reason, that they who have been partakers of the labour, and have travelled for the increase of the fruits, should be restrained from all use and benefit thereof.

Neither ought the Traveller in his journey be denied to gather and taste the fruits of Autumn, but he is to be permitted to take the same freely, whether he be of the Country, or a stranger; who shall depart joyfully, in that they have been made partakers of such Fruit: but it is not lawful for them to carry any away with them.

They likewise that gather Grapes, ought not to forbid any man to taste of them, as they bear them to the Press; for it is an unjust thing, that the goods which are given by the will of God for the sustenance of man, should be denied them; that desire to taste the fruit which God gives us in season, which suddenly pass away.

Besides the two Tenths which I commanded you yearly to pay, (the one to the Levites, and the other for your Festivals) you shall for every year pay a third, to be distributed among the Poor, Widows and Orphans.

When a man hath gathered his First-fruits, he shall bring them to the Temple, and after he hath given thanks unto God (that the Land which he hath given him in possession hath brought forth fruit) and accomplish that Sacrifice, which the Law commandeth him to make, he shall give the first-fruits to the Priests. And after he hath done all that which concerneth him to do, (as well concerning the Tenths of the Levites, as those ordained for their Feasts) being ready to return home, let him present himself at the door of the Temple, and give thanks to God, That having delivered them from the grievous servitude of Egypt, he hath given them a plentiful and ample Land to enjoy; and making protestation, that he hath paid the Tenths according to Moses's Law, let him beseech God, that he will be favourable both to himself in private and the Hebrews in publick; and that he will continue those goods unto him which hitherto he hath bestowed upon him, and of his great goodness and mercy vouchsafe to increase them.

Of Marriage.
Lev. 21. 13, 14.

Free-men ought not to marry Servants.
The marriage of an Harlot.

The penalty of a woman married for a Virgin, and not found so.
Deut. 24.

Deut. 21. 15, 16, 17.
The first begotten should hold his right.

Let those that are of full years to be married; match themselves with virtuous Virgins, and such as are born of honest Parents. And he that will not take a Virgin to Wife, let him not meddle with one that is married to another man, lest he breed discontent and sorrow to her first Husband. Let no free-men match themselves with such as are slaves or bond-women, although they be thereunto moved by love; for it is a thing praise-worthy and honourable, to surmount a mans affections. Let no man marry with an Harlot, whose sacrifice God refuseth, by reason she hath dishonoured her body: besides that the children are more laudably and virtuously inclined, who are of virtuous parents, than those who issue from a shameful alliance contracted by unchaste affection. If any one that is married for Virgin, be afterwards found to the contrary, let her be brought before the Judge, and let her Husband produce all the signs he can of his suspicion, and let the new-married Wife's cause be defended by her Father or Brother, or by them that are next in blood; and if the Wife be found innocent, let her return and dwell with him that hath accused her, who may not any more refuse her, except the give him great occasion, whereunto the cannot contradict. But he that without cause, and rashly shall accuse and slander his Wife, shall be punished with thirty nine stripes; and in way of amends shall pay fifty Sicles to her Father. But if it be proved that the hath been deflowed, and hath been common, then shall she be stoned to death, for that she hath not chastly conserved her Virginity, till the time of her lawful marriage; and if she be of the Race of the Priests, she shall be burnt alive.

If any man have two wives, the one of which he holdeth in greater honour and amity, either for Love, or by reason of her Beauty, than the other; if the Son of her that is more loved, demand to have the prerogative of the elder, which is a double portion of his Father's patrimony, (for so much import our Ordinances) and challenge the same, by reason that his Father more dearly loveth his Mother than the other, let it not be granted him; For it is against justice, that the eldest should be deprived of that which appertaineth unto him by birth-right, because his Mother's condition is inferior to that of the other, on account of his Father's affection.

If

A If a man shall have corrupted a Maiden betrothed to another man, and the hath consented, they shall both be punished with death, for they are both equally guilty of sin; the man, because he hath persuaded the Maiden to prefer her lust before an honest marriage; and the maid, for suffering her self to be overcome, and abandoning her body to lewdness, either for lust or lucre sake. But if meeting her, he alone enforce her, and she have none near to succour her, let him die alone.

He that shall deflowe the Virgin that is unmarried, shall take her to Wife; but if he condescend not to the Father to take her in wedlock, he shall pay fifty Sicles, for amends of the injury.

If any man pretend to separate himself from his Wife for certain causes, such as ordinarily happen amongst married couples, let him confirm it in writing. That he will never more entertain her again; and then she may marry again unto another, and refuse the former Husband: and if it happen that she be ill used by the second, or that, he being dead, the first would take her again in marriage, it is not lawful for the Wife to return to him.

Let the Brother of him that is deceased without issue, take to Wife her whom his deceased Brother had married, and let the Son born by this second wedlock bear his name, and be brought up as the successor of his inheritance. For it is advantageous to the Commonwealth, that Families should not come to ruine, and that the goods remain to those of the same kindred. And it will be a comfort to the Widow to be joyed in marriage with one so near akin to her first Husband. But if the Brother will not take her to Wife, she shall repair to the Senate, and make this protestation, that the Brother of her deceased Husband will not marry her, (although he had desired to remain in that line, and bring forth children to it) and that by him only the memory of her deceased Husband is dishonoured. And when the Senate shall have examined the cause, why he declineth this marriage, his excuse shall be allowed of, how great or slight soever it be; and then shall the Widow unloose his shoe, and spit in his face, and tell him, that he hath deservedly suffered these things, in that he hath injured the memory of his dead Brother. And thus shall he depart out of the Court, being defamed for his whole life-time, and the Woman may marry whomsoever she please.

If any man take a Virgin prisoner, or such an one as hath been already married, and be desirous to take her to his Wife, it is not lawful for him to touch or approach her till she is shaven, and (having put on her mourning apparel hath bewailed her Parents, or Friends slain in Battel: but after she hath in this sort asswaged her sorrow, she may afterwards addict her self to mirth and marriage. For it is a matter both honest and just, that he that entertaineth her, to have issue by her, should condescend unto her will, in all wherein he may gratifie her; and that he should not only addict himself to the pursuit of his pleasure; but when the thirty days of mourning shall be expired, (for that time is sufficient for the Wife to bewail her Friends) then may she hearken after marriage. And if after he hath had his pleasure with her, it happen that he dislike her, and will not accept her for his Wife, he can no more make her his slave, but she may go whithersoever she pleaseth, for that she beareth with her, her liberty.

All those Children that shall make no reckoning of their Fathers and Mothers, nor shew them that honour which belongeth to them, but contemn them, and behave themselves insolently towards them, the Parents, whom Nature hath made their Judges, shall begin by remonstrating to them, that they were matched together in Matrimony, not for their pleasure sake, or that by uniting their possessions, they might become the richer, but to the end they might beget Children, who might nourish them in their age, and minister unto them in their necessities; that they had received them at God's hands with great thanksgivings and infinite joy, and brought them up with care and diligence, sparing nothing that conduced to their sustentance or instruction. But since some pardon is to be allowed to the follies of youth, let it suffice, my Son, that hitherto you have forgotten your duty, recollect your self and grow wise; remembering that God is grievously offended against those who disobey or disdain their Parents, because he is the Father of all mankind; and takes himself to be concerned in that dishonour which is done unto those that bear that name, when they receive not such duty from their Childrens hands as he commandeth; and that the Law likewise inflicteth an inevitable punishment against such, which I should be very sorry if thou shouldst be so unhappy as to incur. If by these remonstrances the child amend, it is fit to pardon him the faults committed by him, rather out of ignorance than malice; for in so doing, the Law-giver shall be accounted wise, and the Parents shall be held happy, when they

See that their Son or Daughter is exempt from the punishment, which the Laws appoint. But if such speeches and instructions of the Father are set light by the Son, let the Laws be irreconcilable enemies against such continual outrages, and let him be dragged out of the City, in the fight and presence of all the people, and there let him be stoned to death: and after the offender hath lain a whole day in the sight of the people, let him be buried by night. In like manner ought they to be buried, who for any occasion whatsoever are contemned and executed by Justice.

Let the Enemy also be interred after the same manner, and let no dead man lie unburied, after such time as he hath been judged, and hath satisfied the Laws.

It is not lawful for any Hebrew to lend upon Usury, neither money, nor meat, or drinke; for it is an unjust thing to make profit of the misery of those of our Nation: but it is better to succour their necessities, and expect God's retribution, as a gain to them, who practise such kind of benefits. But they that have borrowed either money, or any fruit, dry or moist, when by the favour and assistance of God, they shall reap their own harvest, and gather their fruit, let them make a willing restitution to those that have lent them, as if they had laid them up for themselves, to possess at such time as they had need of them. But if there be any so shameless as they will not make satisfaction, yet let not the Creditor enter into their house to take a Pawn, before the Judges have given order, that the pledge be demanded at their door; and then the debtor without contradiction shall bring it to him, because it is not lawful for him to upbraid him that comes armed with the Law. If he, of whom the Pledge is taken, have sufficient ability, the Creditor may retain the Gage, till such time as he be paid; but if he be poor, he shall restore him his Pawn before the Sun-set, and especially if it be Garments with which he may cover himself in the night; for God hath compassion on those that are poor. It is not lawful to receive in way of Gage either a Mill, or ought else that belongeth thereunto, lest any Debtor should be deprived of the necessary Instruments to provide his Victuals with, and endure any misery through want of the means to get his living. Let him that retaineth a Free-man in Bondage be punished with death; but he that hath stolen either Gold or Silver, let him restore it twofold.

If any man kill such as break into houses, to rob, or that break walls; let not such an one be punished. Whoso shall steal a Beast, shall restore four times the value for it; except it be an Ox, for which he shall satisfy fivefold: and if the Thief want means to pay this penalty, let him be their slave against whom he hath trespassed, and at whose suite he is condemned. If any one be sold unto one of his own Tribe, let him serve him six years; and in the seventh year, he shall depart with liberty. But if during the time that he remaineth with the buyer, he beget any Child upon a female fellow-slave, and that he be willing to serve, by reason of the good affection that he beareth unto the house; in the year of Jubile which happeneth every fiftieth year let him be set at liberty, leading away with him his Children, and Wife, with freedom. If any man find Money or Gold by the way, let him seek out him that hath lost it, and make known the place where he found it, to the intent he may restore it; knowing that the profit is not good which cometh by another man's injury. The like is to be done with Beasts: for if any man find them strayed in the Desert, and find not out the owner, let him presently keep them by him, taking God to witness, that he hath no design to detain with him another man's goods. If any man find another mans Beasts mired or bog'd, let him not pass further, but succour them, and help to save them, as if they were his own.

Let each man direct the ignorant Traveller in his way, and set him in the right path, if he wander, without deluding him, or hindring him in his necessity, or misleading him in his journey. Let no man speak ill of him that is either absent, or deaf. If any man be stricken in a quarrel, and it be not with a weapon, let him that struck him be presently punished, by receiving the like number of blows as he hath given. But if he be carried into his house, and lie sick upon it divers days, and in the end die thereof, he that struck him shall not be punished as a Murderer. And if he escape, and during the time of his sickness, hath been greatly hindered, and charged; then let him that struck him, pay all the charges he hath been at during the time he kept his Bed; and satisfy the Physicians. He that with his foot shall strike a woman with Child, if the woman miscarry, he shall be, by the Judges, amerced in a sum of money, for that he hath lessened the number of the people, by the loss of him that is dead in his Mothers Womb. Let him likewise be condemned to pay a sum of money unto the Husband: but if the Woman die of the stroke, he that offered the violence, shall be punished with death; because the Law justly requireth, that Life be satisfied with Life.

A Let not any one among the Israelites use any mortal Poyson, or Drug, that may do hurt to any man, and if any be found with such things about him, let him die, because it is just that he suffer the evil which he had prepared for another. Whoso hath maimed any man, or pulled out his eye, let him in like manner be maimed and blinded, being deprived of the same member of his body whereof he hath deprived another man; except he that is maimed, had rather have a pecuniary amends: for the Law remitteth it to the election of the offended, to estimate his injury; and if he will be more severe, he may. If any one have an Ox that striketh with his horn, let him kill him: and if the same Ox striketh and killeth any man in the Field or Mow, let him be stoned to death, and let no man eat the flesh thereof. And if it be proved, that the Master hath heretofore known the quality of the Beast, and hath not taken order he should do no harm, let him also be put to death, as being the author of the murder committed by the Ox. But if the said Ox kill a slave, either male or Female, he shall be stoned; and the owner thereof shall pay thirty Sicles to the Master of the slave that is slain. If one Ox be stricken by another, so as he die thereof, let both of them (both that which was dead, and that which struck the other to death) be sold, and the price thereof parted equally betwixt both the owners. They that dig a Pit or Cistern, must be careful that they inclose and fence it with Planks or Bars, not to hinder any man from drawing water, but lest any man by misfortune fall into the same. And if any man's Beast fall into the same unfenced Pit, the owner of the Pit shall pay to the owner of the Beast the price thereof: Also a Wall shall be made round the roofs of houses, to the end no body may fall from thence. Let him that receiveth any thing in trust, keep it carefully, as a thing sacred; and let neither man nor woman attempt to alien that which is committed to his custody, although thereby he might gain much Gold, and although there were no man that could convince him thereof. For since the conscience knoweth the same, every one ought to endeavour to deal uprightly; and supposing himself a sufficient witness against himself, let him do those things which are laudable in the sight of men, but especially that which is pleasing to God, from whose sight no wrongful dealing is concealed. If notwithstanding he to whom this trust is committed, shall chance (without any fraud on his part) to lose the thing that is so left in trust, let him present himself before seven Judges, and there take an oath, that nothing is lost by his will, or consent, and that he hath not converted any part thereof to his own use; whereupon let him be dismissed, without any further inquiry. But if he have made use of the least part of that which hath been committed to his charge and trust, and that he happen to lose it, he shall be condemned to restore all that was committed to his keeping. As it hath been ordained in matters of trust, the like is decreed touching Hire due unto the Labourer: let each man take heed lest he defraud a Poor man of his Hire; knowing that God gave him his Hands instead of Lands and other Possessions. For which cause, the payment of Hire ought not to be deferred, but satisfied the same day; by reason, that God permitteth not, that the Labourer should lose the fruit of his travel. The Children shall not be punished for the misdeeds of their Parents; for if they be virtuous, and are begotten by lewd Fathers, they rather deserve that men should have compassion of them, than hate them: neither are the offences of the Children to be imputed to the Parents, by reason that youth oftentimes engageth it self in those follies, which it never learned by examples, and for which it endureth not to be reproved. Voluntary Eunuchs are to be detested, and their company to be fled, because they have deprived themselves of the means which God hath given to men, for the increase of mankind. Such people therefore are to be driven far from us, and esteemed wholly inexcusable, as having killed their children before they be born. For it is a matter very manifest, that their spirits being effeminate, their bodies also are degenerate. Each thing also that is monstrous to behold, is to be driven away: neither is it lawful to Geld either Men or Beasts. Let this be the disposition of those Laws, wherewith you shall be Policed and Governed in time of Peace; to the end God may be favourable unto you, and I beseech him to give you grace to use them in good order, and without alteration. And since it cannot otherwise be, but that humane affairs must sometimes fall into troubles and dangers, sometimes beyond desire and expectation, and sometimes of set purpose; I will briefly give you some advice touching that point; to the intent, that being fore-instructed of that which you ought to do, you may prevent, and not fall into any danger and calamity.

G I with that when you have conquered the Country which God hath designed for you, by his assistance and your labour, you may possess the same in security and peace; and that strangers may not levy Armies to overthrow you, nor any civil Mutiny be raised raised amongst you, which may cause what hath been well ordered and decreed H by your Ancestors, to come to nought, when you shall abandon the Laws which God hath given you. Live therefore, and persist to conform you selves to those Laws, which both God hath approved for good, and hath also given you. But if perhaps you or your successors hereafter, shall be obliged to undertake a War, I wish it may happen without the Confines of your Country: but if the matter must needs be tried by the Sword, you shall send certain Heralds to your declared Enemies. For before you enter battel, it shall be requisite first of all to parley with them, and to declare unto them, that you have a great Army, and Horses, and Weapons, and (besides all these) that you have God's favour and assistance; and you shall desire them, that you may not be enforced to War against them, nor to make booty of their Goods, and to carry them away captive. If they condescend to any reasonable conditions, then entertain Peace; but if they condemn this proposal, you shall lead forth your Army against them, having God for your General, and Sovereign Conductor; and for his Lieutenant, him whom you your selves shall chuse, surpassing all the rest in Valour. For when there are divers Commanders, it falleth out, that that which ought readily to be executed, is hindered, and commonly the issue is unfortunate. Let your Army generally consist of men that are strong in body, and hardy in courage; and remove from your Army him that is fearful, lest such men hapning to fly when they ought to fight, give your Enemies the advantage. Let them also be free from War, who having built a new house, have not enjoyed the same for a years space; as also he that hath K planted a Vineyard, and hath not gathered the fruit thereof; and besides these, he that hath wedded a Wife, and hath not as yet brought her home to his house: lest through the desire of these things, and of reserving themselves to their dear forsaken pleasures, they fight but faintly and coldly.

But when you have brought your Army into the field, take heed you commit no outrage: and when you shall assault any Cities, if you fortune to need Wood to make Engines of, see you cut not down Fruit-trees, but spare them; remembering, that they are planted for the good of men; and that if they could speak, they would accuse you; that without cause they are ill treated, against all right; and that if they had the power to depart from thence, they would transplant themselves into another L Country.

But when the Battel is ended, and the day is yours, kill all those Enemies that resisted you in the Fight; the rest reserve as your Tributaries (except the people of the Land of Canaan, for they, with all their Families, are to be exterminated.) Beware also (but especially in War) that neither a Woman use a Mans apparel, nor a Man that of a Womens.

These are the Laws which Moses left. He gave them likewise certain Institutions, (which he had written forty years before,) whereof we will speak in another Treatise. Some few days after (for he assembled the people six days together) he gave them his blessing, and pronounced his maledictions against those which should not live according to his Laws, but should transgress the determinations thereof: He read also unto them a Canticle of six measures (which he had registred in the holy Book) containing a prediction of things to come, according to which, all things have and do fall out, without varying any ways from the truth. These Volumes and the Ark he gave to the Priests; in which he also placed the Ten Commandments written in the two Tables. He committed also unto them the custody of the Tabernacle. He likewise exhorted the people that (when by force they had conquered the promised Country, and where planted therein) they should not forget the injury which the Amalekites had done them, but that they should lead forth their Army against them, and take vengeance of the wrongs they had done them, at such time, as they were in the Desert. And he commanded them that as soon as they had taken the Country of Canaan, they should exterminate and extinguish all the people.

He commanded them also to erect an Altar towards the East not far from the City of Sichem, between the two Mountains, Garizim on the right hand, and the other called Gehal on the left, and that distributing the people into two parts (six Tribes in every part) they should place them on these Mountains. And he commanded that the Levites and Priests should be with them, and that they that were upon the Mountain of Garizim, should pray to God, to multiply his blessings upon them that are zealous of his service, and careful of the conservation of his Laws which had been given them by Moses. The Six other also were appointed to answer them: and when these six last had prayed, the six first were to answer them: and confirm that which they had pronounced. This done, they pronounced maledictions against the transgressors (each one answering

A answering the other) in ratification of that which had been spoken. He reduced also into writing these blessings and curses, to the intent that the memory thereof might never be suppressed or extinguished by time which he also (being near his death) caused to be written on the Altar, on the two sides thereof, and permitted the people to come near it only that day, and there to offer burnt-offerings; which is forbidden to them by the Law. These Ordinances did Moses establish, and these the Hebrew Nation observe inviolably, even unto this day.

On the next morning he re-assembled all the people, with their Wives and Children; he likewise commanded, the slaves should be present, binding them by an oath to maintain and keep the Laws; and that diligently tying themselves to the will of God, they should not so much esteem either their kindred, or means, or perils, or any other cause whatsoever, as thereby to be driven to neglect the Laws; or depart from the ordinances thereof: but whether any one of their kindred, or any City whatsoever, should seek to alter and disturb the same, or strive to weaken the Authority thereof, that both in particular and publick, they should expose themselves and endeavour to punish them: and if they should fortune to take such a City, they should raze and utterly deface the same; and if it were possible, not leave one stone upon another, but destroy the foundation. But if they were too feeble to take such a revenge, yet, that they should make it known, that they were not consenting to their impiety. Hereunto the whole multitude consented, and promised with an oath. He afterwards told them, how the people should know when the Sacrifices were agreeable unto God; and how they ought to march out to Battel, taking a sign from the stones of the High-Priests Rational, of which I have fore-spoken.

Josua likewise, during the life, and in the presence of Moses, prophesied whatsoever he intended to perform for the profit of the people, either abroad in the administration of War, or at home in prescribing Laws: and preparing them to that order of life which was newly prescribed them, he told them that by instructions from God he prophesied, that if they violated their Country Religion, they should not escape destruction; their Country should be filled with Foreign Arms, their Cities sackt, their Temple burnt, and themselves sold under the Spear; and that they should serve a Nation which would not be moved or touched with commiseration of their afflictions and miseries: and, at length, they should too late and unprofitably repent of their error: yet, that God, their establisher, would restore the Cities to the ancient Citizens, and the Temple to his people; and that this should come to pass, not only once but also many times. Then did Moses also appoint Josua to lead his Army against the Canaanites, promising him that God would be assisting to his Actions, and wishing all sort of happiness to the people.

Seeing that (saith he) I go unto mine Ancestors, and God hath prefixed this day for my departure, it is very just, that living as yet, and standing in your presence, I give him thanks for the care and providence, which he hath hitherto had of your affairs, not only in delivering you from so many evils, but also in largely imparting his blessings unto you; and for that he hath always favorably helped me, whilst I endeavoured by my labour and care to reduce your fortunes to a better state: for it is he which hath given both the beginning and the accomplishment, making use of me but as his Minister and Servant in all that good which hath been done to his people. For all which things I have thought requisite, in departing from you, to bless the goodness of God, who in time to come shall have the care and charge of you: and to acquit my self of that debt, I leave you this in remembrance, which is, that you ought to serve and honour him, and reverence the Ordinances which he hath given you; whereby continuing his favour towards you, he will grant you grace to preserve and keep this excellent gift. Truly a Law-giver that were no more than a man, would be greatly displeased with those who should violate his Ordinances, and let them at nought: do not you therefore tempt God, who is provoked unto anger, when those Laws, which he himself hath established, and given you, shall be contemned and neglected.

Whilst Moses pronounced these his last words, and foretold to the Tribes their several destinies, and wished them a thousand blessings, the whole Multitude brake into tears; and the Women beating their breasts, shewed the sorrow they referred for his death. The Children likewise lamented, because that in their tender years they had understood the virtue and famous acts of Moses; and betwixt the elder and younger sort, there was as it were a conflict who should weep most bitterly: for the one understanding of how worthy a Governour they were deprived, lamented the time to come; and the other were perplexed, because they should then lose him, they before had sufficiently tasted and made tryal how great his virtue was. But how great the Compassion and complaint of the people was, may be conjectured by this that then befel the Prophet. For although although he were assuredly persuaded, that a man is not to lament at the instant of his death, (because it happens to him both according to the Will of God, and the Law of Nature) yet beholding the affection of the People, he could not refrain himself from tears. After which, he walkt towards the place where he was to die, and they all followed him weeping. Then did Moses (beckoning with his hand) warn them from afar off that they should stand still, and keep their places; and he desired them that were nearest him, by word of mouth, not to afflict him any longer, by following him with so many testimonies of affection. Accordingly, to obey him, they stood still, and all together bewailed their calamity in so great and so general a loss, only the Senators Elezar the High-Priest, and the chief Captain Joshua accompanied him. And when he was arrived on the Mountain called Abarim (which is very high, and situate near Jericho, from whence he might discover the greater part of the Land of Canaan) he dismissed the Elders, and whilst with mutual embraces he took his last leave of Elezar and Joshua, and discoursed with them, a Cloud suddenly environed him, and he was carried away into a certain Valley: but the Holy Books which he left us, say that he died, fearing left for the excellency of his virtue, they might report that he was taken up into Heaven. The whole time of his Life was 120 years, the third part whereof wanting a month, he spent in government of this great People. He died the last month of the year, and the first day of that month which the Macedonians call Dyrras; and our Country-men, Adar. He was, of all men that ever lived, the wisest; and who, in execution of his good counsels, had no man to equal him. Moreover, in eloquence he was incomparable, and in dexterity and grace to entertain and persuade the People, he had no second; and so were his passions always governed by his wisdom, that he seemed utterly to want them, and only to know the names of those passions of which he saw the effects in other men. His skill in War may give him a rank amongst the greatest Captains, and no man ever had the gift of Prophecy in so high a degree; for his words seemed so many Oracles, and that as inspired to him by God himself. The People mourned for him 30 days: nor were they ever seized with so extreme grief, as they were at this time, when the Prophet died; neither did he only leave behind him a present desire of him, but a great estimation amongst all men, who have ever chanced to read and examine his Writings, and by them estimated his virtues. And these are the things which I thought good to say of the death of Moses.

Moses when he died, was 120 years old. Amongst the Hebrews, Adar is the 12 month, but amongst us it is called March. Ver. 10. Moses was a good Governor, and a great Prophet.

A The Fifth Book of the Antiquities of the J E W S; Written by FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS.

The Contents of the Chapters of the Fifth Book.

1. How Joshua, General of the Hebrews, having overcome and slain the Canaanites, divided their Land amongst the Tribes by lot.
2. How after the death of the General, the Israelites (neglecting the Offices of their Forefathers) fell into extreme Calamities: and through a Civil War that was raised amongst them, there were but 600 of the Tribe of Benjamin left alive.
3. How, for their impiety, the People of Israel were delivered by God into Captivity, under the Assyrians.
4. Their Liberty by Cenez.
5. How the People were once more overcome by the Moabites, and exempt from servitude by Jodes, otherwise called Ehud.
6. How they were brought under the subjection of the Canaanites, and restored to their Liberty by Barac.
7. How the Amalekites having entered the Country of the Israelites, and conquered them, possessed and spoiled the same for the space of seven years.
8. How Gideon delivered the People.
9. How some Successors of Gideon waged War against the Neighbour Nations round about them.
10. Of Samson's strength, and what mischiefs he did in Palastine.
11. How the Sons of Eli the Prophet were slain in Battel by the Palastines.
12. How Eli (hearing of the death of his Sons, and the loss of the Ark) fell down from his Seat, and died.

- D How Joshua, General of the Hebrews, having overcome and slain the Canaanites, divided their Land amongst the Tribes by lot.

After Moses was taken from amongst them (in the manner which I have declared) the last duties were paid to him; and the time of mourning was past. Joshua commanded the People to prepare themselves; and to march forward to Battel. He sent Spies likewise to Jericho who might both sound their Enemies' minds, and discover their Forces. Soon after he dislodged, and encamped in the open field, intending, with all expedition, to pass the River of Jordan, as soon as any opportunity offered it self. Then assembled he the Princes of the Tribes of Rubben and Gad; and of the half-Tribe of Manassas (for to this half-Tribe the Country of the Amorites, which was the seventh part of Canaan, was given for its habitation) and removing them of this care which Moses had taken of them even to his death; he exhorted them to perform with joy what they had promised him; as they were obliged; both in acknowledgment of the affection which he had shewed to them; and for the common advantage. They shewed themselves ready and willing to perform that which he commanded them; and they furnished 30000 men; After thus departing from the City of Jericho he drew towards Jordan; and marched forward some 60 Furlongs: When he was encamped, the Spies returned again, and presenting themselves unto him, desired him of the whole state of the Canaanites. For being unknown and unsuspected; upon their arrival they observed and viewed the walls and strength of the City at their pleasure; searching which of them were more or less defended, and which of the gates were easiest or hardest to assault; neither did any of them offer any offence unto them: for whilst they thus spied into, and viewed every place, the Citizens rather interdicted their diligence to be the curiosity of strangers, than suspected that they intended any hostile stratagem. About the shutting in of the evening, they retired themselves into a certain Hill: they that joined to the walls, whither they had been directed to take their retreat; and whilst after Supper they consulted about their return, the King advanced, and certain Spies sent out of the Hebrews Camp, had surveyed the City, and taken up their Lodging in Rabab's house, with intent to conceal themselves till they might get opportunity to depart; sent Officers to apprehend them; to the end they being brought before him, he might by Torture extort from them the cause and reason why they came into the City. But Rabab, having gotten some private intelligence of it, hid the Spies under certain

Packs of Linen, which she dried near the walls, and told them that were sent by the King, that certain strangers a little before Sun-set had sutt in her house; but that they were departed; and if they were suspected by the King as persons that intended any detriment to the City, they might with little labour and pursuit be overtaken in their way. They hearing the woman speak after this manner, and imagining no subtlety or deceit in her, returned back without searching the Hoftery, and went in pursuit and search after them every way, tracking every path, where they might be suspected to travel towards Jordan. But having no tidings of them they desired any further to pursue them. No sooner was the Tumult appeared, but Rahab called forth the Spies, and told them the dangers to which she had exposed her self for their security (for had she been convinced to have concealed them, both she and all her family had miserably perished.) She therefore desired them, to swear to her that when they should take Jericho, and kill all the inhabitants with the sword, (as God had told her they should) they would save the life of her and her family as she had saved theirs.

This said, she dismissed them, to the end they might return home again. After they had with many thanks protested, and swore to her, to acknowledge her kindness not in words, but in deeds; and had advised her that when she should perceive the City ready to be surprized, she should retire all her substance, and all those that appertained unto her, into her house; and that before the door thereof, she should hang a Red Cloth, to the intent that the General perceiving the same, might inhibit the Soldiers from pillaging and spoiling her house: (for (said they) we will give him notice hereof, (by reason of that willing forwardness that hath been in thee to save our lives) and if by misfortune any of thy Friends die in the Combat, do not impute the fault unto us, and we beseech God (by whom we have sworn) that he be not displeased against any of us, but only against such as falsifie their oaths. Having after this manner made the Covenant, they were let down with a rope from the wall; and when they were arrived in safety among their Nation, they recounted unto them all that happened since their arrival in the City. Joshua hereupon declared unto Elezazar the High Priest and the rest of the Elders, what oath his Spies had made to Rahab; and all of them ratified the same. But the General was peevish and troubled, for that he knew not which way to pass the River of Jordan, by reason that for the present it was very deep; and without Bridges. For before that time there was not any Bridge built thereon; and if they would have built one, the Enemy would have interrupted them: besides that, there were not any places convenient to stay in. But God made him a promise that he would make the waters fall, and give them passage; Joshua therefore waited with his Army two days; and then he passed over the River in this manner. The Priests marched first with the Ark; after them went the Levites bearing the Tabernacle, and those Vessels which were destined for Sacrifice; then followed the whole multitude distinguished in their Tribes, having inclosed within their Battles the Women and Children; whereby they might be the more secure from the force of the stream. But when the Priests had trusted, and found the River passable; and the water decreased, and that the current thereof was not so violent, but that in the bottom there was good footing (so that it was fordable) then all of them without fear passed over, finding all things assuredly performed unto them which God had promised unto them; but the Priests kept in the midst of the Channel until the multitude were past over, and were in security; and when every one had gotten to the other Bank, the Priests came out, permitting the River to flow according to its free and ordinary course; which presently flowing, grew to that greatness and swiftness which it had at first. Now when the Israhelites had marched fifty Furlongs, they encamped about ten Furlongs from Jericho. But Joshua built an Altar of twelve stones (which every one of the Princes of the Tribes had gathered out of the Channel of Jordan, by his order) to the end it might be a Monument of the prodigious restraint of the River; and on the same he sacrificed to God; and the solemnity of the Passover was celebrated in that place; and at that time the Army was in as great a plenty as ever it had been in necessity; for they reaped the Corn of the Canaanites, (which at that time was ripe) and carried away much other prey. In the same season, likewise their nourishment of Manna failed them, whereon they had fed for the space of forty years. And whereas the Israhelites did all these things with security, and freely, and the Canaanites never failed out against them, but dismayed with fear kept themselves up within their walls; Joshua resolved to besiege them in their Cities: so that on the first day of the Feast, the Priests bearing the Ark, and guarded on every side with Troops of Armed Men, drew near Jericho, lounding seven Horns, thereby to animate the Soldiers to behave themselves manfully; and they walked about the walls, being attended by the Senate, neither did they any other thing but blow their

Horns,

A Horns, and so returned back into their Camp. Which when they had done for the space of six days, on the seventh Joshua assembled the Army and all the people, bringing them joyful news of the City, which that day should be taken without labour, (the walls falling down of their own accord, and without mans hand, and yielding them free passage and entrance into the City) and he encouraged them to kill all those whom they met, and not to give over the slaughter of their Enemies, although they were weary of prey, or to permit the Enemy, in any fort, to flee, but that they should extinguish and root out all that had life, reserving nothing for prey or private profit. He commanded likewise that all the gold and silver that was found should be brought into one place, to offer to God as the first-fruits, and in thanksgiving for his assistance: and that only Rahab with her Kindred should be spared, by reason of the oath which the Spies had sworn unto her. This said, he advanced his Army towards the City; then did they once more walk round about the City, the Ark marching before them, and encouraging them to Valour by the sound of their Cornets. And after they had environed the walls seven times, and had a little reposed themselves, the walls fell (though the Hebrews had forced no Engine, nor used any other violence against them.) So that they entering into the City, slew all those that were therein, who were already discomfited by the sudden and unexpected overthrow of their walls, and throw their fudden fear made unfit to fight; so that they were slain in their streets, finding neither refuge nor relief to succour them: and so great was the slaughter, that they neither spared Women nor Children, but filled the City with dead Carcasses, which at length being set on fire served for a Funeral flame to consume them; and with like fury they ravaged and burnt the houses of the Country; only Rahab and her household, (who kept themselves within her house) were saved by the Spies: and being brought to Joshua's presence, he gave her thanks, for saving his Spies, and promised her that he would reward her courtships, and soon after he gave her possessions, and ever held her in great honour. All of the City which the fire spared, the Sword consumed. And Joshua pronounced Curses against those, who should afterward endeavour to erect that which he had ruined: namely, that he that should lay the first foundation, should be deprived of his first begotten Son; and he that should finish the work, might lose his youngest Son; and it hath pleased God that this imprecation hath not been frustrate, as hereafter shall be shewn. At the surprize and sack of the City, there was gathered an infinite quantity of Gold, Silver, and Bras; and none but one man brake the Edict, or sought any prey or lucre for himself. These spoils Joshua delivered to the Priests to be laid up in the Treasury; and after this manner was the City of Jericho destroyed. But Achar the Son of Zebedias of the Tribe of Judah, having got the King's Coat embowered with Gold, and an Ingot of Gold of two hundred Sicles in weight, and thinking in himself that it were not just that the profit he had got by the hazard of his Life, should be taken from him, and presented to God, who had no need thereof; he digged a Pit in his Tent, and buried his spoils therein, thinking by this means to defraud God as well as his Companions. At that time their Tents were pitched in a place called Gilgal, which signifieth Enfranchised, because being delivered from the affliction of Egypt, and the penury of the Desert, they thought they had nothing more to fear. But some few days after the destruction of Jericho, Joshua sent out three thousand Armed men against Ain (a City situate a little above Jericho) who encountering with the Ainities in Battel, and by them put to flight, lost thirty six of their company. The news of which disaster being brought to the Camp, the Israhelites were seized with exceeding grief, not only for the men they had lost (which were all of them valiant men, and worthy of honour) but also by reason of the despair they conceived of their future success. For whereas they had persuaded themselves that they were already Masters of the field, and that their Army should be always Victorious, according as God had promised them, they saw, on the contrary, that this success had raised the hearts of their adversaries; so that cloathing themselves with sack-cloth, they spent three days in tears and lamentations without tasting any meat; so grievously were they afflicted with the defeat that had hapned, Joshua seeing the Army dejected after this manner, falling on his face to the earth, addressed himself to God, saying, We have not been induced by our own temerity to attempt the conquest of this Land by force; but we have been hereto encouraged by thy Servant, to whom thou hast promised, by divers signs, (that thou wouldst give us this Country to inhabit in, and that our Army should have always the victory in Battel, and of these thy promises we have oftentimes experienced the event. But now, beyond all expectation (having received an overthrow, and lost some of our Soldiers) being terrified by this accident, and suspicious of thy promises to Moles, we both abjain from War, and (after so many enterprises of War) we cannot hope any fortunate or successful proceedings. But be thou assistant unto us H O Lord, (who art Almighty) and cast by thy mercy, change our present sorrow into joy, our discomfiment into confidence, and give us victory. Joshua having made this prayer, God presently commanded him to arise, and purge the Army of that sacrilege that had happened therein, and of a Theft committed by one of the multitude, who was so hardy as to violate and conceal those things which were consecrated to him, assuring him, that that was the cause of the present calamity: but as soon as he had searched out, and punished the sacrilege, the Israelites should become fortunate, and obtain the victory.

This Oracle Joshua declared to the people, and calling for the High Priest and the Magistrates, he cast lots upon the Tribes; and when the lot had fallen on the Tribe of Juda, it was again cast by Families; and when again the Sacrilege was found to be committed in Zachariab's Family, they cast the same once more man by man, and it fell upon Achkar: who unable to hide what was discovered by God himself, confessed the fact, and brought forth those things which he had concealed: whereupon being presently put to death, he was by night buried after an ignominious manner, according as he deserved. But Joshua having purified the people, led them forth against Ain, and laying Ambuscado by night above the City, early in the morning he drew the Enemy out to fight, who boldly broke forth (being encouraged by their former victory;) but Jo- shua making a shew of Retreat, drew them farther off from the City, imagining that the Israelites fled, and that they should gain a second victory over them. But when Joshua suddenly made a stand, and charged them, and gave a Signal unto those that lay in ambush, they march all together towards the City, and easily entered the gates;
where, and on the Walls, stood divers of the inhabitants as spectators (as they thought) of their achieved victory. In this manner was the City taken and all that were therein slain, Joshua on the other side pressed those in such manner, with whom he maintained skirmish, that they turned their backs, and fled towards the City, as if it had been in the same state as they left it: but when they perceived that it was taken, and saw both it, their Wives and Children consumed with fire, they scattered themselves about the fields, not being able to rally, by reason of their disorder. By this overthrow of the Ainities, there were a great number of Women, and Children, and Bond slaves taken Captive, and store of all sorts of moveables. The Hebrews also became Lords of much Cattel, and gathered a great quantity of Silver (for the Country was rich.) All which Joshua upon his return to Gilgal distributed amongst the Soldiers. But the Gi- beonites (who dwelt not far from Jerusalem) understanding what had happened to them of Jericho and the Ainities, and fearing lest the like misfortune might fall upon themselves, thought it to no purpose to endeavour to move him by their prayers, because they knew that he warred with a resolution, utterly to root out and extinguish the Nation of the Canaanites from off the earth. They therefore perswaded the Cepherites and Cathierimites their neighbours to join with them, in order to contract an alliance with the Hebrews, as the only means to secure themselves from the danger which threatened them. Which counsel of theirs being accepted, they sent ambassadors to Joshua, M such men as they thought most capable and wisest amongst them in the affairs of the Commonwealth, to treat a peace betwixt them and the Israelites; and knowing that it would be very dangerous for them, if they should say that they were Canaanites; and that on the contrary they should avoid the danger, if they protested that they had no community or alliance with them, but dwelt far from them; they told Joshua, that (being incited by his fame) they had undertaken a long journey, the truth whereof he might conjecture by their habits; which upon their setting forth were new, but by their long journey were quite worn, to which purpose they had put on old garments, to the end to colour their subtle insinuation. Standing up therefore in the midst of the multitude (attired after this manner) they told them that they were sent by the Gibeonites, and the neighbouring Cities (far distant from that Country) to treat and ratify a Peace between them. For knowing well that the Country of Canaan was given unto them by the favour of God, to the end they should be masters and possessors thereof, they were much rejoiced thereat, and desired to be received as their Confederates. By these words, and the oldness of their garments, and the pretence of their long journey, they perswaded the Hebrews to enter and accord an amity with them. And the High Priest Eleazar with the Council of the Elders were unto them, that they should be reputed for Friends and Allies, and that no hostile action should be enterprized against them; the people likewise approved the alliance. After this, Joshua encamping with his Army upon their confines, and understanding that the Gibeonites dwelt not far from Jerusalem, and that O they likewise were of the race of the Canaanites, he sent for the principal among them, and upbraided them with their deceit: whereunto they answered, that they had no other

A other means to produce their safety and security, and for that cause they had used this fraud. Whereupon he called to him Eleazar the High Priest, and the Council of the Elders; and it was resolved not to infringe the Oath made to them, but that they should be obliged to serve for the publick works; Whereupon they were adjudged to attend on these services: and by this means delivered they themselves from their imminent peril. But the King of Jerusalem was much incited against the Gibeonites, for that they had revolted and submitted to Joshua; and he assembled together the Kings of his neighbour Nations, to make War against them. The Gibeonites perceiving the danger they were in, and how the Enemy prepared to assault them, and to that end had pitched their Tents near a certain Fountain not far from the City, they desired Joshua to assist and defend them. For their affairs were in that state that they expected death from the hands of their Friends: and contrariwise hoped for help from those Hebrews, with whom they had contracted amity, notwithstanding that they arrived in that Country to destroy the whole Nation of the Canaanites. Joshua therefore (hasting onward with his whole Army to give them assistance, and marching both day and night) early in the morning charged the Enemy (at such time as he intended his assault) and having put them to flight, he pursued them by a steep tract, which place is called Bethlora, where he saw manifestly that God fought for him by the Thunder, Lightning and Hail that fell, at that time, far bigger than was accustomed. The day also (the like whereof was never heard before) was lengthened, least by the speedy approach of the night the Enemy
C should escape from the Victor: and Joshua took all those five Kings in a certain Cave near Makkedah, where they were hidden, and condemned them all to death. And that this day was longer than ordinary, it is registered in the sacred Volumes, which are reserved in the Temple. After this wonderful success, Joshua led his Army to the Mountains of Canaan, where having made a great slaughter of men, and taken rich booty, he brought back his Army to Gilgal. Now when the renown of the Hebrews valiant acts, and their giving no quarter to any one person of their Enemies, was bruted abroad amongst the neighbour Nations, they were possessed with great fear: so that the Kings of the Canaanites, that bordered upon Libanus, and they also of the Plain of Canaan, joined themselves Confederates with the Philistines, and all of them encamped near D Bethlora, (a City of the higher Galilee, not far from Cedes, which is also situate in the Land of Canaan.) The whole Army consisted of three hundred thousand Footmen, ten thousand Horsemen, and twenty thousand Chariots. This great multitude of the Enemy astonished Joshua and the Israelites, so that they conceived little hope of obtaining the Victory: but God reproached and upbraided them for their timidity, and for that they suspected themselves to be insecure under his protection; he promised them likewise, that he would overcome their Enemies, and make their Horses unprofitable, and consume their Chariots by fire. Joshua emboldened by these promises from God, marched out against his Enemies, and came upon them the fifth day. The encounter was strong, and the slaughter so great, that they who heard the same, would scarcely believe it. Many E were slain in the pursuit; so that (a few only excepted) the whole Army was put to the sword. The Kings also were all slain; Joshua also commanded that their Horses should be slain: and he burnt their Chariots, and victoriously marched thorow the whole Country; so that no man durst come out, or make head against him. He besieged likewise their strong places, and killed all those that fell into his hands. Now when the fifth year was ended, and none of the Canaanites were left alive; (except such as were fled in to their Cities and Fortresses) Joshua once more retired his Camp towards the Mountains, and placed the sacred Tabernacle in the City of Shiloh, which seemed to be a very convenient place, by reason of the beauty of the same; where the Ark might remain, till such time as their affairs permitted them to build a Temple. From thence he de-F parted with all the people, to Sichem; and there built an Altar, according as Moses had formerly commanded; and having divided his Army, he planted half of them on the Mountain of Garizim, and the other half on the Mountain of Gibah (on which also he built an Altar) with the Levites and the Priests; and after they had sacrificed and pronounced the curses formerly mentioned, and engraven them on the Altar, they returned to Shiloh. Now, inasmuch as Joshua was well taken in years, and very well perceived, that the Cities of the Canaanites were hardly to be assaulted, both in respect of the places wherein they were situate, and of the munitions wherewith (besides other advantages of Nature) their Walls were strengthened and fortified (for the Canaanites having intelligence of the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt); and how G they hastened thither, with intent utterly to extinguish and overthrow that Nation; spent all that time in fencing and fortifying their Cities; he assembled all the people in Shiloh; where he represented to them the happy success which (till that time) God had favoured

favoured them with, because they had observed his Laws. That the 31 Kings which had H been so hardy as to encounter them, had by them been overcome; that all the Armies that had opposed them in battle, were wholly discomfited, and most of their Cities taken; so that there remained not any memory of them. But for that some of the Cities which remained were so fortified, that they required long Sieges to get them, he thought good that the Tribes which had been drawn from out the Country beyond Jordan, to be associates in this common cause of Conquest, and by reason of affinity, had made themselves companions in their perils, should be sent back into their own Country, with thanks. And that some of each Tribe of approved uprightness and loyalty, should be chosen, who surveying the Country might faithfully give a report of the extent thereof. This sentence was approved by the whole multitude, and thereupon divers men were sent (accompanied with such as were skillful in Geometry) to measure out the Land, and to estimate its goodness. For the nature of the Land of Canaan is such, that though there are great Plains very fertile, yet the Land being compared with other places of the same Country, cannot be esteemed excellent, compared with the other Countries of Jericho, and the Land about Jerusalem, it may seem to be nothing worth: although generally the whole Country be small, and for the greatest part mountainous, yet in respect of the abundance and beauty of the fruits thereof, it is second to no other whatsoever. For this cause he thought good that the portions should rather be estimated according to their value, than their measure; by reason that oftentimes one Plow-land was worth one thousand other. Those which were sent were ten in number, who (having travelled over the whole Country, and surveyed the same) returned again, at the end of six months, to Silo, where the Ark was kept.

Then Josbua, (taking unto him Elezar, with the Elders, and Princes of the Tribes) divided the Region amongst nine Tribes; and the half of the Tribe of Manasse, proportionably to the greatness of each Tribe, and when the lot was cast, there fell to the Tribe of Judah all the higher Judea; which extendeth itself in length to Jerusalem, and in breadth to the lake of Sodom; to which likewise were annexed the Cities of Ascalon and Gaza. The Tribe of Simeon (which was the second) obtained a part of Idumea, confining upon Egypt and Arabia. The Benjamites had that Country which extendeth from Jordan to the Sea in length, and in breadth from Jerusalem to Bethel: this portion was very small, by reason that the Country was good, for it contained the Cities of Jericho and Jerusalem. The Tribe of Ephraim was allotted its portion in length, from Jordan to Hadara; and in breadth from Bethel to the great Plain. The half Tribe of Manasse had the Territory from Jordan to the City of Dora in length, and in breadth to the City of Beithan (which is at this day called Scythopolis). After them, Issachar had that which lies between Mount Carmel, and the River of Jordan, in length, and the Mountain Itobir, for the bounds of its breadth. The Tribe of Zabulon was allowed that Country, which stretcheth out as far as Genesareth, and abutted on Mount Carmel, and the Sea. The Country which is betwixt Carmel and Sidon, was adjudged to the Asserites, in which portion was comprised the City of Arce, which is also called Adippus. The Nephthalites possessed that quarter that stretcheth out from the East to the City of Damascus, and the lower Gallilee, as far as the Mountain of Libanus, and the head of Jordan, that issueth from the same, on that side which confines on the City Arce Northwards. To them of Dan were assigned the Vallies extending Westward, and terminated by the Cities of Azib and Doris, containing all the Country of Jamnia and Gitta, from Abaron, even unto that Mountain, where he beginneth the portion of Juda. After this manner did Josbua divide the Country of the six Nations (bearing the name of Canaan) and gave it in possession to nine Tribes and an half. For Amorrhoea (so called from one of the Sons of Canaan) had been already taken by Moses, and assigned by him to two Tribes and an half, as I have already declared. But all in the quarter of Sidon of the Arucians, Amathians and Aritheans were not comprised in this division. But Josbua finding himself burdened with years, and unfit to execute his enterprises in his own person; and observing that the Governours of the people to whom he gave employments, acted negligently; he exhorted every Tribe in particular, to bestir themselves courageously in the extent of the Territory allotted to them, for exterminating the remainder of the Canaanites; as Moses had before told them, that their safety, and the maintenance of the Laws and Religion consisted in that one point, which he had likewise learned by his own experience. Further, that they should deliver unto the Levites thirty eight Cities, because they had already ten in their possession, within the Land of Amorrhoea; three of which were ordained for Cities of refuge to those that fled: (for he advised them, with all consideration and care, to omit nothing of that which Moses had commanded them, of the Tribe of Juda, Ephraim; of that

A that of Ephraim, Sichem; and of Nephthali, Cades; which is in higher Gallilee. More over, he distributed unto them the surplusage of the prey, which was very great: so that not only in publick, but in private, they got no small quantity of sustenance; for there was so much Gold, and Raiment, and Household-stuff, and so great store of Cattel and Hories, that the Commonwealth and all particular persons were enriched with it. After which he assembled the whole Army, and to those that were planted on the other side of Jordan, (who had born Arms with the rest, and were in number no less than 50000) he spake after this manner.

Since God (the Father and Master of our Nation) hath given this Country into our possession, and hath promised to continue and conserve the same so for ever; and since likewise you have willingly and forwardly assisted us in all our necessities and dangers, (according to God's command and direction) it is requisite at this present (since there remains not any further matter wherein we have need to employ you) that we dismiss you home, to enjoy some quiet, not doubting, that if hereafter we shall have need of you, you will, with no less willingness, be as industrious to do us kindness. We therefore yield you hearty thanks, for that you have vouchsafed to be companions in our perils: and we desire, that you will continue your mutual affection, remembering us as your friends, and how you have gotten your possessions by our help, as (by God's favour and your assistance) have attained to this our present felicity. Neither have you adventured, without some reward of your travels; for in this your warfare you are enriched, and shall bear away with you a great quantity of Gold and Silver; and besides all these, our benevolence and love, tyed unto you with all sincerity, whensoever you shall have cause to use us. For you have neither forgot, nor set light by Moses's command before he departed out of this life, and have spared no endeavour, whereby you might tie our affections to you. We therefore dismiss you to your own possessions, in fulness of contentment, praying you to remember these things, and never to put any bounds to the irrevocable amity which is between us; and let not the River Jordan, which is betwixt you and us, hinder you from considering us as Hebrews. For all of us (both those that dwell on this side, and on the other side of Jordan) are the posterity of Abraham; and one and the same God gave life both to you and our progenitors; whose Laws and Religion (instituted by Moses) are diligently to be observed: for by this means, he will become our helper and favourer; as on the contrary, if we shall degenerate from his Statutes, he will be our Enemy.

After he had spoke to them after this manner, he embraced in particular, the chief of these Tribes, who returned, and their whole people with them. This done, he stayed in that place; but the rest of the people accompanied them onward with tears, and they separated the one from the other, with great grief. But after the Tribe of Reuben and of Gad, and the rest of the Manassites, had passed over Jordan, they built an Altar upon the Bank of the River, that might serve for a memorial to posterity, of the alliance which they had with those that dwell on the other side of Jordan. When the tidings hereof came to their ears that dwell on the further side of the River, that they had built an Altar, but they were ignorant of the cause of building it, they supposed, that seeking to innovate their Religion, they would introduce the service of foreign and false gods. And being rashly stirred up with this suspicion of the violation of their Religion, they put themselves in Arms, with a resolution, to revenge themselves of those who had built that Altar, for that they had forsaken the Laws and Ordinances of their Forefathers. For they supposed, that they were not so far to respect their parentage, or dignity, as to forget the will of God, and that service which was agreeable in his sight. For which cause, being (in this manner incensed) they prepared themselves to the expedition. But Josbua and the High-Priest Elezar with the rest of the Elders, restrained them; counselling them, first of all to inquire what was their intention; and afterwards, if it should appear that they did it with a sinister intent, then they might lawfully invade them with the Sword. Hereupon they sent Phineas, the Son of Elezar, and ten other of the noblest among the Levites; as Ambassadors to them, to know what the intent and reason was, why they had built that Altar on the bank of Jordan.

Now when these Ambassadors had past the River, and were come amongst them they summoned an Assembly, and Phineas standing up in the midst of them, spoke after this manner. You have committed too heinous an offence (saith he) to be punished only with words: yet notwithstanding, we have not upon the instant taken Arms to assault you in battle, nor had regard to the heinousness of your Crime, to the intent to punish you; but we are sent to you as Ambassadors

Ambassadors (in consideration of our alliance) and for that (as we suppose) you may be H drawn by good persuasions to the acknowledgment and detestation of your fault; to the end, that when we are informed of the cause that hath induced you to erect this Altar; it may not be thought, that we have headlong thrust our selves into Arms against you, if out of a good intent you have built the same: and if it appear otherwise, that the offence is justly charged upon you, we may take revenge of the same, according as reason requires. For scarcely could we believe, that you (who are well-grounded in the knowledge of God, and bearers of those Laws which he himself hath given you) should (since your departure from us, and upon your arrival in your own Patrimony which you have obtained by lot, by his favour, and peaceably enjoy by his providence) forget him so soon, as to forsake the Tabernacle, Ark and Altar, and introduce strange gods, to the intent to be partakers of the impieties of the Canaanites. But if you repent of your misdeed, and persevere no longer in so great madness, but reclaim your selves, and return to your ancient Religion, a Pardon is granted you: but if you obstinately persist in your wickedness, there is nothing which we will not do for the maintenance of our Religion, and passing the River for defence of it, (or to speak more fully) of our God; and accounting you no less hateful and impious than Canaanites, we will treat you after the same manner as we have treated them. For do not suppose, that because you have past the River, you are exempt from God's power; because God is in all places, and it is impossible for you to avoid either his power, or his vengeance. If the Province which you possess is an impediment to your salvation, it were better for you to make a new division of Lands, and leave this Region, how plentiful soever. It becometh you therefore to renounce your Error, as we com- K jure you to do, by that love which you bear to your Children and Wives, and by the respect you hold of that which is most dear unto you, that you inforce us not to wage War against you. Resolve your selves therefore in this present matter, assuring your selves that therein consisteth the issue, whether you had rather perpetually enjoy your peace and safety by our persuasion, or expose both you and yours to the peril of a bloody War.

We never thought of altering the Union which joins us so near together, or of innovating any thing in that Religion of our Fathers; we will always persevere therein: we know that there is one God, the common Father of all the Hebrews, and none but the Brazen Altar L which is before the Tabernacle, shall receive our Sacrifices. As for that which we have now erected, and which breedeth in you at this present a cause of suspicion, we built it not to the intent to offer Sacrifices upon it, but only to remain as a perpetual monument of our alliance and of our obligation to continue firm in the same belief; but not to the end to make any alteration of Religion. And that this was the only cause which induced us to build the same, we call God to witness: wherefore instead of continuing to accuse us, you ought, for the future, to have a better opinion of us, than to suspect us of a Crime, of which none of Abraham's Posterity can be guilty, without deserving to lose his life.

As soon as Phinees had heard these things, and praised their constancy, he returned to Joshua, and gave him account of his Embassy in presence of the People: who re- M joycing that they had no occasion of Civil War, or Bloodshed, offered to God Sacrifices of Thanksgiving; and presently dissolved the Assembly, each man returning to his own home: but Joshua chose his habitation in Sichem.

After twenty years, Joshua being extremely old, called to him the most honourable of every City, and the Elders and Magistrates, and as many of the People as might commodiously be present, and spake unto them. First, he called unto their remembrance the many benefits which God had bestowed upon them; by means whereof, from a poor and afflicted condition, they had attained great riches and glory. Then he exhorted them to observe his Commandments most Religiously, to the end God might continue his merciful hand over them; since they knew that his favour could be kept to them by no other means, but by their obedience. He further told them, that he thought himself obliged, before he departed out of this life, to admonish them of their duty. Last of all, he desired them to accept well of that his good admonition, and to be perpetually mindful of the same. As he ended these words, he gave up the Ghost, and died in the 110. year of his age, whereof he spent 40, as Minister under Moses, their chief Magistrate; and after his death, governed the Commonwealth 25 years. A Man of incomparable prudence and eloquence, wise and diligent in matters of Government, and equally capable of the most important affairs of Peace and War; in a word, the most excellent Captain and Governour of his time. He was buried in a City called Thumna, be- longing to the Tribe of Ephraim. About the same time likewise died Eleazar the High- Priest, (leaving the Priesthood to Phinees's Son.) His Sepulchre is seen at this day in the City Gabatha. After their deaths, Phinees being demanded by the People what God's plea-

A pleasure was, and to whose charge the Wars against the Canaanites should be commit- ted, answered them, that God commanded to give the Government to the Tribe of Judah, which chusing that of Simeon for their Associates, undertook the War, with this condition, that when they had utterly rooted out the remnant of the Canaanites out of their own Tribe, they should likewise employ themselves to extinguish all the Reli- quies of that Race amongst the other Tribes.

CHAP. II.

How the Israelites, after the death of their Emperour, forgetting the Religion of their Fore- fathers, fell into extream Calamities: and how through a Civil War raised amongst them, B there were only 600 of the Tribe of Benjamin left alive.

BUT the Canaanites (whose estate at that time was very potent) expected them with a great Host about the City of Bezer, having their Army conducted by the King of that place, called Adoni-Bezer, which name signifieth, Lord of the Bezezenites; (for Adoni in the Hebrew Tongue, is Lord) and these men promised themselves the Victory, by reason that Joshua was deceased. Against these, the two Tribes of Judah and Simeon fought very valantly, and slaying 10000 of them in the pursuit, they took Adoni-Bezer Captive, who having his hands and feet cut off, acknowledged the divine justice: for he confessed that he had used 72. Kings before times after the same manner. In this condition C they conducted him near Jerusalem, where departing out of this life, they buried him. Then they over-run the Country, sacking and taking the Cities: and after they had divers of them in their possession, they besieged Jerusalem, and entering the lower City, they put all the Inhabitants to the Sword. But the higher Town was very hard to be assaulted (by reason of the Fortresses, and strength of the Walls, and the naturally strong situation of the place) which was the cause that they raised their Camp to go and besiege Hebron, which they took, and slew all that were therein. Amongst whom there were some of the Race of the Giants, whose stature was so prodigious, their aspect so terrible, and their voice so dreadful, that it can scarce be believed; their Bones are still to be seen at this day. This City being very considerable, was given to the Levites, with 2000 D Cubits of Land round about; the rest of the Country was freely given to Caleb, according as Moses had commanded, he having been one of those Spies which Moses sent to view the Land of Canaan. They gave lands and possessions likewise to the posterity of Jehro the Madianite (who was Father-in-Law to Moses) for that they had forsaken their own Territories, and joined themselves to the Israelites and been with them in the Desert. The Tribes of Judah and Simeon took those Cities of the mountainous Country of Canaan, and also those that were in the Plain near the Sea-coast, namely, Ascalon and Azoth. But they could not take Gaza and Accaron; for those Cities being in the Plain, and defended with a great number of Chariots, repelled those that assailed the same to their disadvantage. So these two Tribes having had good success in Wars, retired to their E Cities, to enjoy in peace the spoils which they had taken.

As for the Benjamites, to whom Jerusalem appertained, they received the Inhabitants thereof as their Tributaries; so that all being in peace, and the one ceasing from slaughter, and the other assured from danger, they employed themselves in manuring the Country. The rest of the Tribes did the like, contenting themselves according to the ex- ample of the Benjamites, and contenting themselves to receive their Tributes, they suf- fered the Canaanites to live in peace. The Tribe of Ephraim having long besieged the City of Bethel, could not see such an end of their design, as the length of time, and the Travels they had taken in the Siege required; and although they were very much toiled and wearied with the same, yet they continued the Siege. At last one of the Inhabitants F (who was carrying Provisions thither, sell into their hands) whom they promised, that if he would let them into the City, they would save him, and grant life and liberty likewise to all his Family. He was persuaded, and by his means they became Masters of the place; he and his were spared, but all the rest of the Inhabitants were put to the Sword. From that time forward, the Israelites ceased to make War, and employed themselves in Tillage of their Lands, and husbanding their Fruges; and being grown rich, they followed the delights and pleasures of the World in such sort as they became dissolute, and had no regard either of their ancient Discipline, or the Laws of their Forefathers. Where- upon God was highly incensed against them, and he gave them to understand, that con- trary to his Command, they had spared the Canaanites; and that those Canaanites, in G time to come, should exercise great Cruelties against them. And although they were astonished at what was declared to them, yet they would not resolve to renew the War, both for that they had received many Tributes from the Canaanites, and because (being effeminated with delights) they were unwilling to endure labour. At this time the Government of the Commonwealth was corrupted, and they respected no more the ancient forms of chusing Senators, or any other Magistrates; they were extremely addicted to Gain, and minded only private Interest. Amidst this disorder, a particular quarrel happened, which brought forth a bloody Civil War. The occasion of which ensued.

A certain Levite of the common sort, that dwelt in the Dominion of the Ephraimites, took a Wife that was born in the City of Bethlehem, which pertained to the Tribe of Judah, (whom by reason of her incomparable beauty) he most intirely loved; but was much grieved, that he found not her affection answerable to his: At last, his reproaches of unkindness became so tedious to the Woman, that (tired with disquiet) she forsook her Husband, and went and dwelt with her Father. The Husband grieved hereat, (by reason of the love he bare her) went to her Father's house, and was reconciled to his Wife. There abode he for the space of four days, being friendly entertained by her Father and Mother. On the fifth day, he thought good to return to his own dwelling, and both of them departed about Evening (by reason that the Father and Mother were loth to part with them, and had consumed the better part of the day in entertainment.) They had a Servant which followed them, and an Ass likewise, on which the Woman

They had a Servant which followed them, and an Ass likewise, on which the Woman was mounted. Now when they had travelled three Furlongs, and drew near the City of Jerusalem, their Servant counselled them to take up their lodging in some place, lest by their late Travel they might fall into some disaster, and the rather, because they were not far from the Enemies Country; and that the present time was such, as gave them just cause to fear. But this advice pleased not his Master, who would not lodge amongst those of a Foreign Nation (for the City pertained to the Canaanites) but his intent was to pass further, and travel yet twenty Furlongs more, to take up his lodging in one of his own Cities. This resolution being taken, they came to Giba, a City of the Tribe of Benjamin, when it was late: and finding no man in the Market-place that would lodge them, at length a certain old man, returning out of the Country to his house, (who was by birth an Ephraimite, and dwelt in that City) meeting him, asked him what he was? and why he made it so late before he took up his lodging? he answered, That he was a Levite, and that he brought his Wife with him from her Parents, and was returning to his house, which was amongst the Tribe of Ephraim. The old man having regard to his Parentage, (by reason that he was of the same Tribe) lodged him in his own house.

But certain young men of the City, who had seen the Woman in the Market-place, and were taken with her beauty, understanding that she was gone to the old mans house, who by reason of his weakness and age, was not able to defend her, went and knockt at his door. The old man desired them to depart, and not to offer him such a displeasure. But they importuned him to deliver them his Guest; which done, they promised him in no sort to cause his further molestation. But though the old man alleged that she was his Kinswoman, and that her Husband was a Levite; and that they should commit an heinous offence, in sinning, for the sake of their corrupt pleasure, against the Laws: yet had they no regard of equity, but mocked him, and menaced to murder him, because he hindered them from satisfying their lust. Finally, he was driven to that exigent; that (to avoid the doing violence to his Guest, and a stranger) he offered to abandon to them his own Daughter, chusing rather to let them satisfy their unbridled concupiscence on her, than that his Guest should suffer any villainy. Notwithstanding all this, they ceased not to urge the delivery of the Woman; and they seconded their disordinate desires with violence, taking her by force, and leading her to their own lodgings. Afterwards having all night lewdly satisfied their lusts on her) they thrust her out of doors from them at break of day. But the being desolate, and discomforted by this disaster, returned to her lodging; and both by reason of the Villainy which she had suffered, and the shame that hindered her from appearing before her Husband, who was outraged in her person, she fell down, and gave up the ghost. Her Husband supposing that she was only fainted away, endeavoured to recover her, and to comfort her, because he had not willingly consented to their violences and lusts, but, in spite of her resistance, was ravished by them, and taken out of his lodging. But when he saw she was dead, the excess of his grief caused him not to lose his judgment. He laid the dead body upon his Ass, and carried it to his house; where he no sooner arrived, but he divided the same into 12 pieces, which he sent to the 12 Tribes of Israel; commanding them that bare the same, to tell every Tribe, who were the Authors of his Wifes death, and what Villainy they had practised against her. The Tribes were enraged at what they saw and heard, (having never heard of any the like adventure) and incensed with extremity, yet just, fury, they assembled themselves in Shechem before the Ark, where they resolved suddenly to take Arms, and to attack Giba. But the Elders represented to them, that they ought not after that manner

Aner to enterprize a headlong War against their brethren, before they had more particularly examined the crime whereof they were accused; since the Law permitteth not any War (no not against strangers) before an Enter-parley and Embassage, to demand satisfaction. That accordingly it was just to send certain messengers to the Gibeonites, to demand at their hands the Authors of that villainy, to the end, that when they were delivered, they might take satisfaction by their punishment: but if they should not regard that which was demanded, that it was lawful for them to assail them with open War. Hereupon they sent certain Ambassadors to the Gibeonites, to complain of those young men that in perpetrating this indignity against the woman had violated the Law of God; and to demand that they might suffer condign punishment by death for the same. But the Gibeonites would not yield up the young men, esteeming it an indignity for them for fear of War to be obedient to other mens commandments, for they thought themselves no ways inferior unto others in feats of War, both in respect of number and courage. The rest of the Tribe also made great preparation, being also resolved, mutually to defend themselves against whosoever should assail them. When the Gibeonites answer was brought to the Israelites, they sware an oath among themselves, not to give their daughters in marriage to any Benjamite, and to make War against them more boldly than that which their Predecessors had made against the Canaanites. They speedily therefore levied and led into the field an Army of 40000 men against them. The Benjamites Army consisted of 25600 armed men; 500 of which were expert in shooting; and fighting with the left hand. The Battel was fought near Giba, wherein the Benjamites put the Israelites to flight, who were slain to the number of 22000; and more had been slaughtered that day, had not the night suddenly overtaken them, and ended the fight. The Benjamites joyfully returned to their Cities, and the Israelites were discomfited by their defeat. The next day they once more renewed the Battel, and the Benjamites had the upper hand once again: so that the Israelites lost eighteen thousand men more, and thereupon forsook their Camp thorough fear, and retired to Bethel, which was not far off. The day after they fasted, and besought God (by the mediation of Phinees, the High-Priest) that it would please him to appease his wrath against them; and that contenting himself with the two overthrowes which he had sent them, he would now at last both give them his assistance and valour to encounter their enemies. All which the God promised them by the Prophecy of Phinees. Whereupon they divided their Army into two parts, and laid the one in ambush near the City. In the mean time (while the other half that made head against the Benjamites, retired themselves, to the intent that their Enemies should assault them) the Benjamites suddenly issued, and set upon them that orderly retired, and the more they retired (on purpose to draw them the further from the Town) the more eagerly the Enemy insisted: so that all those who through age and weakness were left in the City, fell out to be companions and harpers in the future prey. But when they were drawn far enough from the City, the Hebrews staid, made head, and fought against them. Then gave they a sign to those that were in ambush, as was accorded amongst them, who suddenly issuing out together, rushed upon their Enemies with a great cry. The Benjamites themselves so surprized, knew not what to do, but retiring into certain Barricades, defended themselves with Arrows; but all of them were slain except six hundred: who making head, and closely filed and embattled together, thrust themselves desperately into the midst of their Enemies; and by this means escaped to the neighbouring mountains, where they encamped. All the rest to the number of twenty five thousand, or thereabouts were slain. And the Israelites burned Giba utterly, and slew both the Women and Children. They exercised no less severity on the other Cities of Benjamin (so much were they transported with fury.) And for that Jabes (a City of Gilead) would not join with them in Battel against the Benjamites, they sent twelve thousand chosen men out of their Companies, to destroy the same, who slew all those that bare Arms, with their Wives and Children, except four hundred Virgins. So much rage and fury had they conceived upon this accident that hundred chosen men against the Benjamites for provoking them unto Arms: which fury being somewhat appeased, they were toucht with compassion, seeing themselves deprived of one Tribe: wherefore though they thought they had justly punished them for having offended against the Laws of God; yet they appointed a Fast, and sent to recal those 600 that were fled, and that held a certain Rock in the Desert which is called Rhos.

These messengers represented to them the concern that the other Tribes had for their misfortune; but since there was no remedy, they ought to bear it with patience, and reunite themselves to those of their Nation, to the end to hinder the utter ruine of their Tribe: that they restored to them all their Lands, and would give them back their Cattel. The Benjamites acknowledging their justice, and that they were condemned by the

The year of the World, 3225, before Christ's Nativity, 1438.

The Israelites sent Ambassadors to the Gibeonites to require those that were slain of their hands.

They deny to yield them up: hereupon the Israelites make an oath never to match their daughters with any one of the Tribe of Benjamin, and they levied and lead out against them an Army of 40000 men.

vers. 25. Twenty thousand Israelites were slain in more, and thereupon forsook their Camp thorough fear, and retired to Bethel, which was not far off.

Eighteen thousand Israelites were slain. The Israelites place one half of their battel in ambush, and the other half that made head against the Benjamites, retired themselves, to the intent that they might assault them suddenly, and set upon them that orderly retired, and the more they retired (on purpose to draw them the further from the Town) the more eagerly the Enemy insisted: so that all those who through age and weakness were left in the City, fell out to be companions and harpers in the future prey.

the just judgment of God, returned into the possessions of their Tribe. And the Israelites gave them in Marriage those 400 Virgins of Jabes: and for the rest (which were 200) they deliberated with themselves how they might provide them of Wives, to the intent they might have issue. And whereas in the beginning of the War it was decreed by an oath, that none of them should match his Daughter with any of the Tribe of Benjamin; there were some that thought good that the oath might be dispensed withal, by reason it was made in wrath, and with precipitation; alledging further, that it would not be displeasing to God, if they might have a Tribe which was in danger to be utterly extinct: that Perjury is a great sin; not when enforced by necessity, but when practised with an intent to do evil. But when the Elders declared that they abhorred the mention of Perjury, there rose up a certain Man amongst them that said he knew a way whereby without breach of oath the Benjaminites might have Wives. And being commanded by the Senate to declare the same, We have a custom thrice every year (said he) to assemble and keep a Feast at Siloe; and for Companions we have both our wives and Daughters: as many of these as they can catch, let the Benjaminites lay hold of, without reproof, (neither being inhibited nor encouraged by us) and if their Fathers shall be displeased therewith, and shall require revenge, we will say that they are in the fault who have negligently kept their Daughters; and that we ought not too much to whet our wrath against the Benjaminites, for that we had too much already used the same towards them.

This advice was approved by all; and it was decreed, That it was lawful for the Benjaminites to seize, and violently take to themselves Wives amongst them. Now when the Feast came to hand; the 200 Benjaminites (of whom we have spoken) came two by two, and three by three, and lay in ambush, near the City (amongst the Vines and other Thickets, and close places; in which they might hide themselves) to surprize the Danites; who, suspecting nothing, securely and pleasantly wandered on their way: but the young men breaking from the ambush, laid hold of them (being scattered and divided here and there) and after they had married them; they departed home to labour their Land; and began to study anew how to recover their former prosperity. Thus the Tribe of Benjamin (which was well-nigh utterly exterminated) was preserved, by the wisdom of the Israelites: and it flourished, and increased in a little time as well in number of men, as in all other things.

The like accident happened to the Tribe of Dan; which fell into the like mischief, for this cause which ensueth.

The Israelites about this time having forgotten the exercise of Arms, and being only occupied in tilling their Land; the Canaanites (in contempt of them) raised Forces; not for that they were afraid for their own Estates, but to the intent that defeating the Hebrews with some memorable overthrow; they might more securely inhabit their Cities for the future. They brought into the Field a great number of Footmen, and Chariots, and they drew Aschalon and Achareu (two Cities within the lot of Judah) into their Confederacy, and divers other Cities of the Champian Country: so that the Tribe of Dan was driven into the Mountains, having no place in the Champian where they might peaceably inhabit; and (for that they were neither able to recover their Lands from the Enemy, nor had sufficient habitation for their number of men) they sent five men of their Tribe into the Champian Country, to see if they could find any place that were fit and convenient for them to establish and fix their Colony. These men travelled a days journey not far from the Mountain of Dibamus; and after they had forces of Jordan, bordering upon the great Plain of the City of Shechem; in which place (having observed that the Land was good and fertile in all sorts of fruits) they made their report to their People, who travelling thither with their Arms, built a City in that place called Dan (by the name of the son of Jaid so called, and of their own Tribe). Many adversities befell the Israelites from that time forwards; both by reason they were unexercised in Travel, and for that they contemned Pity. For having once forsaken the observation of their Ordinances, they abandoned themselves to Pleasures; living according to their own appetites: so that they polluted themselves with those Vices which were most usual amongst the Canaanites.

They of Dan seek out a place to inhabit.

How the people of Israel, by reason of their wickedness, were by God delivered to the servitude of the Assyrians.

FOR this cause the wrath of God was kindled against them, in such sort that he abandoned them, and through their luxury they soon lost the felicity which they had gotten by infinite pains. For Schifart King of the Assyrians levied an Army against them, killed a great number of their men in fight, and either by force, or composition, took divers of their Cities, and brought them under his subjection. Many also willingly submitted themselves to him through fear, and paid great tribute, enduring all kind of outrage for the space of eight years; after which they were delivered by these means following.

C H A P. IV.

Their Liberty restored by Cenez.

A Certain man of the Tribe of Judab called Cenez, a man of understanding and courage, was advertised by a voice from Heaven, that he should not permit the Israelites to be reduced into so extreme necessity, without taking care for them, but adventure himself to set them at liberty. Upon which calling to him some few whom he knew generous enough to fear no danger when a yoke so insupportable was to be shaken off; They began with cutting the throats of the Assyrian Garrison which Schifart had placed over them. This first success, caused the number of his followers to increase a little more, so that in a little time they seemed sufficient to equal the enemy in open field: whereupon encountering him in one battle, they overcame him and recovered their liberty; and the rest of the scattered and confused Army retired towards Euphrates. After Cenez had by this action given proof of his valour, he received the Government at the peoples hands; and exercised the office of Judge forty years, and died.

How the people were made subject to the Moabites, and how by Jodes they were exempt from servitude.

AFTER his death (the Government being void) the affairs of the Israelites began again to fall to ruine, and the rather, for that they neither yielded due honour to God, or obedience to the Laws: whence it came to pass, that Eglon King of the Moabites (seeing the disorder of their policy) made War against them, and defeated them many times. And for that he was a Prince of greater puissance than any of his Predecessors, he weakened their Forces, so that he constrained them to pay tribute.

This man removing his Court to Jericho, and proud of his Victories, omitted no means whereby he might vex and molest the people: so that they lived for the space of 18 years in great misery. But God (being moved with compassion of their calamities) delivered them from their intolerable thralldom after this manner: Jodes the Son of Gera of the Tribe of Benjamin (a young man, endow'd with Valour of mind and strength of Body to attempt any worthy action, dwelt at Jericho. This man insinuated himself into Eglon's familiarity; and by presents courted him in such sort, that he was well beloved and esteemed amongst all the Courtiers, and had frequent access to the Palace. It chanced one day that bearing certain Presents unto the King (attended by two of his Household servants) he secretly hid a Dagger under his cloaths, at such time as he entered in to the King. Now it was Summer and Mid-day likewise, and the watch was grown more careless, partly by reason of the heat, and partly for that the guard were at their dinner. The young man therefore offering his presents unto Eglon (who at that time refreshed himself in a certain Summer Chamber) began to discourse with him. Now they were both alone (by reason that the King resolving to talk familiarly with Jodes, had sent away his Guard) but Jodes fearing, lest he might miss his blow as the King sat upon the Throne, desired him to rise, telling him that he had a Dream to relate to him by the commandment of God. Whereat he rejoicing, arose from his seat; and Jodes stab'd him to the heart; and leaving the Poynard sticking in the wound, locked the door after him, and escaped; for the Guard supposing the King laid down to rest, let him pass. But Jodes giving private notice thereof to the Israelites, offered himself to be their Leader for recovery of their liberty; and they willingly accepting thereof, presently took Arms, and sent Trumpets about to summon the rest of their Country-men. They that were about Eglon were wholly ignorant of what had hapned, but about Evening (feeling left some mishap had befallen him) they entred into the Chamber where he was, and found him dead; whereat they were greatly affrighted, so that they knew not what course to take; so that before they had assembled their Forces together, the Israelites came upon them, and kill'd some; the rest, being Ten thousand in number, fled, in hope to recover their Country of Moab: but the Israelites (having before way-laid and fortify'd the passages of Jordan) pursued and slew them: so that many of them perisht in the River, and not one escap'd their hands. By this means the Israelites were deliver'd from the servitude of the Moabites, and Jodes was advanced to the Government of the People. After he had lived Fourscore years, he died. A man (besides the action now mention'd) worthy of praise for many other things. After him, Sanagar the Son of Anath was elected Governour, and in the first year of his Rule, he left this life for the fruition of another.

C H A P. VI.

How the Israelites were brought under the subjection of the Canaanites, and deliver'd from Servitude by Barac.

BUT the Israelites (in no sort reclaim'd or better'd by their forepast Calamities) fell again into their former impiety and disobedience; and before they had sufficiently shaken off the servitude of the Moabites, were subjected to Jabin King of the Canaanites. This Man kept his Imperial residence at Afor (a City situate on the Lake Sachonites) and had in his Pay Thirty thousand Foot, and Ten thousand Horse: and besides these, he had Three thousand warlike Chariots. This great Army was commanded by Sisera, (an eminent Man amongst the Kings Favourites) who encountering with the Israelites, brought their affairs into so desperate an estate, that they willingly for their own security accepted servitude, and paid Tribute, whereunto they were forced, almost for the space of Twenty years, not daring to lift up their heads (all which fell upon them by the Will of God, to punish the too great contumacy and ingratitude of that Nation.) At the end of which time, repenting themselves, and acknowledging that the cause of their Calamities, (proceeded from the contempt of God's Laws) they repaired to a certain Prophetess, called Debora, (whose name in the Hebrew Tongue signifieth a Bee) beseeching her, that by her prayers she would endeavour to move God to mercy, and not suffer them so to be oppressed by the Canaanites. God (being inclined by her prayers) granted them help, and appointed Barac to be their Governour (a Man of the Tribe of Nephtali, whose name signifieth Lightning.) Debora lending for Barac, commanded him to chuse out Ten thousand Men, and lead them forth against the Enemy; saying, that their number were sufficient, since God had promis'd him the Victory. But Barac denying to undertake the Government, except the also would join in the administration of it with him; she mov'd with anger, reply'd, Art thou not asham'd to surrender the dignity which God hath given thee, to a Woman? Well, I will not refuse it. Whereupon M Sisera at that time (according as the King had commanded him) presently marched out to meet them, and encamped not far from them. But Barac and the rest of the Israelites, (being terrified with the multitude of the Enemies) were encouraged by Debora, who commanded them that very day to undertake the Battel; assuring them, that the Victory should be theirs, and that God would assist them. Whereupon they charged the Enemy, and there suddenly fell a storm of Rain, mixed with Hail, which the wind drove against the faces of the Canaanites, and took away their sight, rendering those that carried Darts, and served with the Sling, unprofitable in the service; likewise those that were heavily arm'd, having their hands benumb'd with cold, could not wield their Swords. N But the Tempest beating on the backs of the Israelites, not only gave them less offence, but made them also more courageous (as being a manifest sign of Gods favour and presence.) Whereupon disarraying and breaking thorow their Enemies Battel, they made a great slaughter of them; so that part of them fell by the weapons of the Israelites, the rest were over-run by their own Horsemen and Chariots. Sisera seeing his Souldiers turn their backs, leap'd from his Chariot, and fled away, till at last he arrived at the Tent of a woman of Ceneth, called Jael, whom he desired to conceal and hide him. She admitted him; and when he desired drink, she gave him four milk; which when he had largely drunk, he fell asleep. The Woman seeing him in this condition, took a Mallet, and drove an Iron Nail thorow his temples, and fastned him to the pavement; soon after, when Barac's Souldiers came to her, she shewed them his dead body. Thus a Woman, according as Debora had foretold, was the Author of this Victory. But Barac leading

A leading his Army to Afor, defeated and slew Jabin, who came out against him with an Army, razed his City to the ground, govern'd the Israelites for the space of Forty years.

C H A P. VII.

How the Amalekites overcoming the Israelites, destroyed their Country for the space of seven years.

AFTER the death of Barac and Debora, which hapned almost about the same time, the Midianites, accompanied with the Amalekites and Arabians, armed themselves against the Israelites; and encountering them in open field, overcame them in a great Battel, and (destroying their Fruits and Harvest) carried away great Booty. They continued these their incursions for the space of seven years, and compelled the Israelites to forsake the Champain, and flee to the Mountains: where digging themselves Caves and Houses under the earth, they kept secretly hidden all which they had reserved, from the fury of the Enemy. For the Midianites having taken their Harvest in the Summer time, permitted them to Till their Lands in the Winter, to the intent they might gather the fruits of their labour afterwards. Thus lived they in perpetual famine and want: neither was there any other hope or succour left them, but only by prayers and supplications unto God.

C H A P. VIII.

How Gideon delivered the Israelites.

ABOUT that time as Gideon (the Son of Joas, one of the chiefeft of the Tribe of Manasse) was grinding some sheafs of Corn, which he had secretly conveyed into his Press, for he durst not do it openly, for fear of the Enemy; An Angel appeared to deliver the Israelites from the form of a young man, and told him, That he was happy, and beloved of God. 'Tis a fair sign, answer'd Gideon, when I am forc'd to use a Press instead of a Grange. The Angel exhorted him to be of good courage, and to endeavour to recover his Countries liberty. Gideon answer'd, That it was impossible, by reason that the Tribe whereof he was descended, had very few men in it; and that he was too young and incapable of affairs of that consequence. God will supply all these defects, said the Angel, and under thy conduct will give the Israelites victory. These things Gideon communicated to certain young men, who willingly believing the Oracle, answer'd, That for the present they had Ten thousand Souldiers in readiness, to attempt any thing for their liberty. But God appeared to Gideon in a Dream, and told him, That men being so vain, that they are willing to chuse a few over nothing but to themselves, and attribute their Victories to their own strength, instead of attributing them to his assistance; he would make them know, that 'twas to him alone that they were indebted for them. To which end he commanded him, That about the mid time of the day, at such time as the heat was most vehement, he should conduct his Army to the River, and there diligently observe those that bowed themselves to drink, which he might esteem for Men of Valour; but all those that drank hastily, and with noise, should be marked as Men timorous, and afraid of the Enemy. Gideon did as God commanded: and there were found but Three hundred Men that lifted water to their mouths with their hands, without fear and trouble. God commanded him to assail the Enemy with those Three hundred, promising to give him the Victory. At this time were they encamped upon the Bank of Jordan, ready to pass the Ford the next Morning. But Gideon was troubled, by reason that God had bid him assail the Enemy by night. But God willing to deliver him of his fear, commanded him to take one of his Souldiers with him, and go to the Camp of the Midianites, to see what past there. He obeyed; and for his better assurance, took with him one of his servants. Now as he drew nigh a certain Tent, he perceived, that they that were within the same, were awake, and heard one of them with a loud voice tell his companion the dream which that Night he had had, which was thus: He thought he saw a Barley Cake (which lookt as if not worth the taking up) it rouled thorow all the Camp, and first overthrow the Kings Tent, and afterwards the Tents of all his Souldiers. This dream (answer'd his Companion) signified the loss of our whole Army. The reason is, that of all sorts of Corn, Barley is most contemptible: and amongst all the Nations of Asia, there are not at this day any People more contemned than the Israelites; and in this respect, they resemble Barley. Now you know that they have gather'd Troops, and form'd some design under the conduct duct of Gideon. And whereas this Cake turned to overthrow our Tents, I fear lest it be a sign that God hath given the Victory to Gideon. Gideon (having overheard this Discourse) conceived good hope, and presently commanded his Followers to arm themselves, after he had told to them the Dream of their Enemy. Whereupon they speedily prepared themselves at his Command, being encourag'd by so happy a preface to attempt any thing. About the latter Watch of the Night, Gideon led forth his Army, and divided it into three Bands, and in every Band he put an Hundred Men: all of these bare in their hands empty Pots, in which were hidden burning Torches, in such sort, that the Enemy could not discover them, when they fell out. Moreover, they bare Rams Horns in their right hands, which they used instead of Trumpets. The Enemies Camp took up much ground, by reason they had a great number of Camels; and though distributed by Nations, were all of them comprehended in one inclosure.

The Hebrews having had instructions from their Captain what to do, at such time as they approached near their Enemies, and the sign of the Battel being given, they found their Horns and broke their Pots, and with their flaming Lights, fell into the Enemies Camp, crying, Victory, Victory, by the assistance of God, and the strength of Gideon. Trouble and Fear surprized the sleeping Enemy, for this action was in the Night-time, and God disposed all things to this issue, that few of them fell by the Hebrews Sword, but they themselves slew one another in great numbers (by reason that they were different in language.) For confusedly encountering one another, they Mangled all they met, suppling them Enemies. When the Rumor of this Slaughter, and Gideon's Victory, came to the ears of the rest of the Israelites, they armed themselves, and pursued and overtook the Enemy, (being intangled in certain places, unpassable, through many Brooks) so that being environed on every side, most of them were put to the Sword; amongst which, were two Kings, Oreb and Zeb. Two other Kings, Zeb and Hezerbun escap'd, with their Souldiers, to the number of eighteen thousand, and encamped not far from the Israelites: but Gideon was no ways astonish'd hereat, but charging them valiantly with his whole Army, he defeated all the Troops, and took the Kings captive. There died in the two Battels of the Madianites, and Arabians their Allies, almost Six-score thousand. The Hebrews also took an inestimable prey of Gold, Silver, Apparel, Camels, and Horses. But Gideon returning to Ephraim, put to death the two Kings of the Madianites which he had taken. Nevertheless, the Tribe of Ephraim being displeased with his happy execution, resolv'd to make War against him; accusing him, that he had not made them privy to his design against the Enemy. But Gideon being a prudent man, and endowed with all kind of virtue; gave them this modest answer, That he had not proceeded by his own direction, but by the command of God: notwithstanding, that the Victory was no less theirs, than his, or those of his Followers, that achieved the Enterprize. With these his words appeasing their wrath, he did no less service to the Hebrews by his prudence, than by his valour; delivering them from a Civil War, whereinto they had fallen, if his discretion had not prevented it. This Tribe was punished for this outrage offered to so noble a Personage, as we will declare hereafter in due place. Gideon desiring to discharge himself of the Government, was constrain'd to continue the same, and ruled the Israelites for the space of Forty years, doing justice to every one that desir'd it at his hands, with so great integrity, ability and wisdom, that the People never fail'd to confirm the judgments which he pronounc'd, because none could be more equitable. He died when he was very old, and was buried in the Country of Ephraim.

CHAP. IX.

How some of Gideon's Successors made War with the Nations round about them.

Gideon had seventy lawful Sons begotten on divers Wives, and one Bastard by his Concubine Druma, called Abimelech: who, after the decease of his Father, retired to Shechem, where his Mother was born. There (assisted with money, by his Mother's kindred, and backed by men resolute, and fit for all bad actions) he returned to his father's house, where he slew all his brethren (except Jotham, who by good hap saved himself by flight.) When he had once usurp'd the Government, he ruled all things according to his lust, and neglected the Ordinances and precepts of Law, hating all those that in any sort were maintainers of equity. One day whilst there was a solemn feast held at Shechem, (whereunto the whole people were usually wont to resort) Jotham his Brother (who as we said, saved himself by flight) getting up the Mountain of Garizim, which over-hangeth the City of Shechem, with a loud voice (that might easily be overheard by the people) and in a general silence of the whole multitude, desir'd them to hear him a few words; and he told them, that in times past the Trees were accustomed articulately to speak after the manner of men; and that (in a certain assembly, wherein they were to consult of their government) they desir'd the Fig tree to accept the Sovereignty over them; which when it refused and pleaded in its own behalf, that it was contented with that honour which they gave it for its fruit, and desired no more. The Trees ceased not to seek another Prince, and offer'd that honour to the Vine; which in as many words as the Fig-tree, refused the same; the like did the Olive-tree. At last they address'd to the Bramble, (whose wood is good only to burn) which answered, If you unseasonably desire me for your King, repose your selves under my shadow; but if it be only in mockery, and to deceive me, there shall a fire issue from me, and consume you. These things (said Jotham) I report to you, not to move you to laughter, but for that, you (having received many benefits at the hands of Gideon) suffer Abimelech, who in spirit differeth nothing from fire, to usurp the Government, after the slaughter of my Brethren.

When he had spoken after this manner, he departed, and for three years lived hid amongst the mountains, flying the fury of Abimelech. After some time the Shechemites (being moved with compassion and just revenge, of the murder committed upon the Sons of Gideon) drove Abimelech out of their City, and the whole Tribe. Whereupon he resolv'd to do some mischief both to the City and the Citizens. And though their Vintage was at hand, yet they durst not go forth to gather the fruit, for fear of him. It hapned at that time a certain great man called Gaal, arrived there with a Troop of Souldiers, and his kindred: The Shechemites desir'd him to grant them a Guard, whilst they gathered their Harvest; which request of theirs being granted by Gaal, they issued out with their Forces and securely brought in their fruits: and feasting one with another in companies, they were so bold as to scoff at Abimelech, and the chief of his Followers. And some of those strangers, that came into their City to their assistance, surpris'd by Ambuscado, divers of Abimelech's people, and slew them. But Zebul one of the Shechemites, and Abimelech's Host, signified unto him by a messenger, how Gaal incited the people against him; and he counselled him to lie in wait for him, near about the City, promising to bring Gaal thither, and so he might easily revenge himself of the injury which his enemy had offered him, and reconcile himself to the people again. When Abimelech had chosen a place fit to lye in ambush, and Gaal with Zebul, carelessly walked in the Suburbs, Gaal suddenly espying certain Armed men coming towards him, cryed out to Zebul, That he had discovered the enemy; Zebul replied, that it was nothing but the shadow of Rocks. But Gaal drawing nearer them, and seeing apparently who they were, answered Zebul, That they were no shadows but ambushes of men. Zebul replied, Dost thou not object cowardise to Abimelech? Why therefore shewest thou not thy great valour in fighting with him? Gaal confusedly amazed, bore the first charge of the Souldiers of Abimelech: in which conflict, some of his Followers were slain, and he himself fled into the City, giving example to the rest to follow him. Hereupon Zebul laboured, that Gaal might be expelled out of the City; accusing him of cowardise in his encounter with the Souldiers of Abimelech. Now, when Abimelech had afterwards gotten certain intelligence, that the Shechemites would go out again to gather their Vintage, he laid an ambush near to the City. And no sooner were they come forth, but a third part of the Troops surpris'd the Gates, to cut off their return; the rest ran after those that were scattered here and there: so that there was a great slaughter on every side; and the City was ruin'd to the very foundations, and they sowed Salt upon the ruins thereof. But they that escaped thorow the Country, and had avoided the danger, assembled to fortifie themselves upon

upon a strong Rock, whereupon they incamped. But as soon as Abimelech had notice of H their intention, he halted thither with his forces, and environed the place with faggots of dry wood, (carrying them thither in his own person, and encouraging thereby those of his Army to do the like) so that the Rock was incontinently compassed with wood: whereunto he set fire round about, and in an instant it flamed, and burnt vehemently; so that none of them were saved, but all perished with their Wives and Children, to the number of fifteen hundred men, besides many of the weaker fort. This calamity hapned to the Shechemites, who were worthy of compassion if they had not deserved this punishment for their ingratitude towards so upright a Judge, and so gracious a Benefactor. Abimelech could the courage of the Israelites, by this treatment of the Shechemites, and gave sufficient testimony that he aspired higher, and would never terminate his ambition till he had totally subdued them. He therefore led forth his Army against the Thebans and their City, which he took: in the Town there was a great Tower, whither all the people had retired themselves, and as he prepared to besiege the same, and approached near the Gates, a certain woman cast a piece of a Millstone at him, which he hit him on the head, and made him fall to the ground. Abimelech feeling that he was wounded to death, commanded his Armor-bearer to dispatch him, that it might not be reported that he died by the hand of a woman. Jephtham hath a vow.

A servitude which they had endured for the space of eighteen years. But as he returned homeward, he fell into such an inconvenience, as was no ways answerable to his noble actions. For the first person he met as he returned home, was his only Daughter (a Virgin of eighteen years) who came out to meet him: Whereupon melting into tears, he began to check her, for that so hastily she had come forth to meet him, by reason he had vowed the first thing he met with to God. But this accident was no ways displeasing to the Virgin; who with a wonderful constancy answered her Father, that a death which had for its cause the victory of her Father, and the liberty of her Country, could not but be very acceptable to her: and that the only favour she desired of him, was, that he would please to grant her two months, before she was sacrificed, to the Lord: and the might lament her youth, with her companions: and that after that term, her father might acquit himself of the vow which he had made. Jephtha granted her the time she had limited: which being expired, he sacrificed his Daughter for a burnt offering. Which oblation of his, was neither conformable to the Law, nor desired by God. But he was resolved to accomplish his vow, without considering what judgment men might make of it.

The Tribe of Ephraim hearing of his victories, declared War against him by reason he had not communicated to them his enterprise against the Ammonites, that he might have the prey, and the honour of the enterprise to himself. He answered, that being of his kindred, they could not be ignorant, that both he and his were assailed by War; and had besides that, also been desired to give them their assistance; whereunto they had answered very faintly, and being requested would not be present. Then he told them, that, that which they undertook, was unlawful, and wicked, in that not daring to encounter the Enemy, they made no scruple to set upon their Brethren and Friends; and he threatened them, that if they restrained not themselves, he would (by the assistance of God) be revenged on them. But these words of his were both neglected and despised, so that he was forced to Arm himself against them, and with an Host of men sent from Galaad, he made a great slaughter, partly in pursuing those that fled, partly also in preventing their passage who fled to Jordan: the number of the slain, amounted to about forty thousand. After Jephtha had governed six years, he deceased, and was buried in Sebei, in the place where he was born, and the Country of Galaad. After his death Isaiah took upon him the Government. He was of the Tribe of Juda, of the City of Bethlehem, and had sixty Children: thirty males and thirty females; which he left all alive and married: he died when he was very old, without performing any thing worthy of memory, during the space of his seven years Government: he was buried in his own Country. In like manner Elon a Zabulonite his successor did nothing memorable and during the term of ten years wherein he governed. Abdon the Son of Elon, and (of the Tribe of Ephraim of the City of Pharathon) was declared Sovereign Judge after Elon, and is renowned only for his felicity in his Children; the state of the Israelites being in peace, so that he exploited nothing worthy glory: he had forty Sons, who had thirty Grand-children; and rode accompanied with these seventy, who were all of them expert Horse-men. He left them all alive, and died when he was very old, and was magnificently buried in Pharathon.

Of Samson's valour, and how many mischiefs he did to the Philistines.

After his death, the Philistines prevailed over the Israelites, and exacted tribute from them for the space of forty years. From which misery they were delivered after this manner. Manoah an excellent man, and chief of the Tribe of Dan, without exception, had a Wife most famous for her beauty, and excelling all others of that time; yet had he no Children by her, whereto he was very much grieved, and made his continual prayers unto God (and especially when they were retired to a Country-house which they had near the City) that it would please him to give him a lawful heir. He loved his Wife very passionately, and not without some jealousy, on a day as the woman was there by her self, an Angel of God appeared to her in form of a young man of incomparable beauty and shape; and told her that he came from God, to inform her that she should be the mother of a child, perfectly beautiful; and whose strength should be so extraordinary, that as soon as he was entered into the vigour of youth he should humble the Philistines; but God forbade her to cut his Hair, and commanded likewise that he should taste no other drink but water; and after he had said thus, he departed. As soon as her Husband returned home again, she told him all that the Angel had said unto unto her, and so extoll'd the beauty and good grace of the young messenger, who appeared unto her, that these praises increased his jealousy; which she perceiving, and being no less chaste than fair, prayed to God once more to send his Angel, that her Husband might see him, and be cur'd of his unjust suspicion. Her prayer was heard, and the Angel presented himself again to the woman being (apart from her Husband.) But he desired him to stay till he called her Husband: which when he had obtained, she went and fetched Manoah, who notwithstanding was not delivered from his suspicion; but desired him to relate to him all that he had signified to his Wife. The Angel answered, that it sufficed that she knew it: whereupon he asked him what he was, to the end that when his Son should be born, he might give him presents, and thanks. The Angel answered, that he had no need thereof, by reason that he had not brought the good news of the birth of his Son for any necessity that he had. Manoah entreated him to stay and receive some token of kindness; but he would not consent. Finally, being instantly pressed to abide and receive some gift; Manoah kill'd a Kid, and commanded his Wife to roast it. And when all things were in readiness, the Angel commanded them to lay the Bread and Flesh upon a Rock without dishes: which being done, he touched the Flesh with a wand which he had in his hand, and suddenly a flaming fire consumed both the Bread and Flesh; and the Angel was seen to ascend up into Heaven in the smoke as it were in a Chariot. Manoah was in great fear lest some inconvenience should happen unto him, because they had seen God: but his Wife comforted him, assuring him that God had appeared to them for their good. Shortly after the became big with child, and observed all that had been commanded her; and when the Infant was born, she called his name Samson (which is as much as to say, strong) who soon grew to be of excellent beauty both of mind and body, wearing his Hair unshorn, and using sobriety in his diet, whereby he gave some signs of what had been foretold concerning him.

It happened on a day that there was a solemnity celebrated in Thamna, a City of the Philistines, whither Samson resorted with his Father and Mother; and being surprised with love of one of the Damfels of that place, he desired his Father and Mother that this Maid might be given him in marriage: which they refused, alleging that the was not of the same Lineage; and that God would provide him a match to the good and profit of his Nation: but in the end he prevailed so much, that he espoused the Maiden. Now as he ordinarily walked to her Parents, it happened one day, that being disarmed, he met with a Lion upon the way, whom he grasped and strangled with his hands; and having slain him, he cast the body of the Beast into a Wood not far distant from the high way. Another day returning in like sort to the Damfel, he found a swarm of Bees which made their honey in the breast of the same Beast, and he took three honey-combs which he carried with other presents to his intended Wife. After this, he invited the Thaminites to the celebration of his marriage, who (for that they feared his strength) under colour of doing him honour, chose out thirty strong and valiant young men, to be seemingly his companions, but in effect his Guardians; to the end he might not attempt any commotion, in the midst of the festivity. Samson said to his companions, I will propose a question to you, which if you can resolve, I will give each of you a fine Linen Shirt, and other vestments. They being very desirous both to be reputed wife, and to gain the reward proposed, pressed him to propound his question: which he did in these terms; He that devoureth all, hath been himself the food of others; and how terrible forever he was, this food hath been no less sweet and agreeable. They employ'd three days to find out the sense thereof, but they could not: and therefore they desired Samson's Spouse to get the secret from her Husband, and disclose the same to them; which if she refused, they threatened to burn her to death. Samson at the first (notwithstanding her flatteries and solicitations) denied to tell it her: at last he urged him so instantly, and shed so many tears (telling him that if he did not expound the question to her, she would take it for a certain sign that he hated her) that at last he told her he had slain a Lion, and how in him he had found the three Honey-combs which he brought to her: and (not distrusting either fraud or guile) he related the whole story to her, and the afterwards reported the same to those that had employ'd her in the discovery. When the seventh day was come, and the question was to be decided, the young men assembled themselves together about Sun-set; and said, There is nothing more terrible than a Lion, nor any thing more pleasant to taste, than honey: Whereunto Samson replied, you should add, that there is not any thing more dangerous than a woman; for she it is that hath betray'd me, and reported my words to you. Notwithstanding all this, he delivered that which he had promised them, out of the booty, which he had taken from certain Africanites, whom he encountered upon the way. But he would not pardon his Wife; and the woman (seeing her self despised) married

A one of his friends, who had, in his behalf first solicited the marriage. Samson (being more incensed by this injury) resolved to revenge himself both on her and the whole Nation: For which cause in the Summer time (when the Corn was ready to be reapt) he took three hundred Foxes, to whose tails having fastned flaming Torches, he drove them into the Philistines fields of Corn; consuming by this means all their hope of Harvest. The Philistines understanding that Samson had done this, and conceiving the reason that induced him to it, sent a party of Souldiers to Thamna, and burnt this woman alive with all her kindred, as the cause of the loss that had happened to them. After Samson had slain divers Philistines in the Country, he went and dwelt at Etam (which is a strong Rock in the Tribe of Juda) For which cause the Philistines assailed that Tribe, who repented to them that there was no reason why they should suffer for those offences which were committed by Samson, and especially since they paid them tribute. The Philistines replied, that unless they would be maintainers of his act of injustice, they must deliver Samson unto them. They (desirous that the Philistines might have no cause of quarrel against them) came to the Rock to the number of 3000 men, and there blamed Samson for those actions which he had done against the Philistines, because they were a people that might endanger the whole Nation of the Hebrews: concluding that they came to take, and deliver him into the Philistines hands, and praying him to submit himself voluntarily to that their resolution. Samson made them swear that they would do him no other injury, but deliver him only to their enemies; which done, he descended from the Rock, surrendering himself to the hands of those of Juda, who bound him with two cords, and led him away to deliver him to the Philistines. Now being arrived in a certain place, which at this present is called the Jaw (by reason of what happened there at that time) and approaching near the Philistines Camp; which shouted for joy that they had faithfully executed that which they desired of them: Samson brake his bonds, and catching up the jaw of an Ass which he found at his feet, and falling upon the rest to flight. This extraordinary and unparalleled exploit puff'd up Samson's heart, that he forgot to attribute it to the assistance of God, but ascribed the fame to his own strength. But it was not long before he was punished for his ingratitude: For being seized with exceeding thirst, and finding himself faint, he acknowledged and confessed that mans force was nothing but weakness, and that all ought to be ascribed to God: whom he prayed that he would not be displeased with what he had spoken, nor deliver him to his Enemies, though he had deserved it, but assist him in the present danger. God heard his prayers, and caused a pleasant Fountain to spring from the foot of a Rock: for which cause Samson called the place Maxilla or Jaw, which name continueth even unto this day. After this battel, Samson set light by the Philistines, and went to Garza, where he sojourn'd in an Inn. The Governors of the City understanding his arrival, set men to keep the Gates, to the end he might not depart without their knowledge. But Samson not ignorant of what they intended against him; rose about midnight and took up the Gates, with the hinges and locks, and all the furniture of the same; and laying them on his shoulders, carried them to the Mountain above Hebron. Not long after, he transgressed the Laws of his Fathers, and corrupted his ways and manner of living, conforming himself to the fashions of the Gentiles, which was the source and cause of all his ruine. For he was taken with the love of a Philistine Courtezan called Dalila. As soon as the Governors of the Philistines knew it, they by promises wrought so with her, that they persuaded her to get out of him wherein his force consisted, and what the cause was that he could not be conquered by his Enemies. Dalila to accomplish their desire, made use of flattery and flattery, praising his great actions, and thence taking occasion to ask him whence his so prodigious strength proceeded. But Samson well judging on what design he askt him this question, answered her: that if he were tied with seven Vine-branches young and pliant, he should become the weakest of all men. She believed him, and having given notice thereof to the Governors of the Philistines, who sent to her house certain Souldiers, these, when he was drunk and asleep bound him as strongly as they could; Dalila suddenly waking him, told him that certain Souldiers were at hand to take him: but Samson brake the bonds of Vine-branches, and prepared himself to resist the assaults of those that lay in wait for him. The woman frustrated her hope, nor long after took an opportunity, to complain of him that distrusting her love and constancy, he had concealed that from her which the most desired to know, as if she were unable to conceal that which might any ways concern the fortune and safety of her beloved: But he deceived her the second time, and told her that if he were tied with seven cords, he should lose all his strength. Which when she had done, and found a contrary issue to her expectation, the third time Samson told her, her, that if he were tyed with seven cords, he should lose all his strength. Which when H he had done, and found a contrary issue to her expectation, the third time Samson told her, that if he plucked his hair with a fillet, he should be weakened: and having experienced that also, she found that it was false. Finally, she persuaded and conjured him in such earnestness, that being no longer able to avoid the ill that attended him, at last he condescended to gratify her, and said to her after this manner: It hath pleased God to have care over me, and as I was by his special providence brought into the World, so by his command I nourish this hair, for God hath forbidden me to cut the same; and my force shall endure as long as these locks shall endure and grow. Which when she understood she shaved off his hair, whilst he slept, and betrayed him to his Enemies, who used forces at that time he was too feeble to resist; and they plucked out his eyes, and led him away bound. Some time after the Philistines celebrated a publick feast (wherein the Princes and Peers banquetted and entertained one another in a spacious place, the cover whereof was upheld by two pillars; and Samson was sent for, and brought to the feast, to the end they might mock him in the midst of their mirth; his hair was then grown again; and this generous spirit taking it more grievously than all other evils which he endured, to be treated with such indignity, and not to be able to revenge himself on those that thus injuriously used him, feign'd himself very weak, and desired the Boy that led him, to let him approach and lean upon the said Pillars. As soon therefore as he got hold on them, he shook them in such sort, that they were overturned, and the house fell upon those that were therein, who all perished to the number of three thousand men: with these also died Samson, who finished his days in this sort, after he had commanded over Israel for the space of twenty years. He was a man of great vertue, strength and magnanimity: even to his latter hour, was fatal to the Philistines. And whereas he was allured and befottered by a woman, 'tis an effect of the infirmity of humane nature, which is prone to such faults: in all other things, we cannot too much admire his vertue. His Kindred took his body and buried it in Sarisa his Country, in the Sepulchre of his Ancestors.

C H A P. XI.

How the Sons of Eli the High-Priest were slain in Battel by the Philistines.

After the decease of Samson, Eli the High-Priest took upon him the Government of the Israelites. During his time there was a great Famine; and Elimelech unable to endure the misery thereof, came from Bethlehem a City of the Tribe of Juda, to inhabit in the Country of Moab, bringing with him Naomi his Wife and Chilon and Maalon his Sons, whom he had by her. Now when his affairs had fallen out with as fortunate success as could be desired, he married his Sons to certain Daughters of the Moabites, Chilon to Orpha, and Maalon to Ruth. After ten years, Elimelech and his Sons died. By which affliction Naomi being cast into great sorrow, and destitute of their company, whose dear familiarity she had preferred before the love of her Country: changed her resolution (according to those occurrences that had happened to her) and determined to return to her Friends, by reason she had received intelligence, that her Country at that time was in better estate than when she left it. Her Daughters-in-law would not endure to be separated from her; but would needs accompany her: but the wishing them a more happy marriage than that which they enjoyed with her Sons, and prosperity in all other things, and protesting unto them that she had no ability to do them good; she desired them to stay in that place, and not by following their wretched Mother-in-law in an uncertain event, lose the certain pleasure and peaceable fruition of their Country. These her persuasions took effect with Orpha: but Ruth (resolved in no sort to forsake her) attended on her Mother-in-law as future companion of whatsoever fortune should befall her. Now when both of them arrived in Bethlehem, (where, as we shall see afterwards) Boos, Elimelech's Kinsman, entertained them in his house: the Citizens called her by the name of Naomi; but she said, that they should rather call her Mara (for Naomi in the Hebrew tongue signifies felicity, and Mara, bitterness.) When it was Harvest time, Ruth by the permission of her Mother, went out into the fields to glean Corn for their sustenance: and it fortuned that she met in the field with Boos who came thither likewise not long after; and who beholding her, inquired of the chief Reaper touching this young woman. He, having a little before understood her condition, declared it to his Master Boos, commanding her for the good affection which the bare her Mother-in-law, and for the memory he had of her deceased Son, whom she had married; wished her all good fortune: and not suffering her to glean, he permitted her to reap and to gather all that which she might; commanded the Master reaper

A reaper that he should not hinder her from taking whatsoever she pleased: and that when the reapers took their refection, they should give her both meat and drink. What Corn Ruth gathered she reserved for her Mother-in-law, and came home at night and brought her the sheaves. In like manner Naomi reserved a portion of certain victuals for her, which in way of kindness her neighbours had sent her. At her return, Ruth reported to her all the words that Boos had said unto her: And Naomi gave her to understand that Boos was her kinsman, and so good a man, that it might be hoped he would take some care of her. So Ruth went again with Boos handmaids to gather her gleanings; and certain days after (about the time that they threshed Barley) Boos came to his Farm, and slept on the floor: which when Naomi understood, she thought it might be for the advantage of the young woman, to lie and sleep at his feet; and accordingly she advised her to endeavour it. Ruth (that made a conscience to contradict her Mother-in-law in whatsoever she commanded her) went very gently and lay at his feet; and upon her first arrival Boos perceived nothing (because he was fast asleep;) but when he awaked about midnight, and felt some body lying at his feet, he demanded who it was: whereupon he told him her name: requesting him as her master, that he would permit her to repose in that place for that time. He inquired no further, but let her sleep; but early in the morning, before the Servants began their work, he commanded her to arise, and to take as much Barley with her as she could bear, to the end she might return to her Mother-in-law, before that any man perceived that she had slept in that place (because it is wisdom to avoid occasions of talk, especially in a thing of this importance.) Touching the rest, (said he) the matter standeth thus: Thou hast a kinsman (said he) that is nearer thee in blood than I am; thou must inquire of him if it be his pleasure to take thee to Wife: if he saith that he liketh thee, thou must then necessarily submit unto him: but if he refuse thee, I will take thee for my Wife according as the Law obligeth me. Now when she had reported these news unto her Mother-in-law, she took courage and conceived hope that Boos would not abandon them. Boos came to the City about noon, and called a Council of the Elders, and sent for Ruth and his kinsman, to whom he spake thus: Dost thou not possess the heritage of Abimelech? Yes, answered he, I am seized thereof by the right of proximity, according to Law. Boos replied, Thou must not (saith he) only observe the Laws in part; but thou must precisely execute them all. Behold here a young woman, Abimelech's Widow, whom it behoveth thee to marry according to the Law, if thou wilt inherit possessions. But the man surrendered to Boos, not only the possessions, but also the woman; by reason that Boos was allied also to those that were dead, and especially for that the said kinsman had already both Wife and Children. Boos therefore (having first taken the Magistrates to witness) call'd for the woman, and willed her to draw near her kinsman, and to unloose his shoe, and strike him on the face (according as the Law had ordained;) which done, Boos espoused Ruth, by whom (about a year after he had a Son, which Naomi brought up; and called his name Obed, in hope he would assist in her old age: (for Obed in the Hebrew tongue signifies assistance) Obed begat Jesse, and Jesse begat David, who was King, and who left the Realm to his successors for one and twenty Generations. Boos was obliged to relate these things touching Ruth, because I would declare how God, by his Sovereign power, raises whom he pleases from obscurity, to the highest dignity as he did David, whose original I have shewed you.

The affairs of the Hebrews were at this time in very poor estate, and they entred into a new War against the Philistines upon this occasion: The High-Priest Eli had two Sons Opni and Phinees. They against all right and Law (offering outrages to men, and committing impieties against God) suffered no sin to escape them: for they were not contented to receive what belonged to them, but they took what did not. And as women came to the Tabernacle for devotion, they abused them, ravishing some against their wills, and corrupting others by presents; and thus they exercised a manifest and licentious tyranny; their Father was much displeased with them for these crimes as well as the people. And God having declared to Eli, and the Prophet Samuel (who then was very young) what vengeance should fall upon Eli's Children, he mourned over them, as if they had been already dead. But I will first speak something concerning this Prophet Samuel, and afterwards of the Children of Eli, and what calamity fell upon all the Hebrew Nation. Elcana was a Levite of mean condition, living in Ramat, a part of Ephraim: he had married two Wives, the one called Anna, the other Phenenna; by Phenenna he had Children; yet he loved Anna very entirely, although she was barren. One day when Elcana with his Wives were at Silo, where the Tabernacle of God was (as we have before declared) to the intent to offer Sacrifice in that place: during the festival he distributed the portion of his meat to his Wives and Children: Anna (beholding the Children of his other Wife sitting near their Mother) began to weep and lament with her self, because she was without issue, and could not be eased with all consolation which her Husband gave her. She went into the Tabernacle to beseech God that it would please him to make her a Mother; and made a vow that if he gave her a Son, he should be dedicated to the service of God. And for that he employed much time in making her prayers, the High-Priest Eli, who sat before the Tabernacle commanded her to depart from thence, supposing that she had drunk too much Wine: but after he told him that she drank nothing but Water, and that (being oppressed with grief) she was come to the Tabernacle, to beseech God that it would please him to grant her Children, he exhorted her to be of good courage, and assured her that God had heard her prayers: whereupon she returned to her Husband full of good hope, and took her repast with joy. They returned to their own house, she began to be big with child, and at last she brought forth a Son, whom she called Samuel (that is to say, requested of God.) Afterwards they returned to offer Sacrifice, and give thanks to God for the birth of the child, which God had given them, and to bring their tithes. Hannah, remembering the vow she had made, delivered the child into the hands of Eli, and consecrated him to God to be his Prophet. For which cause they suffered his Hair to grow, and he drank nothing but Water, and he was brought up in the Temple.

Elkanah had by Hannah other Sons also and three Daughters. As soon as Samuel had attained to the age of twelve years, he began to prophesie. For on a certain night whilst he slept, God called him, by his name: and he supposing that it was the High-Priest that called him, came unto him; but Eli told him, that he had not called him. The same thing was done three times: and then Eli, easily judging what it was, said to him, Samuel, I neither called thee now, nor before, but it is God that calleth thee, answer him therefore, and say, Here I am, ready to obey. He heard the voice of God once more; and he answered, Behold me, O Lord, what wouldst thou have me to do? I am ready to obey. Then God answered, saying: Go and tell the Israelites that so great a calamity shall fall upon them that no tongue can express it. The Sons of Eli shall die in one day, and the Priesthood shall be removed from his Family to that of Eleazar: For Eli hath loved his Children more than my service, and hath drawn my curse upon them.

Samuel fearing to overwhelm the old man with sorrow, would not disclose this Oracle to him: but Eli constrained him to tell it, and it made him the more assured of the imminent death of his Sons. And because all the things which Samuel prophesied came to pass, his reputation increased daily more and more.

At that time the Philistines (leading out their Army against the Israelites) incamped near the City of Amphec, and for that the Hebrews were negligent to oppose them, they advanced further into the Country. So at length in a fight with their Enemies, the Philistines got the upper hand and slew 4000 Hebrews, and pursued those that fled even to their own Tents. The fear of the Hebrews after this overthrow was so great, that they sent to the Council of the Elders and the High-Priest, praying them to bring the Ark of God with them; to the end that having it present with them, they might give battle and overcome their Enemies. But they considered not, that he that had pronounced the sentence of their calamity against them, was greater than the Ark, which deserved not to be revered but for him. The Ark was brought, and the Sons of Eli attended it, whom their Father expressly commanded, that if it fell out that the Ark was taken, they should never more come into his presence. Now Phinees executed the office of the High-Priest by the permission of his Father, by reason he was very aged.

The Hebrews upon the arrival of the Ark conceived great hope that they should have the upper hand of their Enemies. The Philistines likewise were dismayed, fearing the presence of the same: but the event was not answerable to the one or to the others expectation. For when they joynd battle, the victory which the Hebrews hoped would be theirs, fell to the Philistines; and the loss which the Philistines feared fell upon the Hebrews, who at last perceived that they had reposed their confidence on the Ark in vain. For as soon as their Enemies gave them the first charge, they turned their backs, and lost about thirty thousand men, amongst whom were the two Sons of the High-Priest; and the Ark was taken and carried away by the Enemy.

CHAP. XII.

Eli understanding the loss of his Sons, fell from his Seat, and died.

AS soon as the news of this overthrow was brought to Siloe, and it was certainly known that the Ark was taken, (for a young Benjamite, who had escap'd out of the Battel, came to bring tidings thereof) all the City was filled with sorrow: and Eli the High-Priest (who sat in one of the gates on a high Throne) understanding the lamentation, and judging that some disaster had befallen his People, sent to seek out this young Messenger, by whom he was advertis'd of that which had happened. This accident of his Sons and the Army, he heard with great moderation, because that before that time God had told him what should happen; (and those adversities which are foreseen, do less afflict us when they happen.) But when he knew that the Ark was taken, and in the Enemies hands, a Calamity so beyond his expectation, in such sort augmented his grief, that he suffered himself to fall from his Throne upon the ground, where he died: he lived ninety eight years in all, and spent forty of them in the Government of the People.

The same day died the Wife of Phinees the Son of Eli, soon after she understood the misfortune of her Husband: for she was with Child when the message of his death was brought to her, and she was deliver'd of a Son in the seventh month, which lived and was called Ichabod, (which signifieth ignominy) by reason of the Infamy received at that time by the Army.

Eli was the first that governed among the Successors of Ithamar, one of the Sons of Aaron: for before that time the house of Eleazar was possessed of the Priesthood, (the Son receiving it from his Father) Eleazar left it to Phinees; after him, Abiezer his Son enjoy'd the place, and left it to his Son Bochi, whose Son called Ozes received it; after whom Eli (of whom we speak at this present) took the same, whose Posterity retain'd that dignity till the time of the Reign of Solomon, when the Posterity of Eleazar were restored to it.

CHAP. I.

How the Philistines, compelled by Pestilence and Famine, sent back the Ark of the Covenant unto the Hebrews.

1 Sam. 5. 1, ad 6.
Heliody Ruffini, cap. 1.
The sacred Ark is carried into the Temple of Dagon. They of Azot are horribly plagued for taking away the Ark. Mice devour the fruit of the Country of Azot.

After the Philistines had got the Victory over the Hebrews, and taken the sacred Ark, (as we have before declared) they brought it, with their other spoils, to the City of Azot, and placed it in manner of a Trophee in the Temple of Dagon their Idol. But the next day after, when early in the Morning they entred into the Temple to adore their god, they found him fallen from that Base or Pillar that sustained him, and lying along the ground, his face upwards, before the Ark; whereat being much moved, they took him up, and fastned him in his former place: and when they came often thither, and always found him prostrate, and as it were, adoring before the Ark, a great fear and perturbation invaded the whole People. At length, a grievous Plague not only ranged in the City of Azot, but also seized on all the Inhabitants of the Country. For the People being suddenly taken with the Elux, died in great Torment, and some of them vomited up their Bowels, being corrupted and corroded with the disease. Besides this, the whole Land swarmed with Mice, which destroying all things, neither spared the Corn, nor any other Fruit. The Azotians being afflicted with these Calamities, and unable longer to endure the same, understood that the Ark was the cause thereof, and that neither the Victory, or the taking of the same, had any ways procured their advantage. They therefore sent to the Ascalonites, desiring them to receive the Ark into their City; who willingly condescending to their Embassage and Demand, received the Ark, and were presently plagued with the same sicknesses which the Azotians had suffered. For together with the Ark the calamities also were transported; for which cause it was likewise sent from this place to another, where it remained but a little while; for the Inhabitants of the place being afflicted with the same Maladies which the other endured, sent it to the Neighbour Cities: and after this sort the Ark was conveyed to five Cities of the Philistines, (exacting as it were, by those Plagues, a Tribute of every one in punishment of the Sacrilege which they committed, by retaining a thing consecrated to God. At last, wearied with so many evils, and made examples unto others not to entertain the Ark, which so grievously recompensed those that received the same, they conceiv'd there was no other way left, but to find out some good means to rid themselves of it. When therefore the Princes of the five Cities, of Geth, Accaron, Ascalon, Gaza and Azot, were assembled, they consulted

A sulted amongst themselves what was best to be done; and first of all it was propos'd to send back the Ark to those to whom it appertain'd, since God scourg'd with so many Plagues those that receiv'd it into their Cities, to testify his indignation for the taking of it, and to execute his vengeance of the Crime. But some said, that this resolution was unfit to be executed, denying that those evils were to be imputed to the Captivity of the Ark, (whose power, if it were so great as they imagin'd, or if God had any care of the same, he would never have permitted it to have fallen into the hands of men of a contrary Religion) and perfwading them to bear these Misfortunes with an equal mind; and to account all these Calamities as effects of Nature, which at certain periods of times is wont to produce in Mens Bodies, in the Earth, and in Plants, and in other things B subject to her power, such kind of alterations and changes. Others, more prudent and intelligent, propos'd a third way, which was, neither to fend away the Ark, nor yet to retain it, but to offer to God in the name of the five Cities, five golden Statues in testimony of their gratitude, because they had been preserved by his favour from that Plague, from which, by humane remedies, it was impossible to escape; and to offer also as many golden Mice, like those that had spoiled their Country. All these to be locked in a Chest, and laid upon the Ark; and the Ark to be plac'd upon a new Cart made purposefully, to which they should yoke and tie two Kine that had new calved, locking up their Calves from them, lest they should be an impediment to their Dams, and to the intent, that through the desire to see their young, they might hasten the faster. That done, that driving the Chariot to a place that had three ways, they should suffer them to draw that way that they listed; and if they took the way of the Hebrews, and travell'd towards their Country, then they should assure themselves that the Ark was the cause of their evils; but if they drew another way, let them (said they) be driven back again, being most assured, that the Ark hath no such virtue in it. This council was approved by every one of the Assembly, and presently executed: having prepared all things, they brought the Chariot into a high way that lookt three ways, and leaving it there, re- turned back again.

C H A P. II.

D The Victory of the Hebrews under the Conduct of Samuel.

NOW when the Kine took the way which led to the Israelites, and travelled there- in no otherwise than if some men had led them, the Governours of the Philistines follow'd them, desirous to understand whither they went, and in what place they would rest. There is a Borough in the Tribe of Juda called Bethsana, towards which they drew: And although they had a very fair Plain before them, yet would they not travel any further, but rested the Chariot in that place. The Inhabitants came to the spectacle, and greatly rejoiced thereat: for although it was Summer-time, (wherein every one was busied in gathering the fruits of the field) yet when they perceived the Ark, they were so transported with joy, that they laid aside the work which they had in hand, and run presently to the Chariot. Then taking down the Ark and the Coffer, (wherein the Statues of Gold, and golden Rats were) they laid them upon a stone in the field; and after they had solemnly sacrificed and feasted together, they offered up both the Chariot and Kine for a Burnt-offering unto God. Which when the Philistines saw, they returned back into their own Country to carry the News. But God's indignation and displeasure was kindled against the Bethsanimites: so that 70 of them were slain, because they had dar'd to touch the Ark, and with prophane hands (not being Priests) attempted to sustain it. The Inhabitants lamented their loss, and mourned, for that their Country-men were extinguished by no common death, but by a punishment and plague sent from God. And acknowledging that they were unworthy that the Ark should remain with them, they sent Messengers to the Governours, and the rest of the Hebrews, to let them understand that they had recovered the Ark out of the hands of the Philistines. Whereupon order was given to place the same in Cariathiarim, a City bordering upon the Bethsanimites. In that place there dwelt a Man of the Race of the Levites, called Ami- into Cariathiarim, madab, (who had the honour and reputation of a good Man) to his House the Ark was sent, as to a place agreeable to God, because there dwelt in the same a Man of so much virtue. His Sons had the charge of the Ark, and continued in that service for the space of 20 years, during which time it remained in Cariathiarim, after it had remained only four months with the Philistines. Whilst the Ark was in the City of Cariathiarim, the Israelites liv'd very religiously, and offer'd to God Prayers and Sacrifices, shewing great devotion and forwardness in his service. The Prophet Samuel perceiving this their good demeanor, and supposing it a fit occasion to exhorte them to liberty, and the benefits which attend attend the same; he accommodated his Speech to their Sentiments, and spake to them H to this effect: Ye men of Israel, since at this present the Philistines cease not to molest you, before Christ's and God beginneth to shew himself merciful and favourable to you: it becometh you, not only to be touched with a desire of recovering your liberty, but also to endeavour to recover the same in effect. Beware therefore, lest through the corruption of your own manners, you make your selves unworthy thereof; and let each one of you endeavour to follow justice, and expelling all sin out of your minds, convert your selves in all purity to God, and persevere constantly in his service. For in doing these things, you shall shortly obtain all felicity, and especially a new liberty, and an assured victory against your Enemies; which neither by valour, or by the strength of your bodies, or by the multitude of your Armies, you were able to obtain: for God hath not proposed Rewards for these things, but for virtue and justice: I and (trust me) he will not deceive your expectation, nor fail in the execution of his promises. When he had spoken after this manner, all the People testified their consent, by acclamations, shewing the pleasure they conceived by this discourse, and promising to do that which should be well-pleasing to God. Whereupon Samuel assembled them the second time in the City of Maspha (which word signifieth conspicuous) there they erected an Altar, and sacrificed unto God; and after they had fasted for a day's space, they made publick Prayers to God. The Philistines being advertised of this Assembly, came suddenly with a great Army, and many Forces, intending to surprize the Hebrews, who neither expected nor were prepared for them. This sudden approach of theirs much dismayed the Hebrews: so that running to Samuel, they told him that their hearts fail ed them through fear, and their minds were troubled with the remembrance of their former losses: for which cause they ought to hold themselves in quiet, for fear lest the Enemy should employ his power against them. Thou hast led us hither to pray, sacrifice, and offer up our vows to God, and behold the Philistines are encamped near us, and ready to surprize us, naked and disarmed: we have no other hope therefore of security, but what proceedeth from thee, and unless God, moved by thy prayers, give us means to escape their hands. Samuel, in way of answer, wished them to be of good cheer, assuring them, that God would give them some testimony of his assistance: whereupon sacrificing a sucking Lamb in the name of the people, he prayed God that it would please him to stretch forth his right hand for them in the Battle against the Philistines; and that he would not permit them to fall this second time into the Enemies hands. To these prayers of his God gave ear, and accepted their humble hearts and dutiful observance, being well-pleased with their offering, and promising them victory. Before the Sacrifice was wholly consumed with the Flame, and the Ceremonies performed, the Enemies ranged their Battels in the Israelites sight. Supposing the day already theirs, that they had surprized the Jews unprepared for fight (as being assembled in that place to no such end). But the matter fell out contrary to what they expected; and had they been foretold the same, they would have scarcely believed it. For first by an effect of God's Omnipotence, the Earth trembled under their feet, so that they could scarce stand, and some were suddenly swallowed up by the Earthquake, and a great Thunder was accompanied with such scorching Lightnings, that their eyes being dazzled, and their hands blasted therewith, they could not wield or manage their Weapons, and so were constrained to repose all their hope and confidence in night. But Samuel seeing them thus dismayed, suddenly set upon them, and killing many of them, called not to pursue the rest as far as a place called Carre, where he erected a stone for a Trophie, or mark both of his own Victory; and the Enemies flight, and called the same the Iron Rock, to testify that the People had received from God all the strength which they had used in this famous Battle. The Philistines, after they had received this overthrow, talked not out any more against the Israelites; but remembering their fear, and the strange accidents that befell them, they remained in peace, offering no further invasion: for the confidence which the Philistines had before that time conceived against the Hebrews, was removed into the hearts of the Hebrews ever after this Victory. Samuel continued the War against them, and slew a great number of them, and for ever abated their pride, taking from them that Country which formerly by Conquest they had cut off from the inheritance of the Jews, which Country extendeth from the Frontier of Geth, to the City of Accaron: and the rest of the Canaanites at that time had peace with the Israelites.

C H A P. III.

Samuel unable, by reason of his old age, any longer to Govern the State, committeth it to the administration of his Sons.

NOW when the Prophet Samuel had reduced the people to a good form of Government, he assigned them a City whither they might appeal, and decide those differences that fell out amongst them: and he travelled twice every year from City to City, to administer justice unto them, and continued this policy for a long time. But when he found himself overburdened with years, and unapt to execute his ordinary offices, he surrendered the Government and Superintendency of the people to his Sons, the elder of whom was called Jael, and the younger Abiba; and he commanded that one of them should make his seat of justice in Bethel, and the other reside at Berjaba, dividing the people, and attributing each part to its particular Judge. Now it became manifest by experience, that Children are not always like their Fathers; but sometimes of evil Parents there are good Children bred; as contrariwise at this time, of a good Father there were evil Sons. For forsaking the instructions of their Father, they followed a quite contrary course, and perverted justice with corruptions and rewards, and fostered in lights and pleasures; in contempt of the will of God, and the instructions of their Father, who had no greater care, than that they should acquire themselves well of their duty.

C H A P. IV.

How the people, being displeased with the manners and government of the Sons of Samuel, demanded a King.

WHEN therefore the people saw, that the Sons of the prophet committed so many outrages against their Laws, and Policy, they were greatly displeased, and had recourse to their Father who dwelt in the City of Ramatha; where relating to him the misdemeanors of his Sons, they desired him that seeing his age rendered him unfit to administer the affairs of the Commonwealth, he would nominate and elect a King over them, who might both command their Nation, and take vengeance on the Philistines for their many injuries. This demand of the people, sensibly afflicted Samuel's mind: for he extremely loved justice, and liked not Kingly government, being of opinion that Aristocracy was the happiest of all governments. This matter so troubled him that, by reason of his care, he could neither eat nor sleep; but all night long he tossed and tumbled in his bed, through the great agitation in his mind. Whilst this his indisposition continued, God appeared to him, and comforted him, bidding him not to be grieved at what the people had required: that this injury, not only concerned him, but God himself whom they disclaimed for their King and Governour. That this was not the first time of their taking up this resolution; that they had inclined to it from the day that they departed out of Egypt; but ere it be long (said he) they shall repent themselves, but too late, when the evil is past remedy; and they shall condemn themselves for their ingratitude towards me, their God, and towards thee their Prophet. I will therefore that thou chuse them a King, him that I shall nominate to thee; after thou hast advertised them what evils they shall endure by their having a King, and what inconveniences follow the change which so vehemently and unhappily they pursue. The next day Samuel assembled the people about break of day, and promised them that he would establish them a King. But, saith he, before I effect that which you request, I must declare to you what condition you shall live in, under subjection to Royalty; and how many and grievous evils you shall be pressed with, by those Kings that shall govern you. Know therefore first of all, that your Kings will take your Children from you, and make some of them Coachmen, and others Horsemen and Archers of their Guard, others their Posts and Tribunes and Centurions; some likewise their Handicrafts men, and Armourers, and Chariot-makers, and Smiths, and Forgers of Weapons, and Husbandmen of his fields, and Ploughers and diggers of his Vineyards; neither is there any thing which they shall not be compelled to do after the manner of bond-slaves, that are bought with money. They shall take your Daughters also, and make them their Perfumers, Cooks and Bakers; and they shall employ them in all servile offices, wherein bond-maids are employed; either by fear or punishment. They shall take from you your substance, and give it to their Eunuchs and other servants. They shall take your flocks, and distribute them amongst their Domesticks: In a word, you and all yours shall be subject not only to one King, but also to his servants. When you endure these things, then shall you call to remembrance what I have foretold you, and with repentance beseech

Although theſe future inconveniences were foretold them, yet did the people neglect them: and not ſuſſering the perverſe opinion they had conceived in their minds, to be altered or diverted, they inſiſted with all obſtinacy, and without care of future miſchiefs, that they might have a King created over them, becauſe (as they ſaid) it was neceſſary to have a King that might manage War for them, to revenge them on their Enemies, and reſtore their Forces; and that there was nothing more reaſonable, than that they ſhould be governed in the ſame fort as their Neighbours were. Samuel finding his perſuaſions could prevail nothing at all with them, and that they could not be diverted from their reſolution, he ſpoke thus: Go your ways for this time every one of you to your houſes, and I will cauſe you to be aſſembled in a ſhort time, when God ſhall have informed me what King he will give you.

1 Sam. 10. 1. Samuel appointeth Saul King.

There was a man of the Tribe of Benjamin, of Noble Birth, and commendable manners, called Cis, who had a young Son named Saul, who was tall of ſtature, and had ſo much ſpirit and courage, that he might well paſs for an extraordinary man. This Cis having fair Affes, wherein for their handſomneſs he took more pleaſure than in any other kind of Cattel, loſt ſome of them which were ſtrayed from the reſt of his flock: whereupon he ſent his Son, accompanied with a Servant, to ſeek them out; Saul having travelled in queſt of them thorow all his Fathers Tribe, journied thorow the reſt of the Tribes, without any tydings of them: for which cauſe he determined to return home again; for fear leaſt his Father ſhould conceive ſome care and grief for him in his abſence. As he arrived near the City of Ramath, the Servant that followed him, told him, that there dwelt a Prophet in that place, who always foretold the truth, and he counſelled him to addreſs to him, with aſſurance, that by him he ſhould underſtand what was become of his Affes. Saul answered, that he had no money left to recompenſe the Prophet, having conſumed all they brought forth with them in their journey. L His Servant replied, that he had ſtill the fourth part of a Sicle, which they might give him; for he was ignorant that the Prophet was not wont to receive money of any. When they drew near the Gates of the City, they met certain Maidens that went out to fetch water, of whom Saul demanded where the prophet dwelt? they told him, and adviſed him to make haſte before he was ſet down to ſupper, for at that time he entertained divers perſons at his houſe. Samuel had invited this company, by reaſon that all the day long he had inſtantly beſought God, to declare to him, who it was that ſhould be eſtabliſhed King: and God had given him to underſtand, that the next day, and at the ſame hour, he would ſend a young man to him of the Tribe of Benjamin, who was the perſon he had choſen. Thus Samuel ſate in the upper part of his houſe, expecting M the time appointed: which being come, he came down to go to ſupper, and in the way he met Saul. At that very inſtant God ſignified to Samuel, that it was he whom he had elected Prince and Governour over the people.

Saul addreſſing himſelf to Samuel, deſired him to ſhew him the Prophets lodging, being he was a ſtranger, and knew it not. Samuel told him, that he himſelf was the man, and invited him to the banquet; aſſuring him that not only his Affes (in ſearch of which he had travelled ſo long) were ſafe, but that he ſhould reign and abound with all forts of goods. Saul answered: My Lord, I am too mean to hope or expect ſo much; and my Tribe is the leaſt of all the Tribes: and you mock me, in ſpeaking ſuch things as ſurpaſs my condition. The Prophet took him by the hand, and brought N both him and his Servant to the table, and placed him above all thoſe that were invited, who were to the number of ſeventy, and he placed his Servant next him. Samuel commanded that a royal portion ſhould be ſet before Saul; and when the hour of bed-time came, all the reſt aroſe and departed to their houſes, but Saul and his Servant lodged that night with the Prophet: and as ſoon as it was day, Samuel awaked Saul, and leading him out of Town, commanded him to ſend his Servant before, and to remain himſelf with him behind, becauſe he had certain things to impart to him in private. Hereupon Saul ſent away his Servant, and Samuel taking a Cruſe of Oyl, poured the ſame upon the young mans head, and embracing him, ſaid, God eſtabliſheth thee King over his people, to avenge them of the Philiftines. Thou ſhalt have this ſign O of the truth of what I tell thee: when thou art departed from hence, thou ſhalt overtake three men in the way travelling to Bethel, to adore and ſacrifice to God: the firſt of which

A which, thou ſhalt ſee bearing three Loaves, the ſecond a Goat, and the third a bottle of Wine. Theſe ſhall embrace thee and careſs thee; and they ſhall give thee two Loaves, and thou ſhalt receive them. And from thence ſhalt thou depart to Rachel, where thou ſhalt meet a Meſſenger, that ſhall certifie thee that the Affes are found. From thence coming unto Gathatha, thou ſhalt find the Prophets aſſembled in their Congregation, and being filled with the Spirit of God, thou ſhalt prophetic amongſt them: to that whoſever ſhall behold thee, ſhall ſay with admiration: Whence cometh it to paſs that the Son of Cis hath attained ſo good fortune? and when thou haſt had theſe ſigns, thou canſt no longer doubt that God is with thee: go and ſalute thy Father, and thy kinsmen, and then come back to me at Galgah, to the end we may offer ſacrifices of B thankſgiving to God. Samuel having in this manner ſpoken to Saul, gave him licence to depart: and all theſe things hapned to Saul, according as the Prophet Samuel had foretold him. When Saul arrived at the houſe of his Father, Abner, who was his Uncle, and whom he loved above all the reſt of his Friends, queſtioned with him about his voyage, and thoſe things that had hapned to him: and Saul hid nothing from him, but particularly informed him of all that hapned to him, during his abode with the Prophet Samuel, and how he had told him of the recovery of his Affes: but touching the Royalty, and thoſe things that concerned the ſame, he ſaid nothing; fearing that either it would not be believed, or elſe it would draw envy upon him. For although he were both his friend and couſin; yet he thought it more ſecure and convenient to keep it ſilent, conſidering the infirmity of mans nature, and that few men are conſtant in friendſhip, and capable of beholding without envy, the proſperity of others, even their near relations and friends, though they know that the ſame befalls them by the particular favour of God.

After this, Samuel aſſembled the people in the City of Mafpha, where he ſpoke to them in this manner: Behold what God hath commanded me to tell you in his name. When you grand under the yoke of the Egyptians, I freed you from ſervitude, and delivered you from the tyranny of the Neighbouring Kings who conquered you ſo often: Now in acknowledgment of ſo many benefits, you will have me no longer for your King; and as if you were ignorant, that the greateſt good, that can happen to men, is to be governed by him that is the Sovereign good; You abandon your God, to ſet a man upon the throne; who, according to his pleaſure and the unbridled bent of his paſſion, will uſe you like beaſts, and will uſurp upon your goods, without forbearing anything whatſoever. For how can men have as great love for men, as I, whoſe bandy work they are. Notwithſtanding ſince you have thus determined, and fear not to commit ſo great an outrage againſt God, rank your ſelves in order according to your Tribes and Families, and caſt your lots. To this the people conſcended, and the lot fell on the Tribe of Benjamin; being caſt the ſecond time, it fell on the Family of Merri; and afterwards being caſt upon the men of that family, it fell upon Saul, who was the Son of Cis. The young man, who before knew what would happen, had ſtept aſide, to the end that it might not ſeem that he was ambitious of his dignity. The moderation he ſhewed in this matter, was remarkable; for whereas moſt men cannot conceal their joy when any degree of felicity falls upon them, but manifeſt the ſame to all men; Saul not only was void of vain appearance (although he were to be King and Lord of ſo many worthy people) but which is more, he ſtole away from the preſence of thoſe men over whom he was to command, and obliged them to ſeek after him, and labour to find him out. Whiſt therefore they carefully ſought and knew not what was become of Saul, the Prophet prayed God that he ſhould ſhew them where he was, and bring undertaking him into their preſence: which having obtained, he ſent out certain meſſengers to conduct him thither, and as ſoon as he came amongſt them, Samuel placed him in the miſt, of the people. Now he was taller than any of the company by the ſhoulders, and had ſo a Kingly and goodly ſhape and appearance. Then ſpoke the prophet after this manner: F God hath given you this man to be your King, behold how he ſurpaſſeth you all, and ſeems of the people himſelf worthy to be your Prince. But aſſoon as the people had cried, God ſave the King; Saul of a high read the ſame to them in the hearing of the King, and put the book into the Tabernacle, of God, for a perpetual testimony to poſterity of thoſe things which in future ages ſhould, by the ſucceſs, according as he had prophesied: which done, Samuel diſmiſſed the people, and returned to the City of Ramath, which was his Country. But Saul departing to Gathatha, divers worthy men gave their attendance on him; and paid him the honour that appertaineth to a King. But divers ſeditious and looſe companions, who ſet him at naught, him G both mocked them; and thoſe things which he did, neither brought they any preſents unto Saul, nor ſeemed either in affection, or in word, to reſpect their King. A month after this inſultment, their fell a War betwixt him and Nabaz King of the Ammonites, which brought him great reputation. This Nabas had offered divers outrages to those H Jews that dwell on the other side of Jordan. For he had passed the River with a great Army levied against them; and had taken divers of their Cities. And to the intent they might not revolt to deliver themselves from his subjection, he used this subtilty and prevention. To all that surrendered themselves to his mercy, or that were taken Captives in the Wars, he plucked out their right eyes; and this he did, to the end that when they would defend themselves, they might have their left eyes covered with their Bucklers, and by that means unable to use their Armor. The King of the Ammonites having after this manner dealt with those on the other side of Jordan, he led his Army against the Gadites, and encamped near their chief City called Jabesh, to which he sent Heralds to summon the inhabitants to surrender on these conditions: either to suffer their right eyes to be pulled out, or else by enduring the siege, to see the final overthrow both of themselves, and of their City, requiring them to chuse which they lik'd, either to lose a little part of their body, or hazard both their Fortunes and lives together. The Gadites, terrified with this dreadful election, knew not what to resolve upon, but asked truce for seven days, to the end that sending their messengers to those of their Nation they might crave their aid, which if they could obtain, they would War; otherwise they promised to submit themselves unto the Enemy, on what conditions were best pleasing unto him. Nabas made no difficulty to grant them what they demanded, so much he contemned the Israelites: and he permitted them likewise to crave assistance at all their hands, who were their associates. Whereupon they presently sent messengers from City to City, and certified the Israelites of all that Nabas had done unto them, and the extremity whereunto they were reduced. The Israelites understanding in what estate they of Jabesh were, greatly lamented their condition; but their fear suffered them to assist their friends in no other manner than by commiseration. Yet as soon as their messengers arrived in the City where Saul was, and that they had recounted to him the dangers wherewith the Jabeshites were oppressed; the people were also moved with unprofitable compassion. But Saul at this returning from the field into the City, perceiving the inhabitants drowned in tears, and inquiring for what cause they were so dejected, he no sooner understood it, but he was stirred up by the Spirit of God, and sent the Ambassadors back again to those that sent them, promising that within three days he would succour them, and that he would have the upper hand of the Enemy before Sun-rise, to the end that the rising Sun might behold them victorious, and delivered from all fear. In the mean time he commanded some of them to flay wash him, to the intent they might guide him in the way.

CH A P. VI.

The Combate and Victory of Saul over the Ammonites.

*S*aul desirous, by the fear of punishment, to incite the people to take Arms immediately, and make War upon the Ammonites, cut the hams of his own oxen, and threatened all those whom he met with, to do the like to theirs, except the next day they presented themselves with their Arms upon the bank of Jordan, to follow the King and the Prophet Samuel, whither they would conduct them.

The fear of this penalty published among the Tribes, made them gather to a body about the same time, so that all the paries of the people were mustred in the City of Bala. In this survey, besides those of the Tribe of Juda, were numbered seven thousand thousand men, and of the Tribe of Juda in particular, there were seventy thousand. Saul having passed Jordan, and marched all night, came before Sun-rise to the place where he intended to conduct them, and dividing his Army into three parts, he attacked the Enemy on every side, who suspected no such encounter: and fighting valiantly against them, he slew divers, and amongst the rest Nabas King of the Ammonites. This victory made Saul's name famous amongst the Hebrews, so that he was wonderfully praised and honoured for his valour: and if before any contemned him, now they changed their opinions, and honoured him, and accounted him the worthiest of them all. For he was not satisfied to redeem and deliver those of Jabesh, but he entered the Country of the Ammonites also, and ravaged the same with his Army; and after he had obtained a great booty, both he and his Army victoriously returned to their dwelling places. The people highly pleased with this noble action achieved by Saul, rejoiced that they had demanded a King, and exclaimed against those that said it would be discommodious and unprofitable for the Commonwealth, saying, Where are now these murmurers? let them be put to death: with other such like words, that a people beforewith good success, is wont to speak against them that oppose the same. Saul commended the affection of the

A the people: but swore none should be put to death that day because it would not seem agreeable, that the victory given them by God, should be sullied with the blood of their Brethren: but rather that it was more proper the time should be spent in feasting and jollity. After this Samuel told them, that they ought to confirm the Kingdom of Saul by a second Election, and to that end they assembled together in the City of Gab-Saul, according as he commanded them: and there, in the sight of all the People, Saul against his adversaries, was the Aristocracy and Government of the better sort amongst the Hebrews turned into a Monarchy. For under Moses and his successor Joshua, who was General of the Army, the form of the Commonwealths was Aristocratical. After their death, for the space of eighteen years, the people was without Government. The Commonwealth not long after resumed its first form of Government; and the supreme Authority was given to him that was esteemed the most valiant in War, and the most upright in doing of the Justice. During which time such Magistrates were called Judges.

After this the Prophet Samuel assembled the people, and spake to them after this manner: I conjure you by that great God that sent those two admirable Brothers Moses and Aaron to deliver our forefathers from the Egyptians, and their tyranny, that without any consideration either of fear or favour, or of any other passion, you truly testify whether I have committed any injustice either for interest, avarice, or affection. Declare it, if I have taken away any man's Calf, or sheep, or any other thing whatsoever, but that which I might lawfully take for my relief and sustenance, and at such hands as willingly offer me the same; or if I have employed any Beasts to my service, or use his cattle to my profit and his hindrance: in these and such like, if I have offended any man let him now accuse me in the presence of the King. All of them cried out with one voice that no such fault had been committed by him, but that he had governed their Nation in Holiness and Justice. After the people had thus publicly testified in behalf of Samuel, he said unto them: Since you have freely protested, that you have no cause of wrong to charge against me, hear I pray you, wherein I can justly accuse you: You have grievously offended against the Majesty of God, in that you have required a King at his hands: you should have rather remembered, that your old Father Jacob accompanied only with his seventy Sons came into Egypt, constrained thereto by famine, and that in that Country divers thousands of persons issued from his loins, whom the Egyptians kept in captivity, doing them extreme outrages. And when your fathers called upon God, he wonderfully delivered them from the distress wherein they were, without giving them any King but sending them two Brothers, Moses and Aaron; who brought and conducted them into this Country which you possess at this present. And although you participated of these benefits from the hands of God, yet you forgot his religion, and neglected piety. This notwithstanding, at such time as you have been conquered by your enemies, he hath set you free; assisting you, first of all, with the overthrow of the Assyrians and their forces; then giving you victory over the Ammonites, and Moabites; and finally over the Philistines. Now these great exploits were performed by you, not under the conduct of a King, but by the direction of Ephraim and Gideon. What folly therefore hath bewitched you to flee from God, and to seek to live under the subjection of a King? But I have named such an one unto you, Whom God hath chosen to be your Governour. Notwithstanding, to the intent that I may give you a manifest testimony, that God's wrath is provoked against you, because you have desired a King; I will desire of God, that he will make you see in this place, and in the heart of Summer such a storm, that there is not any one of you, that hath ever seen the like. Scarce had he spoken the words, but suddenly there appeared great Lightning, Thunder and Hail, in confirmation of what the Prophet had said: so that amazed and confounded with fear, all of them confessed that he had offended, and desired the Prophet, that with a good and fatherly affection, he would beseech God to appease his wrath towards them; and forgive them this offence which they had committed through ignorance, as he had pardoned their other negligences, whereby they had transgressed his holy Will. All which Samuel promised them to do, and besought God that it would please him to pardon them the error which they had committed in this matter; and to be appeased by his prayers. After this he exhorted them to live uprightly; and to keep in continual remembrance what evils had happened unto them, for that they had forsaken the way of virtue; and what wonders God had done; and what Laws he had given by Moses; all which they ought to meditate on; if they desired to be in safety, and live happily with their King. But if they failed herein; he foretold them, that both themselves and their posterity should be grievously punished. Samuel having prophesied these things to the Hebrews, dismissed them to their own dwellings; after he had confirmed the Kingdom to Saul the second time.

Camp.

BUT when the King had Muster'd his Men, and chosen out 3000 of the best Souldiers, he appointed 3000 of them for the guard of his Person, and with them went and dwelt at Bethel. The rest he gave in charge to his Son Jonathan, and sent them to Gaba, to attend and guard him there; who followed by them valiantly overcame a Garrison of the Philistines near to Gebal. For the Philistines of Gaba having gotten a Victory over them, had taken their Arms from them, and seized and fortified both with Men and Munition the strongest Cities of their Country; prohibiting them to bear Arms, and in general the use of any Iron: by reason of which Inhibition, if their Husbandmen had at any time need of any Iron work, as of Plough-shares, Mattocks, or any such other Instrument fit for manuring or tillage of their Lands, they were inforced to seek it, and get it forged amongst the Philistines.

Now when the Philistines understood that their Garrison was defeated, they were extremely mov'd, and conceiving that the injury and outrage was not to be suffered, they armed themselves against the Jews, and marcht out embattel'd with 300000 Footmen, 30000 Chariots, and 6000 Horse, encamping with their whole Host near the City of Machmas. Which when Saul the King of the Hebrews understood, he march'd toward the City of Gilgal: and as he travell'd thorow the Country, he animated and encourag'd the People to preserve their liberty, proclaiming War against the Philistines; whose Forces he so little feared, that he mock'd thereat, saying, That they deserved not to be feared for their multitudes, nor any danger which might accrue by an Encounter with them.

But when Saul's Souldiers were certified of the true number of their Enemies, they were dismay'd, so that some of them hid themselves in Dens and places under the earth, others fled on the other side of Jordan, into the Country of the Gadites and Reubenites. But Saul sent for the Prophet, to consult with him about the War; who gave him answer, that he should attend in the same place where he was, and prepare Beasts for Sacrifice because that within seven days he would come to him, and sacrifice on the seventh day; which done, he might encounter the Enemy. According to this direction of the Prophet he expected, yet observ'd not intirely all that Samuel had enjoy'd him. For when he perceived that he was somewhat slack in coming, and that his Souldiers left him, he took the Beasts that were prepared for the Sacrifice, and offer'd a Burnt-offering; but afterwards understanding that Samuel was arriv'd, he went out to meet him, and do him honour. Samuel told him that he had done amiss, by reason that neglecting that which was commanded him, he had presum'd before his arrival, to offer the Sacrifices which were to be made to God for the people. Saul excus'd himself, alledging. That he had said during the term of seven days which were appointed him: but that necessity, and the departure of his Souldiers, upon intelligence that the enemies Army had left Machmas, and was coming to Gilgal, had induc'd him to offer Sacrifice. Samuel replied, saying, Thou hadst done more advic'dly, if thou hadst obeyed. and not by thy hastiness condemn'd God, whose Minister and Prophet I am: for by thine obedience thou mightest have gotten an assurance and continuance of thy Kingdom to thy self, and the succession to thy Posterity. This said, being displeased with what had hapned, he returned back to his own house, and Saul with 600 Souldiers (only accompanied with his Son Jonathan) came to the City of Gabeon. The greater part of these Men were disarm'd, by reason that the Country was destitute of Iron, and Workmen expert in forging Armour: for the Philistines permitted them not to have any, as we have declar'd a little before. The Philistines dividing their Army into three Battels, invaded the Country of the Hebrews by many ways, destroying and ravaging all things in the sight of King Saul, and his Son, N who neither could inhibit their incursions, nor by reason of their multitudes, make head against them. Both he therefore and his Son, and Achias the High-Priest, sat down upon a Hillock, and seeing the Country spoiled round about them, they were much dismay'd. But Saul's Son propo'd to his Armour-bearer, to enter secretly into the Enemies Camp, and raise an Up roar and Alarm in the same; who willingly promising and offering him his service to adventure with him in all occasions and places, with the hazard of his life: they both of them descend'd from the Mountain, and march'd directly towards the Enemies Camp, who had pitched their Tents on a high pointed Rock, which extended it self in length with three angles, and was each way begirt with a Bank, as it were a Wall and Fortification against the incursion of their Enemies. For which cause, they kept their watch somewhat too carelessly, because the place was so fortified by Nature, that no man could ascend, or assail them, but with disadvantage. When they

A they got near the Camp, Jonathan encouraged his Companion, to assail the Enemy after this manner. If (saith he) they espy us, and will us to ascend, let us take this Summons of theirs for an assured token that our design shall succeed: but if they hold their peace, and call us not, let us return back again.

As they approach'd the Enemies Host, about break of day, the Philistines said one to another, the Hebrews creep out of their Caves and Dens; then cry'd they out to Jonathan and his Armour-bearer, saying, Come hither, come hither, to us, to receive the punishment Ver. 11, 12. of your audacious enterprise. Jonathan heard these words with joy, as a certain preface that God favour'd his enterprise, and parted with his Armour-bearer from the place where they were first discovered, answering them that he would shortly visit them. So withdrawing himself on the other side of the Rock, which, by reason of the situation thereof, was left unguarded; and overcoming the difficulty of the place with great labour, at last they came where the Enemy was, whom they found asleep, and assailing them, slew twenty of them, and filled the whole Army with terror and amazement; so that casting away their Weapons, they fled with all speed: and some being ignorant which were their Friends or Foes, invaded one another as Enemies. For imagining with themselves, that only two Hebrews durst never enter their Camp, they conceiv'd there was Treachery among themselves, and so fell to slaughter one another: so that some of them were slain, others fell to escape the Sword, and fell headlong down the Rocks. But when the King's Spies told him what confusion and disorder had hapned in the Camp of the Philistines, Saul demanded whether any of his Company were absent: and hearing that his Son and his Armour-bearer were missing, he desired the High-Priest to attire himself with the Ephod, that so he might learn of God what was to happen. He did so, and assur'd him that he should obtain the Victory over his Enemies. Whereupon Saul fall'd out, and assaulted the Philistines, whilst they were thus confus'd and disordered, and fighting one against another. To him there flock'd in great multitudes, such as before were fled into dens, and places under ground, altho as they heard that the Victory inclin'd on Saul's side: so that gathering together to the number of 10000 Hebrews, he pursu'd his scattered Enemies thorow all the Country. But afterwards, a great inconvenience hapned unto Saul, proceeding from the joy he had conceiv'd by this Victory, (for commonly such as are blessed by such good fortune, are not Masters of their own affections and reasons) or rather proceeding from his ignorance. For intending to satiate himself with revenge for all those injuries which he had received from the Philistines, he published an imprecation or Curse against any one whomsoever, that intermitting the pursuit, should take sustenance before night, purposing to continue the same till dark night. The Execration thus published by Saul, it chanced that his Son, who had not heard of it, nor the general allowance of the same by the People, entering into a certain Grove belonging to the Tribe of Ephraim, wherein were many swarms of Bees, by chance light upon a Honey-comb, and pressing the Honey, did eat the same. Afterwards having intelligence that his Father had under a grievous penalty of Execration, forbid den any man to taste any sort of meat before Sun-set, he gave over eating: yet said, that his Father had done amiss in publishing that Prohibition, by reason that if they had received sustenance, they might with greater force and vigour have pursu'd the Enemy that fled, and slain more of them. After the slaughter of many thousands of the Philistines, about evening they began to ransack and spoil, the Camp of the Philistines, and they carried away great spoils, and a number of Cattel, part of which were slain and eaten with the blood, contrary to the Law. Which when the Scribes had signified to the King, how the People had offended against God, by slaughtering the Beasts, and eating the flesh of them, before it was either wash'd or purged from the blood; Saul command'd that a great stone should be roul'd into the midst of the Camp, and that the People should kill the Beasts upon the same; and forbear to eat flesh with the blood, because it was not agreeable unto God. All which was performed as the King had command'd; and Saul erected an Altar in that place, on which he offer'd a Burnt-sacrifice to God. This was the first Altar that he erected. But Saul being desirous incontinently to assail the Enemies Camp, and sack all that were therein before day, whilst his Men of War diligently follow'd him, and shew'd great forwardness in the execution of his command, the King ask'd counsel of the High-Priest Achias, whether God would give him the victory, and permit those that should enter the Enemies Camp, to return from thence Conquerors. The High-Priest told him, that God return'd him no answer: which when he understood, It is not without some great cause, said he, that God is thus silent, who heretofore was wont to give a willing answer unto us, we ought to do, but there must needs be some Ver. 41, 42. hidden sin amongst us, that giving offence to him, causeth him to be silent. But I swear by the same God, that although mine own son Jonathan should have committed that sin, I will, God, to appease God, with no less severity punish them, than any the least stranger that is neither H ged him to the performance of what he had spoken, he presently assembled them in one place, and standing with his Son apart, began by casting lots to find out him that was faultry. When the lot fell upon Jonathan he ask'd him what Crime he had committed.

Jonathan answer'd, I know no other thing, but that yesterday, being in pursuit of the Enemy, and ignorant of thine Edict, I tasted of an Honey-comb; whereupon Saul swore that he would put him to death, rather than violate his Oath, the observation of which he prefer'd before his own blood, and all the sentiments of nature. He nothing astonish'd at his present danger, with a generous and dreadless mind, presented himself with this Reply: O Father, (said he) I intreat no favour at thy hands: for I willingly submit to that death, which may discharge thee of thy vow, the more contentedly, because I have seen so famous a victory: for I shall die contented, to see the influence of the Philistines over-mastered by the power of the Hebrews. This valour and courage of the young man, moved the whole multitude to remembrance and commiseration; so that they all swore that they would not suffer Jonathan, who was the Author of so famous a Victory, to be put to death: so they refused the young man out of the hands of his displeased Father, and pray'd to God to pardon him the fault which he had committed. Saul, after he had slain about 6000 of his Enemies returned with victory to his own house, and Reigned afterwards very happily, and overcame the Ammonites, Philistines, Moabites, Idumeans, Amalekites, and King Zoba. He had three Sons, Jonathan, Ishboba and Melchi, and two K Daughters, Merob and Michol. The General of his Army was Abner the son of his Uncle called Neer; for Neer and Cis Saul's Father, were Brothers, and Sons of Abiel. He was very strong both in Horse and Chariots; and against whatsoever Enemy he marched forth, he always returned with victory: so that he reduced the Affairs of the Hebrews to a happy state, and so much increased their power, that they were feared by all those Nations that neighboured upon them. But the chiefest of the youth, that excelled either in strength or beauty, he chose to be of his Guard.

C H A P. VIII.

Saul's Victory over the Amalekites.

BUT Samuel coming to Saul, told him that he was sent to him by God, to admonish him how he had chosen him above the rest, and preferred him to the Kingdom:
and for that cause that it behoved him to be obedient unto him in all things, because as he Ruled the People, so God Rules both Kings, Kingdoms, and all things. Thus therefore (said he) doth God command thee. Since the Amalekites offer'd many injuries unto the Hebrews in the Desert, whilst in their departure out of Egypt, they travelled into that Region which they now inhabit; justice requireth that they be punish'd for that inhumanity. Wherefore I give thee order to declare War against them, and after thou hast overcome them, to extinguish them utterly, without regard either of sex or years; and this revenge shalt thou execute upon them, in requital of those injuries they in times past offered to our Forefathers. Neither shalt thou spare either Beast or Horse, or Flock, to apply them to thy profit or particular use: but thou shalt offer all to God for a Burnt-offering, and according as Moses commanded, root out the name of the A-malekites from off the earth. All these things did Saul promise to perform, and conceiving that obedience consisted in the speedy execution of that which was enjoined him, he presently assembled all his Forces together, and mustering his Souldiers at Gilgal, he found about 40000, besides the Tribe of Juda, which of it self afforded 30000 Men: with these did Saul enter the Country of the Amalekites, and laid divers Ambushes near a River, not only to molest them with open War, but also surprize them unawares, and kill them amidst the High-ways: he afterwards gave them Battel, and put them to flight, and discomfited their whole Army, pursuing them that fled. Which beginning, having successes answerable to what God had promised him, he marched onwards, and besieged the Cities of the Amalekites, and besieged and took some of them by Engines, others by Mines and Countermine raised on the outside, others by famine, and want of water, and divers other ways. And in those Cities which he overcame, he neither spared Women nor Children, nor supposing their slaughter to be cruel, or inhumane: both for that they were his Enemies, and for that he did nothing but according to God's commandment, towards whom disobedience would be a Crime. He took Agag Prisoner also, who was King of the Amalekites, whose beauty and personage seemed unto him so goodly, that he thought him worthy to be kept alive, and so being led rather by his own inclination, than

A than God's commandment, he us'd such clemency as was not lawful for him at that time:
For God so hated the Amalekites, that he would not have their Infants spared, though they ought in natural compassion to have been more pitied than the rest. But Saul kept alive the King of his Enemies, and the Author of all the Hebrews evils, regarding more his beauty, than God's commandment. This sin of his the People presently imitated:
for they spared Horses, and other kind of Cattel, and made prey of them, withstanding God had charged them to reserve nothing. They carried away with them all their Moveables and Riches, and only consumed those things which were of smallest value, by fire. This victory had Saul over those People that dwell between Pelusium, (a City on the borders of Egypt) and the Red Sea. But he medled not with the Sicekinites, which B inhabit in the Province of Midian, whom, before the Battel, he commanded to retire themselves, lest they should partake the Calamities of the Amalekites: for being they were allied to them by Raguel, Moses' Father in-law, the Hebrews had care of their safety.
Saul having obtained this victory, and rejoicing at his good success, returned home, as full of content, as if he had pretermitted nothing of that which God had commanded him by the Prophet Samuel, before his War with the Amalekites; but had precisely observ'd all that was enjoin'd him. But God was greatly displeased, both that the King of the Amalekites was preserved, and that the People had made prey of their Cattel: for both these actions of theirs were expressly against God's command. For it was not to be tolerated, even by a mortal King, that they should neglect and contemn his Laws and C Decrees, by whose only means they were further'd and favour'd in their victory. For which cause, God told the Prophet Samuel, that he repented that he had made Saul their King, considering that he infring'd his Commandments, and govern'd himself according to his own will. When Samuel heard these words, he was much troubled, and pray'd to God all Night, that he would appease his wrath and displeasure conceived against Saul: but notwithstanding all the importunities and prayers which the Prophet made for him, God would in no sort be reconciled, because he judg'd it not just, that the sins which were committed by Saul, should be remitted by Samuel's intercession. For sin never more augmenteth, than when such as are offended, are too remiss in their punishments: for whilst they would be reputed both for good and merciful, they themselves D become the Authors of sin. When therefore God had denied the Prophet his Request, and it manifestly appear'd that no prayers or supplication could appease him, as soon as it was day, Samuel repair'd to Saul, who at that time remained in Gilgal. As soon as the King saw him, he run unto him, and embraced him, saying, I give God, thanks for thy victory; and all those things which he commanded me, I have performed. But Samuel answer'd, How cometh it then to pass, that I hear this bleating of Sheep, and bellowing of Beasts throughout the Army? Saul replied, That the People had reserved that Cattel for Sacrifice; but all the Nation of the Amalekites was exterminated, as God had commanded, and none remaining but only the King; whom he would cause to be presented before him, to the end they might consu-der what should be done with him. Hereunto the Prophet answer'd, That God took no E pleasure in Sacrifices, but in those men that are good and just, and such (said he) are they, that obey his Will and Commandment; since no action may be reputed good, but in respect of the reference it hath to God's Will: for God refuseth not him that sacrificeth meat, but him that disobeyeth him. For he accepteth not those Sacrifices that are offered to him, by those that submit not themselves unto him, and offer not unto him the true and acceptable offerings: yea, though they present drivers and many great Sacrifices, and bring him jewels of gold, and silver, but he rejecteth such things, and respecteth them not as pledges of piety but effects of hypocrisie: But he taketh pleasure in those only that observe that which he hath commanded, and by which he is offered, although of small and no value, yet are they more acceptable unto him in his F very and obedience, than all those which the richest hand or strongest fortune can afford. Know thou therefore, (said he) thou hast incur'd God's displeasure, in that thou hast contemned and neglected his Commandments: for thou sayst, thou thinkst that he will regard those Sacrifices with agracious eye, which he himself hath adjudg'd to be perdition and ruine: Is it possible for thee to think that there is no difference between, disobeying and sacrificing? Reassured therefore of the loss of thy kingdom and power, which hath in such sort, transported thee; that thou hast contemned God, who bestowed the same upon thee. Saul confessed that he had sinned, and done amiss, in that he had not obeyed the words of the Prophet; yet alleg'd, That he was compelled to do the same, in that he durst not restrain the Souldiers who was set upon the prey: but (said he) be favourable, and merciful unto me, for hereafter
G I will take heed, lest I fall into the like sin; and he entreated him that he would say wish him a little, and offer a Peace-offering in his behalf. But the Prophet knowing that God would be moved by no Sacrifice, would not be persuaded by him.

BUT Saul willing to retain Samuel, took hold of his Garment, and for that the Prophet hastily withdrew himself, he tore away a part thereof: whereupon the Prophet told him, That in like manner his Kingdom should be rent from, and another who was more honest and upright, should take possession thereof: for God is not like men, he is unchangeable in his determinations. Saul answer'd, That he had grievously sinned; but being it was impossible for him to recall that which was past, he desir'd him that at least he would worship God with him in presence of all the People: which Samuel condescended to, and went with him to adore God. After this, Agag the King of the Amalekites was brought before Samuel, who heard him lament, and complain that death was very bitter: to which he answer'd in this manner, As thou hast caused divers Mothers amongst the Hebrews, to weep and lament the loss of their Children; so shall thy death cause thy Mother to weep and lament: which said, he presently commanded that he should be put to death in Gilgal, and returned back again to the City of Ramah. But the King perceiving into how many mischiefes he had fallen by his offences committed against God, departed to his chief City call'd Gaba, (which name signifieth a Hillock) and from that day forwards, he never more saw the Prophet Samuel, who was heartily sorry for his fall: but God commanded him to give over his care, and that taking with him the sacred Oyl, he should repair to the City of Bethlehem, to the house of Jesse the Son of Obed, and there anoint that of his Sons for King, whom he should then see: and when the Prophet said that he was afraid, lest Saul getting notice thereof, should seek to slay him, God commanded him to fear nothing: whereupon being encourag'd in his attempt, he came to the forenamed Town, where he was saluted with great concourse of People, who enquired of him, to what intent he came thither? and he answer'd them that he came to offer Sacrifice to God. Now when the Oblations were performed, he invited Jesse and his Sons to banquet with him: and beholding the eldest of them to be a goodly and well proportioned Man, he conjectured by his stature and comeliness, that it was he that God elected King; but in this matter he mistook the intention of God. For demanding whether he should anoint that young man, whom he thought too worthy of the Kingdom: it was answer'd him, That God judgeth not in such manner as men do. For thou (said he) beholding the beauty of the young man, supposest him worthy of the Kingdom: but I dispose not of a Crown by the beauties of the Body, but by the virtues of the Soul; and him I consider that is perfectly furnished herewith, and hath his mind beautified with piety, justice, obedience and fortitude. Upon these words, Samuel desir'd Jesse to bring all his other Sons into his presence, and he presented to him five others, the eldest, being called Eliab, the second Aminadab, the third Sala, the fourth Nathaneel, the fifth Rael, the sixth Asam. Now when the Prophet beheld these no less beautiful Men than the eldest, he asked of God, which of them he should anoint King? God answer'd him, that he should anoint none of them. Then Samuel enquired of Jesse, whether he had any other Sons besides them? who told him, that he had one called David, who had the care and custody of his Flocks. The Prophet desir'd him to send for him, saying, that it was reasonable he should have a part as well as the rest of a martial aspect. This said, he fare down at the Table, and made the young man sit next him and above Jesse, his Father, and his other Brethren. Afterwards taking the Quet of Oyl in the presence of David, he anointed him, and told him in his ear, That God had chosen him to be King, and exhorted him to study Justice, and to be obedient to that which should be commanded him, forsaking him that by that means, his Kingdom should be of long continuance, his family and stock famous and renowned; and that he should overcome the Philistines, and conquer those Nations against whom he should fight, and obtain glorious Renown in his life-time and leave an immortal Memory behind him. Samuel having made this Exhortation, departed; and the Spirit of God abandoned Saul, and entered into David, so that he became prophetic: whereas on the other side, Saul was tormented with strange passions of the evil spirit, whereby he fell into strange fustocations, so that his Physicians could not find any remedy for him, but gave counsel that search should be made for a Man expert in singing and playing on the Harp, to the end that when the evil spirit should assault and trouble him, he might stand by him, and with voice and instrument sing sacred Hymns before him. And when the King had given command, that such an one should be

A was sought after, one of those that were present told him, that he had seen in Bethlehem a son of Jesse, a young man of excellent feature; and besides his other good qualities, very cunning both in Song, and playing on the Harp: and also dextrous enough, fit to serve in War. He therefore sent messengers to Jesse, to take David from the Fold, and send him to him, because that having heard report of his beauty and valour, he was desirous to see him. This command of his Jesse obey'd, and sent his Son with Presents to Saul the King, who greatly rejoiced upon his arrival, and made him his Pensioner, and favour'd him in all things. For he was delighted by him, and David was his only Physician against the vexation of evil Spirits, when they seized him: for by singing Psalms and to his Harp, he restored the King to his right mind. So the King requested Jesse that he would let him live with him, and attend upon him, because he was so much delighted with his presence; whereunto Jesse condescended.

NOT long after, the Philistines gathered together great companies of Men of War, with which they assailed the Israelites, and encamped between Succoth and Azeca. Saul on the other side led forth his Army against them, and encamping upon a certain Mountain, he constrained the Philistines to dislodge from their first Camp, and intrench themselves upon another Mountain right over against that where he had pitched his Tents. The Camps being thus separated the one from the other, there was a Valley between both the Armies: into this there descended a certain Giant called Goliath, who was of Gath, of huge stature, being four Cubits and a span in height, having his Limbs cover'd with huge and mighty Armour; for his Cuirsars which he bare on his back, weighed five thousand Sicles; his Helmet and Pouldrons were of Brass, made fit to cover his massive Members; the Spear which he bare in his hand, was no light Lance, but he bare it on his shoulder, and the head thereof, weighed six hundred Sicles. This Giant follow'd by a great Troop, presented himself in this Equipage in the Valley that separated the two Armies, and cryed with a loud voice, addressing his Speech to Saul and the Hebrews in these terms, Hebrews, what need you hazard the doubtful fortune of a Battel? Single me out an Adversary, and let us determine by our two fates, on whose side the victory and conquest shall fall; whichsoever of us shall be overcome, let his Party be obliged to receive Law from that of the Victor. For it is better that a single person, than the whole Army be expos'd to danger. When he had spoken thus, he returned back to his own Camp. The next day he came forth again, and used the same words; and thus for forty days he ceased not to defie the Hebrews in such words: so that both Saul and all his Army were displeased, and kept themselves always ready and ranged in Battel, yet came not to blows. David was not then in the Camp, because Saul had sent him back again to Jesse his Father, (contenting himself with his other three Brothers, who at that time served under his Royal Standard) where he resumed his intermitted care of keeping his Flocks. But whilst the War was rather protracted than prosecuted, his Father sent him to carry Provisions to his Brothers, and to know how their affairs went in the Army: and whilst David discours'd with his Brothers touching those things which his Father had committed to his charge, Goliath came after his usual manner, but more insolent than ever, and reproach'd the Israelites, that none amongst them had the courage to fight with him. David was herewith so greatly moved, that turning himself to his Brothers, he told them, that he was ready to fight hand to hand against that Enemy. But Eliab the elder Brother reproved him for speaking, telling him that he was more hardy than became his Age, and that he knew not what concerned those matters, willing him to return to his Father, and mind his Flocks. David out of respect to his Brother, departed from thence, and meeting with certain Soldiers, said unto them, That he fear'd not to encounter that proud Challengenger: which they presently signified unto Saul, who incontinently sent to seek him out. When he came into his presence, Saul asked him, Whether he had spoken after that manner? David answer'd, That he had, and that he fear'd not that Philistine, though he appear'd so terrible; and that if the King would permit him, he would abate the Pride of this Giant: and how terrible and fierce soever he appear'd, he would subdue him, and turn his error to contempt; and so much the more should the glory of his Army be enhanced, that so great and expert a man at Arms, should be subdued by a young inexperienced Soldier. Saul admir'd his hardiness, and great courage; yet by reason of his years, told him, That he was too feeble to encounter a man so expert in feats of Arms. David answer'd, That which I promise you (my Sovereign) is upon the assurance that I have in God, which heretofore I have proved, wee, by the success which I have received at his hands. For whilst I fed my Fathers Flocks, I have rescued a Lamb that was ravished out of my Fold, out of a Lyons jaws; and catching the wild Beast by the tail, that with open mouth assailed and sought to devour me, I beat him to the ground, and slew him. With no less success I slew a Bear that set upon my Flock; and I do not believe that this Philistine is more terrible than Lyons or Bears. But that which gives me most assurance, is, that I cannot but think that his slanderous railings both against God, and Men, cannot longer escape the Divine arm of Justice which he so wickedly provoketh. And for these reasons, I dare assure my self that he will assist me to tame his Pride, and to overcome him.

So much prevailed this extraordinary hardiness of the young man, that the King imploring God's assistance to second his courage, furnish'd him with his own Armour, a Sword, and a Helmet, and sent him forth to the Combat. But David feeling the weight of his Armour, and finding himself rather loaden, than advantag'd by it, said to the King, These Arms, Sir, are proper for your Majesty, who are able to make so good use of them, but not for me; wherefore I beseech you to leave me at liberty, to fight as I please. Saul granted his desire; and he putting off his Armour, took a staff in his hand, and five stones, which he gather'd on the bank of the Torrent, and put into his Scrip, his sling he bore in his right hand; and being thus armed, he march'd forward to encounter his Enemy. When the Barbarian saw him thus furnished, he so much contemned him, that in way of scorn, he ask'd him, Whether he thought him a Dog, that he was thus come forth to fight with him only with stones? Nay (said David) I esteem thee worse than a Dog. These words so incensed the King, that he swore by his God, That he would tear his Carcass in a thousand pieces, and give them to the Beasts of the Field, and the Birds of the Air. But David answer'd, Thou comest against me with thy Sword, thy Javelin, and Cuirs; but I march out against thee, trusting in the power of God, who will destroy thee by my hand, and with thee thy whole Army; for this day will I take thy head from thy shoulders, and cast the rest of thy Body to the Dogs, whom by thy rage, thou respectest; and all Men shall know that God protects the Hebrews, that his Providence conducts them, that his help renders them invincible, and that no strength nor arms can keep them from perishing, whom he abandons. The weight of the Philistines arms hinder'd him from marching readily: so that he walk'd step by step towards David, contemning him, and trusting to kill him easily, both for that he was disarm'd; and because he was young, and of small stature.

CHAP. XI.

The single Combat betwixt David and Goliath, and the slaughter of the Philistines that follow'd it.

David advanced boldly against Goliath, being assisted in an invisible manner by God; and drawing one of the stones out of his Scrip, and fitting it to his Sling, he threw it against Goliath, which gave him such a stroke on the Fore-head, that it pierc'd him to the very Brain, so that he fell down suddenly dead; and David running upon him, as he lay sprawling on the earth, cut off his head with his own Sword: for he himself had none. As soon as he was stricken down, terror and confusion fell upon all the Army of the Philistines: for seeing the most esteemed Warrior amongst them overthrown and slain, they began to fear the issue of their Battel, and resolv'd to flee; which they did in great disorder and confusion, hoping by that means to deliver themselves out of danger. But Saul, and the whole Army of the Hebrews pursu'd them, with great shouts and cries; and in the pursuit made a great slaughter of them, and drov'e them to the borders of Gath, and even to the gates of Ascalon. In this Battel, there dyed on the Philistines side, above Thirty thousand, and the hurt and wounded were twice as many. Saul returning back to the Camp, pillaged and burnt their Tents; but David bore Goliath's head to his Pavilion, and hung his Sword in the Tabernacle, and consecrated the same to God. But Saul afterward conceived a secret hatred against David, upon this occasion: As he returned triumphant like a Conqueror with his Army, the Women and Maidens singing and dancing to their Cimbals and Timbrels, in way of honour, came out to meet him: the Women sung, that Saul had slain thousands of the Philistines; and the Virgins answer'd, that David had slain Ten thousands: which when Saul understood, and saw that barely thousands were ascrib'd to him, and Ten thousands to David, he thought that after so glorious Acclamations, there wanted nothing to David, but the name of King. For which cause he began to fear and suspect him: and by reason of this fear, he thought he was too near his own person, and therefore from being one of the chiefest in authority about him, which was to be one of his chief Commanders

A manders and guard, he made him Captain over a 1000, rather respecting his own security than David's honour; to the intent that being often engag'd in encounters with the Enemy he might perish by some disaster or other. But David, having in all places the assistance of Almighty God, returned always with good success: so that his extraordinary Valour acquir'd him an universal esteem, and Michol, Saul's Daughter, that was about that time marriageable, began to be enamour'd with him, that she could not hide her passion even from the King her Father. Saul, instead of being displeas'd, rejoic'd at it, hoping by that means the sooner to entrap David. He gave ear thereto with some shew of allowance, and told them who spoke of it to him, that he would willingly give him his Daughter to Wife; for he reason'd thus with himself; I will propose that I will give him my Daughter in marriage, on condition that he bring me six hundred Philistines heads; and I am certain that being valiant and generous as he is, he will with joy accept this condition, because the more dangerous it is, the more glory it will acquire to him; and by exposing himself to all manner of dangers, he will be slain by the hands of the Philistines; and that intention which I have conceived against him, shall succeed according to mine own hearts desire: for I shall be delivered of him, in sending him out of the world, not by my means, but by other mens hands. Having taken this resolution, he charged his Courtiers to found David's sentiments, and how he stood affected to the marriage: and they told him, That the King bore him great kindness, and so joye'd that the People admir'd him, that he would give him in marriage the Prince's his Daughter. David answer'd, Think you it a small matter to be Son-in-law to the King? for my self, I esteem otherwise, considering mine own base condition, who have neither reputation, nor any honourable quality. When Saul's servants had reported to him what answer David made them, Tell him (said he) that I value not Goods or Presents, (for that were to expose my Daughter to fail, and not to match her with an Husband.) I seek a Son-in-law that hath Valour, and that is adorned with all Vertue, such as is manifest and apparent in thee: and my desire is, that for the dowry of my Daughter, thou give me neither gold nor silver, nor any other wealth out of thy Father's house; but that thou make War upon the Philistines, and six hundred of their heads, shall be the most acceptable dowry thou canst present me with. My Daughter also desires, above all the dowry, to be married to a Man that is so embolden and famous for the overthrow of the Enemies of her Father and her Country.

When these words were reported to David, he was very joyful, thinking that Saul acted sincerely concerning his alliance: and without delay, or taking counsel or deliberation, whether the thing were easie or impossible for him to execute, he incontinently departed with his company to find out the Enemy, and execute the condition upon which the marriage was promis'd him; God assisted David in this occasion, as in all others. And after he had slain a great number of them, and cut off six hundred of their Heads, he returned, and presented them to the King; and in consideration thereof, desired the performance of his promise.

BUT Saul, that could not flie from his promise, (because it would be a great dishonour to him to fail of his word, and to have promised his Daughter under colour, either to murder him, or to put him upon the execution of things that were impossible) deliver'd his Daughter Michol unto him. Nevertheless he chang'd not his purpose. For perceiving that David was gracious in God's sight, and in good reputation among the People, he was afraid of him: and being unable to conceal his fear of being deprived of two things of such consequence, as his Kingdom and Life, he resolv'd to kill David; giving Commission to his Son Jonathan, and divers others of his Servants, to execute the same. But Jonathan amaz'd to see this change in his Father, who, instead of the good liking he had of David in times past, fought to injure him, not in any slight sort, but by taking away his life: and on the other side, being singularly affected towards him, and respecting his virtue, he communicated the secret intention of his Father to him, counselling him to have a care of himself, and to fly the next morning: in the mean while he would go and salute his Father, and as soon as occasion presented it self, he would confer with him, to know the cause of his displeasure against him, to the intent he might pacifie the same; conceiving it a matter unreasonable, that he should be deprived of life, who had so well deserv'd of all the people, and who, in particular, was his intimate Friend; and in respect in his former merits, if guilty of some offence, deserved pardon. I will tell thee afterwards (said he) what my Father's resolution is. David gave credit to his wholesome counsel, and retired from the presence of the King.

TH E next morning Jonathan came to Saul, and finding him well disposed, began to speak to him to this effect, concerning David: Of what fault, (O Father) either great or small, have you found David guilty that you have commanded him to be put to death? A Man that hath done you such signal service; that hath reveng'd you upon the Philistines, abated their Pride, and advanc'd the Honour of the People of the Hebrews, and hath deliver'd them from that disgrace and contempt under which they have lain for the space of Forty years, being the only person that dared to oppose himself against the proud defiance of that Giant, whom he so gloriously overcame; and who since that time hath brought as many of the Philistines heads as were demanded of him, in recompence whereof he hath taken my sister to Wife. Be pleas'd to consider that his death would be a great grief to us, not only upon account of his vertue, but also of his alliance with us; and that by his death, your daughter will have the affliction to see her self a Widow, as soon as she is a Wife. Weigh these things, and pacifie your displeasure, and do no wrong to such a Man, who hath been the Author of so good and great service, as is the conservation of your person at such time as you were possessed and tormented with evil spirits, and the revenging of your own Enemies. For it is a thing unworthy either your Majesty, or the name of a Man, to forget good deserts. With these words was Saul pacified, so that he swore to his Son he would do no hurt to David: for his just persuasions and arguments were stronger, than the choler and fear of the King. Jonathan sent to seek out David, and told him these good tydings from his Father, and brought him to him; and David continu'd to serve him as formerly.

ABOUT the same time, the Philistines again led forth their Army against the Hebrews, and Saul sent David against them accompanied with his forces; who encountering them, slew a great number of them, and returned to the King with a great Victory. But Saul entertained him not as he hoped, and as the happy exploit achiev'd by him merited; but he envied his good actions and honourable deserts, as if David's happy success had been Saul's disadvantage and prejudice. But when the evil spirit returned to vex him, he lodged him in his own chamber, and having at that time a javelin in his hand, he commanded him to play on his Harp, and to Sing Hymns. Now whilest David obeyed his command, Saul stretching out his Arm, threw his Dart at him: but David foreseeing it avoided the stroke, and fled to his own house, where he stayed all the rest of the day. When night was come, the King sent certain of his Servants to watch his house lest he should escape, to the end that the next day, being brought forth to judgment, he might be condemned and put to death. But Michol, David's Wife, and Saul's Daughter, having intelligence of her Father's intention, went to her Husband, told him in how great peril he was, being desirous to save his life, with the hazard of her own. Beware (said she) lest the Sun at his rising find thee in this place; for if it do, I shall never more see thee. Fly therefore whilest night offereth thee opportunity, which I pray to God to lengthen for thy sake; for be assured, that if thou be surpris'd in this place, my Father will make thee die a miserable death. This said, she let him down by a window and so saved him; and soon after the prepared his bed as if he lay sick therein, and under the covering the laid the Liver of a new slaughter'd Kid; and when her Father sent the next morning to apprehend David, the answered that he had been sick all the night long; and opening the Curtains, she gave them to understand that David was laid therein, the Coverlet being moved by the Liver which was hot and yet stirred, made them believe that the Liver that lay there was David, who panted and breathed very hardly. Which being signified unto Saul, he commanded that he should be brought to him in that estate wherein he was, because he resolv'd to put him to death. But when Saul's messengers returned thither, and opened the bed, they perceived Michol's subtilty, and went and certified the King thereof: who reproved her very sharply, for that she had saved his Enemy, and deceived her Father. But she excus'd her self with words full of good appearance, saying that David had threatned to kill her; and through fear of death, she was induced to save him. For which cause she ought to be pardon'd, since by constraint; and not of set purpose, she had furthered his escape. For (said she) I think that you seek not so greedily after the death of your Enemy, as to preferre the same before the safety and security of your Daughter. Upon these reasons, Saul pardon'd his Daughter.

E David deliver'd from this peril, went to the Prophet Samuel at Ramath, and told him what ambushes the King had laid for him, and how hardly he had escap'd death by the stroke of his javelin; whereas in all things that concern'd Saul, he had always shew'd himself obedient: having served him advantageously in war upon his Enemies, and by God's assistance been fortunate in all things; which was the cause that Saul was so displeas'd with him. The Prophet inform'd of Saul's injustice, departed from Ramath, and led David to a certain place called Galbaath, where he remained with him. But as soon as Saul was inform'd that David was retired, and accompanied with the Prophet, he sent out certain Soldiers to lay hands on him, and bring him to him. They repairing to Samuel, and finding the congregation of the Prophets were seized with the Spirit of God, and began to prophesie. Which when Saul understood, sent out others with the like order, and they had the like extasy. For which cause he sent out others, and seeing the third company prophesie likewise, he was in the end so enraged, that he went thither in his own person. And when he drew near the place, Samuel before he saw him made him prophesie also, so that he was transported out of himself, and having despoil'd himself of his rayment, he remained naked all day and night in the presence of Samuel and David. David departed from thence, and went to Jonathan, to whom he complain'd of those ambushes which his Father had laid to intrap him, telling him, that notwithstanding he had never committed any fault against his Father, he earnestly purpos'd him to put him to death. Jonathan perswaded him not to suspect these things rashly, nor to be overcredulous to those reports which perhaps might be brought to him, but trust him only who was assur'd that his Father intended no evil against him: For if he had, he would have told him, being never wont to act any thing without his counsel. But David swore unto him that it was so, and conjured him not to doubt of it, but rather to consider how he to procure his security, than by contemning his words, expect till his death ascertained him of the truth thereof. He added that his Father did not communicate his counsels with him because he was assured of the love and friendship that was between them.

Jonathan, persuaded by David's reasons, asked him what he desired at his hands, or wherein he might shew him friendship: David said unto him, I know that thou wilt further me, in what thou mayst, and refuse me in nothing. Now to-morrow is the first day of the month, in which I was accustomed to dine at the King's Table; if thou thinkest good I will depart out of the City into the field where I will lie hid. And if he ask for me, thou shalt say, I am gone into the Country of Bethlechem, where my Tribe solemnizeth a feast; and thou shalt certify him also that thou hast given me leave. And if he say God speed him, which is an ordinary wish that friends use to such as go a journey, know that he hath no hidden rancour, nor secret malice conceived against me; But if he answer otherwise, it shall be an assured testimony that he plotteth some mischief against me; and this shall thou ascertain me of, as both becometh my present calamity, and our mutual friendship, which by vowed oath, thou being my Lord, hast plighted to me, who am thy Servant: And if thou think me unworthy of this favour, and injurious towards thy Father, without expecting the sentence of his justice, kill me now at this present with thine own Sword. These last words so pierced Jonathan's heart, that he promised him to accomplish his request and certify him if he any ways could perceive that his Father was ill affected towards him; and to the intent he might the better be believed, he caused him to walk forth with him into the open air, and there swore to him that he would not omit any thing that might tend to his preservation. For (said he) that God that seeth and governeth all things in this universe, and who, before I speak knoweth my mind; he, I say, shall bear witness of that accord which shall be between thee and me; that I will not cease to found my Father, till I know his intention concerning thee;
and as soon as I understand the same, I will not conceal it from thee, but give thee notice thereof, be it good or evil. The same God knoweth how incessantly I besech him to be assistant to thee; as also he is at this present: and that he never abandon thee, but make thee Lord over thine Enemies; yea, though it were my Father, or my self.
Only remember me in this point, that after my death (if I chance to die before thee), thou take care of my children, and be as favourable towards them, as I am affectionate to thee at this present. After he had sworn this oath, he dismissed David: willing him to conceal himself in a certain place of the Plain, where people ordinarily exercised themselves: For that as soon as he understood his Father's mind, he would return thither with his Page; and if (saith he) having shot three shafts at the mark, I command my Page to fetch them back again to me, know that thou art to expect no evil from my Father: but if I do not, think thou that my Father is incensed and ill affected towards thee; yet howsoever it be, I will do my best, that nothing shall befall thee otherwise than we expect and wish. Be thou therefore mindful of these things when thou shalt obtain thy happy days; and be favourable to my children. David being confirmed by Jonathan's promises, retired to the appointed place. The next day after, which was the solemnity of the new-Moon after the King had purified himself according to the custom, he sat down to take his repast: and as his Son Jonathan was set on his right side, and Abner the General of his Army, on the left, Saul perceived David's place void, and spoke not a word, supposing that he was absent from that company, by reason he was not purified since he had the company of his Wife: but seeing that on the second day of the new-Moon he was absent likewise, he asked his Son Jonathan, why David was not present at the feast those two days? he answered him, that he was gone into his country, (according as it had been concluded between them) where his own Tribe celebrated a feast, and that he had given him leave to assist at the same. Further (said he) he invited me to the feast, and if it stand with your pleasure, I will go thither, for you know how cherily I love the man. At this time Jonathan knew the displeasure his Father had conceived against David, and perceived most apparently how heinously he was affected: for Saul could not conceal his choler, but began to rail upon his Son, calling him Rebel and Enemy, and companion and confederate with David; and telling him that he shewed reverence neither to him, nor to his Mother, since he was so minded:
and that he could not believe, that as long as David lived, their Royal estate could be safe:
he commanded him therefore to bring him before him, to the end that he might do justice upon him: Jonathan replied, What evil hath David committed, for which he should be punished? Hereupon Saul not only expressed his choler in words, and re-proaches, but took a javelin, to kill his Son, and had certainly slain him, had he not been restrained by his friends. Thus Jonathan clearly discovered the hatred of Saul

A to David, and how ardently he sought his ruine, since his Friendship to him had like to have cost him his own life. Then did Jonathan withdraw himself from the Banquet without eating, seeing with how little profit he had pleaded: and seeing, that David was adjudged to die, he passed all the night without sleep; and about day break he departed out of the City, to the appointed field, making shew that he walked out to take his exercise; but indeed it was to discover to his friend the intent which his Father had, according as it was covenanted between them. After Jonathan had done that which he promised, and sent back his Page into the City, he came to David, both to see and speak with him in private. David, as soon as he saw him, cast himself at his feet, calling him the preserver of his life. But Jonathan lifted him up from the earth, and both of them embracing one another, and intermixing their mutual Kisses for a long time, lamenting their misfortune with tears, and this their separation, which was no less grievous unto them, than death itself. Finally, since there was no Remedy, exhorting one another to have in perpetual remembrance their Faith and Friendship, they departed the one from the other.

David flying from the Persecution of Saul, retired to the City of Nob to Abimelech High Priest the Priest: who wondered to see him come alone to him, without either Friend or Servant, and desired to know the cause why he thus wandered without any attendance. David told him, that the King had sent him about some secret order, which might not be communicated to him, although he were desirous to know it: and as touching my Servants, (said he) I have commanded them to attend me at a place appointed. He further desired him, that he would give him such things as were necessary for his Journey: and some Arms, either Sword or Javelin. Now in this place was present one of Saul's Servants, called Doeg, a Syrian by Nation, and the Master of the Kings Mules. The Priest answered him that he had no Arms by him, except Goliath's Sword which he himself had hanged in the Tabernacle, and dedicated to God at such time as he slew the Philistine. David having gotten it, fled out of the Country of the Hebrews, and went to Gath, a Country of the Philistines, where Achish was King. There being known by the Kings Servants, he was discovered to be that David, that had slain so many thoyland Philistines. David fearing to be put to death by him, and to fall into the same danger which he had escaped by flying from Saul, counterfeited himself mad, so that he let the little issue out of his mouth; and he counterfeited in all things so cunningly, that he made the King of Gath believe that he was frantick. Whereupon the King was Angry with his Servants, that they had brought him a mad-man, and commanded them forthwith to drive him out his Country. Having in this sort escaped out of the Country of Gath, he went to the Tribe of Judah, were hiding himself in the Cave of Adullam, he sent to his Brothers to let them understand that he was there. They came to him with all their Relations, and divers others, that either were in need, or stood in fear of Saul resorted unto him, offering to perform whatsoever he should command them; and they amounted in all to the number of four hundred. David therefore being thus assured, by the succours and forces that came to him, dislodged from thence, and went to the King of the Moabites, beseeching him, that he, and those that accompanied him, might remain in that Country, till such time as he understood what would be the issue of his affairs. The King vouchsafed him this favour, and treated them very well all the time they were in his Country. David went not out of it till he received Instructions from the Prophet Samuel to abandon the Desert, and return to the Tribe of Judah; which he obeyed, and coming to the City of Saron, made his abode there. But when Saul understood that David had been seen with a number of men, he fell into an extraordinary fear and trouble of mind; for knowing both the conduct and courage of the man, he thought that he would attempt no Action that was not great, and such as might endanger his Kingdom: For which cause, assembling his Friends and Captains, and those of his own Tribe in Gaba (where he kept his Royal Court, and which stands upon a little Hill called Arago) and accompanied with his Guards, and the Officers of his house, he spake to them from his throne, after this manner: I cannot believe that you have forgotten the benefits wherewith I have enriched you, and the honours to which I have advanced you: But I would know of you whether you hope or expect greater from the Son of Jesse? For I am not ignorant of the Affection which you bear him; and that my own Son hath inspired the same into you. I know that Jonathan and he are united without my consent in a very strict alliance; that they have confirmed the same by oath; and that Jonathan assists David against me with all his power. I see are none of you concerned at these things; but in great quiet you expect what will be the event of them.

When the King had spoken thus, and none of the Assistants answered a word, Doeg the Syrian, Master of the King's Mules, rose up and said, That he had seen David in the City of Nob, whither he went to the High Priest Abimelech, to ask counsel of him touching his affairs; and that he had received from him such things as were needful to his journey, H and Goliath's Sword; and how he was safely conducted towards the place whither he pretended to go. Hereupon Saul sent for the High-Priest and all his Kindred, and spake thus unto them, What wrong or displeasure have I done thee, that thou hast entertained the Son of Jesse, and given him Vittuals and Arms; to him, I say, that seeketh but the means to possess himself of my Kingdom? what answer hast thou made him touching those demands he propounded to thee, concerning his future fortunes? canst thou be ignorant that he fled from me, and what hatred he bears against both me and my family? The High Priest denied none of these things, but freely confessed that he had delivered him such things as were reported, but not with an intent to gratifie David, but the King: for I entertained him (said he) not as your Enemy, but as your faithful Servant, and one of the principal Officers of your Army; and which is more, as your Son-in-law. For who would have thought, that one dignified with so much honour by you, should be your Enemy? nay rather, who would not esteeme him for your favourite and nearest friend? And whereas he asked counsel of me touching God's will, this is not the first time I have answered him, but I have formerly done it often. And when he said he was sent by you about some speedy and secret business, if I should have refused him those supplies which he required at my hands, I might have been judged to have done an injury to your Majesty. Wherefore you ought not to think evil of me; or that if David at this time hath some ill design against you, that by reason of the courtesy I have shewed him, I either favour him or maintain him to your prejudice. Notwithstanding all these just allegations, Saul could not be induced to believe him: but imagined that it was fear that made Abimelech speak in this manner, so that he commanded certain armed men that were about him, to put both him and all his family to the sword. But when they executed themselves because it was no less than Sacrilege to violate, by violent death, such persons as were consecrated unto God: Saul commanded Doeg the Syrian to commit the slaughter, who accordingly, with certain other sacrilegious and impious men, murdered Abimelech and all his Race, who were in number three hundred thirty men, and five. He further sent to Nob the City of the Priests, and put all of them to the sword, sparing neither woman nor child, and consumed the whole City with fire; only one Son of Abimelech escaped, who was called Abiathar. All which came to pass, according as God had foretold to the High-Priest Eli, that, by reason of the Transgression of his two Sons, his posterity should be extinguished.

This cruel and detestable act perpetrated by King Saul (in shedding the blood of all the sacred Race, without either compassion of Infants, or reverence of old age, and his destroying of that City, which God had chosen to be the residence of the Priests and Prophets) manifestly shews how far the perversity of the mind of man may proceed. For so long as men are low, and limited by a private estate, because they neither dare nor can give scope to their wicked inclinations, they seem good and just, and make shew of great love of justice, and of a sense of pity, and are persuaded that God is present in all our Actions, and discerneth all our cogitations. But no sooner do they attain to Power and Empire, but they lay aside their former fair semblances, they take upon them as it were a new part, and another personage, becoming audacious and insolent, and contemners both of Divine and Humane Laws. And though the height of their station exposing even their least actions to the view of all the World, ought to make them comport themselves irreprehensibly; yet as if they thought that God shut his eyes, or feared them, they will needs have him approve, and men account just all that their Fear, Hatred or Imprudence suggests to them, without troubling themselves what will be the issue. So that after having rewarded great Services with great honours, they are not contented to deprive those that had so justly merited them, upon false reports and calumnies, but they also take away their lives not considering how deservedly they oppress, but only giving credit without proof to rash and scandalous detractions, executing and satiating their rage, not on those they ought to punish, but on those that may most easily be destroyed. A manifest example whereof appears in Saul the Son of Chisai, who after the Government of the Nobility and that of the Judges, having been established the first King of the Hebrews, slew three hundred Priests and Prophets, only for that he suspected Abimelech; and after he had slain them, destroyed their City with fire; and as much as in him lay, deprived the High Temple of God, of Priests, sacred Ministers; and after a hideous slaughter, neither spared their Country nor any of their off-spring. But Abiathar, Abimelech's Son, who only escaped of all his family, flying to David, he declared to him both the overthrow of his family, and the death of his Father. David answered him, That he expected no less than that which happened at Jachin time as he espied Doeg there, who, as his mind gave him, would not fail to calumniate Abimelech to Saul: yet he was extremely sorrowful for the misfortune that hapned to his friend by his means, and therefore prayed him to remain with him, because he could not be concealed or secured in any place better than with himself.

About

The year of the World, 3893.
before Christ's
Nativity, 1081.

A. About the same time, David understanding that the Philistines made an inroad into the Country of Ceila, and waited the same, he determined to assault them, if after the Prophet had asked counsel of God, he should be by the Oracle animated to it: which accordingly falling out, he sallied out, accompanied by his friends, and set upon the Philistines, and made a great slaughter of them, and recovered a very rich prey, and gave safeguard to the Ceilans, till they had fairly gathered in and housed all the Corn and Fruit. The rumour of this his exploit was presently brought to Saul: for this great action was not shut up within the limits of the place where it was performed, but the renown thereof was dispersed every where, and both the Action and the Author thereof were highly commended. Saul was very joyful to hear that David was in Ceila, imagining that God had delivered him into his hands, by leading him to shut up himself in a City inclosed with Walls, Gates, and Barrs; whereupon he suddenly gave commandment to his Soldiers to march against Ceila, and besiege the same, and not to raise the Siege till David were either taken or slain.

But David having intelligence hereof, and advertised by God, that if he stayed among the Ceilans, they would deliver him into the hands of Saul, took with him his four hundred men, and withdrew himself from the City into the Desert, and encamped on a hill called Engaddi. Whereof the King being advertised, forbore to send out an Army against him. From thence David departed into the Territories of Ziph, where Jonathan, Saul's Son, met him, and after embraces, exhorted him to be of good courage, and to conceive assured hope of future good fortune, and not to give place to his present miseries, because he should one day obtain the Kingdom, and have the whole State of the Hebrews subject to him; but that such things were not wont to happen, till after suffering great Travels: and after they had once more renewed the oath of mutual Amity and Faith between them, for all the time of their lives, calling God to witness with imprecations against him, that should fail therein; Jonathan left David somewhat eased in heart, and disburthened of his fears: and returned to his own home. But the Ziphians to gratifie Saul told him, that David was amongst them, and promised to deliver him prisoner into his hands, if so be he would come out against him: for if he would seize all the straits of the Country, it should be impossible for him to rise into any other place. The King praised their fidelity, and promised them to requite it, and to remunerate them shortly for this their good affection; and withal sent out certain men to seek out David, and to break over the Forest, promising them that shortly he would follow after them. Thus did the Governours and Princes of the Ziphians offer themselves to the King to search out and apprehend him, expressing their affection therein not only in outward shew, but also with their whole power, labouring what they might, that surprising him, they might deliver him into the King's hands. But their unjust desire had an unfortunate success; (wicked people as they were) who being to incur no peril by concealing him from pursuit, promised to betray him into the King's hands, through adulation and avarice, a man that was both virtuous, and wrongfully persecuted to death by his Enemies. For David being informed of their malice, and of the King's approach, quitted those narrow straits wherein he then encamped and escaped to a certain Rock situate in the Desert of Simon. Saul continued to pursue him; and knowing by the way that he had overcome the straits, he came to the other side of the Rock, where David had surely been taken, had not the King been revolted by tydings, which assured him that the Philistines had forcibly entered and spoiled his Kingdom.

For he thought it more convenient to revenge himself on those his publick and open Enemies, and to give succour to his Country and People, being ready to be spoiled and wasted; than out of desire to lay hands on a private Enemy, to betray both his Country and Subjects to their Swords: and thus was David saved beyond all expectation; and he retained himself to the straits of Engaddi. But after Saul had repelled the Philistines, certain news was brought him that David was in the straits of Engaddi: whereupon, presently taking with him three thousand of the choicest men in all his Army, he led them speedily to the forenamed place, and being not far from thence, he perceived near the high way a deep and large Cave, where David with his four hundred men were hid, and he descended alone into the Cave to disburthen the necessities of nature. This was presently discovered by one of David's followers, who told him, that God had presented him a fit opportunity to revenge him on his Enemy, and counselled him to cut off Saul's head, and to discharge himself thereby of further trouble. But David smiling and finding him out, only cut off the lap of the vesture wherewith Saul was attired, and presently thereupon repented himself, saying, that it were a wicked death in him to kill his Lord, whom God by Election had raised to the estate of Majesty and Empire. For (said he) although he be unjust toward me, yet ought I not to be injurious towards him who is my Lord.

his life; he bare away with him his Javelin, and the Pitcher of water that stood by H Saul whilst he slept, without the knowledge of any of the Camp: so much were they devoured and overwhelmed with sleep. He therefore departed thence in all assurance, having executed all that which either the time or his courage would permit him to do. But after he had passed the River, and had attained the top of a Mountain, from whence he might be easily heard, he cried out to Saul's Soldiers, and their General Abner, so loud, that he awaked them from their sleep; and calling unto Abner, as well as the common sort of Soldiers, the General asked, Who it was that called him? to whom David answered, It is I, the Son of Jesse, your Fugitive: but, said he, How comest it to pass, that thou who art so great, and in chiefest authority about the King, hast so small respect and guard of his person? Thy sleep is more pleasant unto thee, than to watch for his conservation. Assuredly this all of thine deserbeth a capital punishment, because thou neither hast discovered me, nor any others before we entered the Camp, or approached the King. Behold here the King's Javelin, and his Pitcher of water, by which you may perceive in what great danger he hath been, even in the midst of you, without any notice or discovery of yours.

Saul perceiving that it was David's voice, and seeing that through the negligence of his Guards, it had been easy for him to have slain him, which (after so many provocations) would not have seem'd strange to any man, he acknowledgeth himself indebted to him for his life, exhorting him to be assured, and without suspecting any evil to return home unto his house, because he was persuaded, that he loved not himself so much, as he was beloved by David: notwithstanding that he had pursued him, and for a long time he had chased him like a Fugitive, confining him by divers persecutions, to forsake his dearest Friends: and instead of rewarding his services, had reduc'd him to the utmost extremities. Hereupon David willed him to send some one of his Servants to bring back his Javelin and Pitcher of Water: protesting that God should be Judge of both their natures, manners, and actions, who knew that that day also he had spared his Enemy, whom, if he had thought good, he might have destroyed.

David having thus the second time spared Saul's life, and not willing to continue any longer in a Country, where he might be in danger of falling at length into the hands of his Enemies, he thought good to retire into the Country of the Philistines, and sojourn there. So that accompanied with 600 Men which he had with him, he went to Achish King of Gath one of their five Cities; who received him kindly, and gave him a place to dwell in: so that he abode in Gath, having with him his two Wives, Abigail and Abigail. Which when Saul understood, he troubled him no more, because he had twice been in danger of his life, whilst he pursued him. David held it not convenient to remain in the City of Gath, and therefore requested the King of the Philistines, that he would assign him some part of his Country, where he might make his habitation, because he feared to be chargeable to him, if he remained in the City. Achish assigned to him a Village called Siceleg, which David, after he obtained the Kingdom, loved so well that he purchased the perpetual inheritance of it, after he came to the Crown. But hereof will we speak in another place. The time that David lived among the Philistines, and in the Town of Siceleg, were four months and twenty days; during which time, by several excursions against the bordering Sarrites and Amalekites, he spoiled their Country, and returned back again with a great booty of Oxen and Camels: yet brought he thence no Bondmen, left Achish by their means should thereby have intelligence into what Country he had made his inroad. He sent likewise a part of the prey unto the King, and when he demanded from whom he had taken it: he answered, That he had taken it from the Jews that dwelt Southward and in the Plain: so that Achish conceived an opinion, that since David warred against his own Nation all the time of his abode with him, he would be a faithful Servant to him. About the same time, the Philistines having determined to lead forth their Army against the Israelites, sent to their Allies requesting to assist them in that War, and to make their Rendezvous at Renga, to the intent that being there assembled, they might dislodge and assail the Israelites. Amongst the other their Auxiliary Companies, Achish had requested David to assist him with his 600 Soldiers: which he promised readily, telling him that the time was now come wherein he might requite his kindness, and the hospitality he had shewen him. Achish promised him, that after the Victory, when all things should have succeeded according as he desired, he would prefer David to be Captain of his Guard; thinking by the promise of his honour and trust, he might augment David's forwardness and affection towards him.

The Philistines renew their War against the Hebrews, and obtain the Victory: Saul with his Son, are slain in the Battel.

Saul having advice, that the Philistines were advanced as far as Sunam, drew out his Forces, and encamped over against them; but when he perceived their Army to be much more numerous than his, his heart failed him, and desiring the Prophets to enquire all diviners of God, what should be the event of this War? and receiving no answer, his fear was doubled, since he had reason to believe that God had forsaken him. Hereupon his courage abated, and in this perplexity he resolved to have recourse to Magick; but having lately banished the Inchanters, Magicians, and such as pretended to tell Fortunes, he could hardly be expected that one of them should be found: but yet he commanded that they should enquire for one of those that could raise the spirits of the dead, and by their information learn what should come to pass hereafter. And being advertised that there was such an one at Endor, without the knowledge of his Army, laying aside his Royal Habits, and attended only by two of his most faithful servants, he repaired to Endor to this Woman, requiring her to divine and raise up the spirit of him whom he should name. The Woman denied, and said, That she ought not to offend against the Kings Endor, who had driven out of his Realm all such sort of soothsayers, telling him, that he did a Crime, not well, who having received no wrong at her hands, should endeavour to lay a snare to bring her into a Crime which might cost her her life. But Saul swore unto her, I bat no man should know thereof, and that he would not discover her divination to others; and that she should incur no danger thereby.

After that by his Oaths and Protections, he had persuaded her, that she should have no cause to fear, he commanded her to raise the spirit of Samuel. She not knowing what Samuel was, called him, and he suddenly appeared. But when the perceived somewhat divine, or more than ordinary, in his countenance, she was troubled; and turning to the King, she asked him, If he were Saul? for Samuel had certified her no less. Saul confessed that it was he, and asked her, For what cause she seemed to be so much troubled? She answered, That she saw a Man ascend, that resembled God. Saul commanded to declare unto him his shape, habit, and age: she told him, That he was a reverend old Man, attired in the vestment of an High-Priest. By these marks Saul knew that it was Samuel: whereupon, prostrating himself on the earth, he adored him. The spirit of Samuel asked him, For what cause he had troubled him? To whom he complained, That he was enforced thereto by necessity: for that a mighty Host of his Enemies were at hand, and that he was forsaken by God, having from him no answer, either by Prophecy or Dream: wherefore, said he, I apply my self unto thee, who hast always expressed great kindness towards me. But Samuel, and forcing that the King's end drew nigh, answered him, It is in vain for thee to enquire concerning those things that shall happen, since thou knowest that thou art forsaken of God. David therefore, said he, that David shall possess the Kingdom, and that it is he that shall establish the State by Arms: but thou shalt lose both thy kingdom and thy life, because thou hast disobeyed God in thy War against the Amalekites, and hast not observed his Commandments, according as I foretold thee when I was alive. Know therefore that thy People and Host shall be discomfited by the Enemy, and that both thou and thy sons shall be to morrow slain in the Battel, and be with me. When Saul understood these things, he became speechless, through sorrow, and fell down on the ground, either because his strength failed him through sudden grief or for want of food; because he had eaten nothing that night, nor the day before.

At length, hardly recovering himself out of his Swoon, the Woman importuned him to receive some sustenance, telling him, that she desired no other reward for the hazard which she had run of forfeiting her life, before she knew that he was the King himself, by whose Commands those Divinations had been lately prohibited: wherefore the prophet told him that he would sit down at the Table, and refresh himself, that he might be the more able to return unto his Army. And although he refused to eat, because he had no appetite, and was utterly desperate; yet she so effectually importuned him, that at length she persuaded him to receive some little nourishment. And whereas she had but one Calf, (for she was but a poor Woman, and had no other riches) yet spared her not to kill it, and dress it for Saul and his Retinue. After which, Saul returned to his Camp. The courtesie of this Woman, deserveth to be praised: for although she knew that the King had prohibited the exercise of her Art, whereby both she and her Family were well maintained, and although before that time she had never seen Saul; yet without and with them a great number of their Nation was slain, they abandoned their Cities, H and fled to others that were better fortified. The Philistines finding these Cities destitute of Inhabitants, seized on them. The next day whilst the Philistines spoiled the dead, they found the bodies of Saul and his Sons, which they spoiled and beheaded, sending their Heads round about the Country, to make it known that their Enemies were defeated. They offered up their Arms also in the Temple of Astarte, and their Bodies they hung on the Walls of the City of Bethsan at this day called Scythopolis. When they of Jabes, a City of Galaad, understood how the Philistines had cut off the Heads of Saul and his Sons, they were enraged, and thought it became them not to be unconcerned: whereupon the most valiant amongst them, went out and marched all night till they came to Bethsan, and approaching near the Walls, they took down the Bodies of Saul and his Sons, and carried them unto Jabes, without any opposition of the Enemy. These men of Jabes lamented over the dead Bodies, and buried them in the best part of their Country, called Arar. Thus they mourned, both Men, Women, and Children, beating their Breasts, and lamenting for the King and his Sons, and tasting neither meat nor drink. This was the end of Saul, according as Samuel had foretold him, because he disobeyed God in his War against the Amalekites, and because he had slain Abimelech and all the Sacerdotal Race, and destroyed the City of the Priests. He Reigned, during the life of Samuel, the space of 18 years, and 22 years after his death.

CHAP. I.

David is created King of one Tribe in Hebron: over the rest, Saul's Son obtaineth the Sovereignty.

THis Battel was fought on the same day that David returned Conqueror to Siceleg, after he had subdued the Amalekites. But about three days after his return, he that slew Saul, and had escaped from the Battel, having his Garment rent, and Ashes upon his Head, came and cast himself prostrate before David: and being asked from whence he came? he answered from the Battel of the Israelites; and certified David of the unhappy event: telling him, that many thousands of the Hebrews were slain, and that Saul himself and his Sons were fallen in the conflict. He likewise related, how he himself retreated amongst the Hebrews, when the King fled: confessing that he had slain him, that he might not fall alive into the hands of his enemy: For (said he) Saul having cast himself upon the point of his sword, was so weak, by reason of the agony of his wounds, that he could not dispatch himself. Thereupon he produced the bracelets and the Royal Crown which he took from him. David perceiving no cause whereby he should doubt of his death, whereof he had most evident and infallible testimonies, rent his garments, and spent the day in weeping and lamenting with his companions: but he was the more grieved for the loss of his dear friend Jonathan, whom he acknowledged to be the preserver of his life: And so affectionate shewed he himself towards Saul, that although he had oftentimes been in danger to have been slain by him, yet was he much troubled at his death; and not only so, but he likewise pur to death him that slew him, telling him, that he himself had accused himself for slaying the King, and shown himself by that parricide to be a true Amalekite. He composed likewise Lamentations and Epitaphs in the praise of Saul and Jonathan, which are yet extant. After that he had thus honoured the King, and performed his Lamentations and Obsequies, he asked counsel of God by the Prophet: What City of the Tribe of Juda he would give him to inhabit in? who answered him, That he would give him Hebron. For which cause he forsook Siceleg, and came and dwelt in Hebron, and brought thither his Wives and his Army. All the people of the Tribe reformed thither unto him, and proclaimed him King: where understanding how the Jabeshites had buried Saul and his Sons, he sent Ambassadors unto them, both to praise and approve their Actions, assuring them, that he allowed their act, and would recompense that kindness which they had shewed to the dead: giving them likewise to understand, that the Tribe of Juda had chosen him for their King. But Abner the Son of Ner, General of Saul's Army, a man of great courage, and a noble disposition understanding that Saul and Jonathan, and his two other Brothers were dead, came into the

the Camp, and bringing with him the only Son of Saul that was left, whose name was H Ishbosheth, he passed to the other side of Jordan and proclaimed him King. He appointed likewise for his Royal seat and place of Residence, a certain Country called in Hebrew Macbare, that is to say, the Camp. From thence he went with a select band of Soldiers, with a resolution to encounter those of the Tribe of Juda, because they had chosen David for their King. Against him marched out Joab the Son of Suri and of Servia, David's Sister, General of his Army, to encounter him, accompanied with his Brothers Abisai and Azael, and all David's soldiers: and arriving near a Fountain in Gaba, he drew up his Army in that place. Abner proposing that before they joined Battel they should try some of the Soldiers of each party, it was agreed between them, that twelve of either side should be chosen out to decide the quarrel. These men marched out into a certain place betwixt both Armies, and having darted their Javelins the one against the other, came at last to their Swords; and one taking his enemy by the hair, they all of them slew one another upon the place. Hereupon the Armies met, and after a cruel Battel, Abner with his followers were discomfited: and flying in great haste were pursued by Joab, who encouraged his soldiers to follow them close without suffering any of them to escape. But amongst the rest, Joab's Brothers were hot upon the Chase, and the youngest of them called Azael, gave special testimony of his forwardness, for he ran not only more swift than other men, but outstripped horses also in their race. Whilst thus he pursued Abner with great vehemence, without turning either to the one side or the other; Abner seeing himself closely pressed after, advised him to forbear his pursuit, and promised him a complete sute of Armor for a present: but seeing him still advance, he desired him that he would not constrain him to kill him, and thereby render his brother Joab implacable.
 But Azael not regarding him, Abner struck him through with a Javelin so that he presently died. But they that pursued Abner, likewise arriving in the place where Azael's body lay dead, stood round about him, and forbore to pursue the Enemy any further.
 But Joab and his Brother Abisai passing by and conceiving a more mortal hatred against Abner, because he had slain their Brother, they pursued him till Sun-set unto a place called Anon that is the aqueduct. Their mounting upon a hillock, he saw Abner with the Tribe of Benjamin flying from him; who began to cry out to him that men of the same Tribe ought not to be so incensed the one against the other: that their Brother Azael was in the fault, because that although he had exhorted him to cease from pursuing him, yet could he not persuade him, and that therefore he had slain him. Joab considering these his sayings, he commanded the Trumpet to sound a Retreat, and forbore to pursue them any more, and incamped for that night in the same place: during which time, Abner travelled without ceasing, and having past over Jordan, returned to his Camp to Ishbosheth Saul's Son. The next day Joab surveyed the dead, and caused them to be buried. Those that were found dead on Abner's side, were about three hundred and sixty men; and on David's nineteen, besides Azael, whose body Joab and Abisai took with them, and carried it to Bethlehem, and after they had interred it in the Tomb of their Ancestors, they repaired to Hebron unto David. From that time forward there arose a civil War amongst the Hebrews M and endured a long time, in which David's followers had always the upper-hand, and never adventured the hazard of the field without some gaining advantage: whereas the Son of Saul and his partakers were daily weakened. David at that time had six Sons and as many Wives; the eldest of them was called Amnon, the Son of Acchimaas; the second was Daniel, the Son of Abigail; the third was called Abisai, the Son of Maaca, the Daughter of Tolmar King of Gessure; the fourth was Adonias, the Son of his Wife called Aggite; the fifth was Sphacia the Son of Abithal; the sixth Jehoram the Son of Egl. But after this civil War was begun, and that the Kings on both sides had oftentimes encountered and fought together; Abner the General of the Army of King Saul's Son, a prudent man, and one that was beloved by the people, endeavored all N that in him lay, that the whole Country might be commanded by Ishbosheth, and in effect they all submitted unto him for a certain time: but when it afterwards fell out that Abner was charged to have kept company with Rispa, Saul's Concubine, the Daughter of Sibath, and that Ishbosheth reproved him for it, he was much incensed, as thinking himself very ill rewarded for his services; whereupon he threatened to establish the Kingdom of David, and to make Ishbosheth know that it was neither his own valour nor conduct that made him Sovereign over the Tribes on that side Jordan, but that his fidelity and experience was the cause thereof. Whereupon he sent unto Hebron to David, requiring him, by an oath, to accept of him as his confederate and friend, promising him to persuade the people to forsake Saul's Son, and to proclaim him King of the whole Country. David O swore unto him, as he had required, and very joyfully received his offices, and the more to confirm this league betwixt them, he sent back Michol David's wife whom he had purchased great importance.

When Abner heard the words of these messengers (who overtook him in a place called Besira, some twenty Furlongs off of Hebron) he struck out of the way without suspecting any treachery; and Joab going before him, embraced him with great kindness, and like an affectionate friend, and singling him from his other company, and making as if he would inform him of certain secrets, and having drawn him into a by-way beside the wall, accompanied only with his Brother Abisai, he drew his sword, and thrust it into his short ribs; of which wound Abner died, surprised by the Treason of Joab, who coloured that act of his, with the revenge and death of his Brother Azael, whom Abner had slain whilst he was pursued by him in the first War at Hebron; but in truth it was but the suspicion of his greatness and honour, fearing lest he should be deprived of his Place, and Abner obtain the next degree of honour unto David. Hereby may a man perceive how many and how mighty things men attempt and hazard for their avarice and ambition sake, and to the end they may not be inferior unto any others. For when they desire to attain riches and honours, they achieve it by ten thousand mischiefs; and at such time as they fear to be dispossessed, they strive to continue their estates by means more pernicious, because they think it to be the less sin; and that the unhappiness is less, rather not to have obtained to any greatness and power, than after the possession thereof, to fall from it. Thence it cometh, that all of them intend and practise many hazards and difficulty through the fear they have to forfeit their Grandeur. But it sufficeth to have briefly touched this point. David having notice of the murder of Abner, conceived a great grief in his heart, and called all his friends to witness, lifting up his hands unto God, and protesting that he was no partaker of the murder, and that Abner had been slain without his knowledge. He likewise uttered most grievous curses against the murderer, his house and accomplices, praying that they might be overtaken by that vengeance which useth to pursue the murderer: for he greatly suspected lest he should be thought to be a party in that which had happened unto Abner, contrary to his Faith, and promise, which he had past unto him. Moreover, he commanded that all the people should weep and lament for him, and that his Funerals should be honoured according to the accustomed manner, in renting of Garments and putting on Sack cloth: and that the same should be done the Coffin being carried before, which both he and the chiefest Governours of the Israelites followed, beating on their Breasts, and shedding tears,

tears, and testifying the love which they bare unto him during his life, and their sorrow for his death, who had been murdered contrary to their will and intention. He was Entombed in Hebron with great Magnificence, and Epitaphs composed in his praise by David himself, who setting himself on the Tomb first of all lamented, and gave others an example to follow him. And so much was he troubled at the death of Abner, that he forbore all kind of meat until the Sun set, notwithstanding the instances of his friends, who urged him to take meat: which act of his purchased him much love amongst the people. For they that loved Abner, were very glad to be witnesses of that honour which he did him at his death, and that faith which he maintained in honouring him, as if he had been his Kinsman or friend, and not embasing him with a vile and contemptible Tomb, as if he had been his Enemy. And in general, all of them were so much possessed with the sweetness and Royal nature of King David, that they believed he would have the like kindness for them, as they saw him express for deceased Abner. And by this means David happily maintained his credit, and increased the peoples good opinion of him, escaping thereby the suspicion that he might in some sort have been accessory to his death. He protested also unto the people, that he conceived no small grief at the loss of so good a man, declaring that it was a great prejudice to the State to be deprived of him, maintained their peace by his good advice, and ratified the fame by his executions and Warlike valour: But God (said he) who hath care of all things, shall not suffer him to die unrevenged: and he it is that shall bear me witness, that it lieth not in my power to punish Joab and Abisai, who have greater credit in the Army than I myself; yet shall they not escape God's justice for this fault. Thus ended the life of Abner.

C H A P. II.

Ishboeth is slain through the Treason of his followers: the whole Kingdom devolveth unto David.

When Ishboeth, Saul's Son, had notice of Abner's death, he was much troubled, not only that he was deprived of his near Kinsman, but also of so great a personage as had settled the Crown on his head. Neither did he himself long time remain alive after him: but by the Sons of Jeremon Banaoth and Than, he was Traitorously slain. These two being Benjamites, and of the chiefest Nobility amongst them contrived to make away Ishboeth, and thereby obtain a great reward from David; supposing that such an act would merit the chiefest place and dignity in the Army. For which cause finding Ishboeth alone in his house about mid-day, laid on his bed and asleep, and unattended by any of his Guard, and perceiving likewise that the Porter was asleep: they entered into the lodging where Ishboeth was asleep, and slew him: and having cut off his head, they travelled all the night and day, as if they fled from those whom they had offended, and fought for rescue. And when they came to Hebron, they presented David with Ishboeth's head, offering themselves to do him service, letting him know, that they had delivered him of an enemy, and made away his adversary. But David allowed not their act, but thus received them; O cursed men, (on whom I intend presently to execute justice) have you not heard how I punished him that murdered Saul, and brought his Royal Crown unto me? Ica, although he slew him at his own request, and to the intent the enemy should not surprise him alive: Did ye think that I was changed, and that I am not the same that I was, but that I take delight to be partaker with you in your wickedness, or that I will countenance it, as if these acts of yours (who are murderers of your Master) were to be commended? Ungrateful Villains, have you no remorse for having murdered, on his Couch a Prince that never did an injury to any, and had shewed so much kindness unto you? but I will certainly punish you with the loss of your lives, because you have thought that Ishboeth's death would work my content: for you could not in any thing dishonour me more than by conceiving such an opinion of me. Which said, he adjudged them to die by the most cruel torments that might be imagined: and with a great deal of solemnity, he caused Ishboeth's head to be interred in Abner's Tomb.

These murderers being thus put to death, the chief of the people repaired to David unto Hebron both they that commanded over thousands, and such also as were governors) and submitted themselves unto him, they recounted the good offices they had done him, both during Saul's life-time, as also the honour which they had always shown him, since the first time that he was a Commander in that Army, especially that he had been chosen by God through the mediation of the Prophet Samuel, to be their King, and his children after him; declaring unto him, that God had given him the Country of the Hebrews, to defend the same, and discomfit the Philistines. David accepted their readiness

A readiness and affection, exhorting them to persist, assuring them that they should never repent themselves of their obedience: and after he had entertained them, he sent them to assemble the people.

Of the Tribe of Juda, there came together about six thousand and eight hundred men of War, bearing for their Arms a Buckler, and a Javelin; who before that time had followed Saul's Sons, and were not of those that had adhered unto David. Of the Tribe of Simeon, seven thousand, and one hundred, or somewhat more. Of that of Levi 4700, whose Captain was Jodan, with whom was Sadoc the High-Priest, accompanied with twenty and two of the same lineage. Of the Tribe of Benjamin four thousand of men War; for this Tribe were as yet of that opinion, that some of the Heirs of Saul should reign. Of that of Ephraim 20800 strong and valiant men. Of that of Manasse, eight thousand. Of that of Issachar two hundred, who were skilful in divination, and 20000 men of War. Of that of Zabulon 20000 chosen fighting men: for only this intire Tribe was wholly at David's command, who were armed in like manner as they of Gad were. Of the Tribe of Nephthali there were a thousand Captains, famous for their valour, and armed with shield and Javelin, attended by an infinite number of their Tribe. Of the Tribe of Dan there were 27000 chosen men. Of that of Asher 40000. Of the two Tribes on the other side of Jordan, and of the half Tribe of Manasse, six-score thousand armed men, with Buckler, Javelin, Helmet and Sword: The rest of the other Tribes also wore Swords. All this multitude was assembled together in Hebron before David, with great provision of victuals and wine, sufficient to sustain them all, who all of them with one consent, appointed David to be their King. Now when the people had mustered and feasted for three days space in Hebron, David dislodged from thence with his whole Host, and repaired to Jerusalem. But the Jebusites, who at that time inhabited the City, and were of the Race of the Canaanites, shutting up their Gates against his coming, and placing on their walls as many as were blind and lame, or maimed in any other fort, in contempt of him, scoffingly jested and said, That these were sufficient to keep out the Enemy: so much trusted they to their fortifications. Wherewith David being incensed, he prepared to besiege Jerusalem with all the vigour imaginable, that he might by making himself Master of that place strike a terror into all the rest that should dare to make any opposition. He took the lower Town; and because the higher Town as yet held out, the King resolved to encourage his men of War to shew themselves valiant, promising them honours and rewards, and that he would make him General over all the people, that should first of all Scale the Wall. Whilst they thus put themselves forward to mount without refusing any danger (through the desire they had to obtain the Government that was promised) Joab the Son of Servia, was the forwardest; and having got upon the Wall, called from thence to the King to acquit himself of his promise.

C H A P. III.

David having taken Jerusalem by force, turneth out all the Canaanites, and delivereth the City to be inhabited by the Jews.

After therefore he had cast out the Jebusites from the higher City, and repaired Jerusalem, he called it the City of David, and resided there all his Reign: so that the whole time that he ruled in Hebron, over the Tribe of Juda, was seven years, and six months. But after he had taken Jerusalem for his Royal City, his fortunes daily more and more increased, because God was with him. Hiram also King of Tyre, sent unto him, and made a league with him: he presented him likewise with Presents of Cedar, and Workmen and Masons, to build him a Royal house in Jerusalem. Now when the King had taken the City, he joyined the Cittadel unto it; and having walled them about he gave the Government thereof to Joab. This King was the first that drove the Jebusites out of Jerusalem, and called the same by his name. For, from the time of Abraham our forefather, it was called Solyra: neither want there some that infer, that Homer under that name intendeth Jerusalem. For, in the Hebrew tongue, Solyra is as much as to say, Security. All the time since the war made by Josua against the Canaanites, since Josua's conquest to this time 515 years, the Israelites could not drive the Canaanites out of Jerusalem until David took the same by force, were five hundred and fifteen years. But I must not forget one Orphan, a rich man amongst the Jebusites, who because he was well affected towards the Hebrews, was not put to death at the taking of Jerusalem: but was much honoured by the King. David espoused other Women besides those which he had; and took many Concubines; by them he had eleven Sons, whose names are these which follow, Amnael, Seba, Nathan, Solomon, Jaberi, Eliel, Phaltai, Phalma, Emapha, Jenaab, Eliphal: and a Daughter called Thamar. Nine of these were begotten of his wives, and the two last were the Sons of Concubines. But Thamar was Abfalon's Sister by the same Father and Mother.

Now when the Philistines knew that the Hebrews had created David King, they led forth their Army against him towards Jerusalem, where, encamping themselves in the valley of the Giants (which is a place not far from the City) they in that place expected the encounter. But the King of the Hebrews, who was wont to do nothing inconsiderately, commanded the High-Priest to ask counsel of God what success the War should have; who after he had informed him that God favoured their designs, he presently drew out his Army against the Enemy, and giving them battle, he suddenly assailed the Enemies, slaying many of them, he put the rest to flight. But let no man suspect that the Army of the Philistines was either small in number, or weak in courage, which at that time assailed the Hebrews, because they were easily overcome, without their performing any memorable action. For all Syria, Phoenicia, (and the other Warlike Nations beyond them) were confederates with them, in this War: which was the cause, that notwithstanding they were so many times overcome, and lost many thousands of men, that they do not list not to assail the Hebrews, with greater force: having been defeated in the battle before-mentioned, yet they reinforced their Army, and encamped in the same place. Whereupon David again required of God what the issue of this battle should be: and the High-Priest told him, that he should encamp in the Forest called Tears, because it was not far off from the Enemies Camp, and that he should not depart from thence, neither make any attempt upon them, before the trees should shake without any agitation of the wind. Whereupon, as soon as the trees shook, and the time which God had appointed was come, without any delay he marched out with an assurance of returning victorious. For the squadrons of the Enemy were disordered, and incontinently betook themselves to flight, being pursued unto the City of Gerar (which is a frontier-town of their Country) their Camp was plundered, and in it were found great riches; and amongst other things their gods which were broken to pieces by the Israelites.

The battle being ended, it seemed good unto David (by the counsel of the Elders and Colonels over thousands) that all the flower of their youth should be assembled from all the parts of the Country, every one according to his Tribe. And that the Priests and Levites should repair to Cariatiarim, and bring from thence the Ark of God and convey it to Jerusalem; to the end that when it should be there, the service of God might for the future be celebrated in that place, and other sacrifices and honours, agreeable to the divine Majesty be performed. Which if Saul had religiously observed, he had not fallen into those misfortunes which at the same time deprived him of his Crown and his life. Now when all the people were assembled (according as it was appointed) the King himself also assisted at the removal of the Ark; which being carried by the Priests out of Aminidab's house, they laid it upon a new Wain drawn by Oxen, and committed the conduct of it to their Brethren and their Children.

The King marched foremost, and after him all his people, praising God, and singing Psalms and Hymns to the found of the Trumpets and Cymbals, and several sorts of Instruments: and in this manner conducted they the Ark into Jerusalem. But when they were come to the threshing floor of Chidon, Oza died, thorow the wrath of God: for the Oxen stumbling that drew the Chariot, and the Ark tottering, he stretched out his hand to hold it up; but being no Priest, God struck him dead, because he presumed to touch the Ark. The King and the people were much troubled at the death of Oza and the place where he died is called to this day Oza's Striking. David, (fearing lest if he should carry the Ark with him into the City, the like misfortune might attend him that had befallen Oza, who died, because he only stretched out his hand) he carried it not with him into the City, but commanded that it should be left in the possession of one called Obed, by descent a Levite, a good and virtuous man: where it remained for three months space, during which time, his house was blessed with all worldly happiness. The King being informed of the success of Obed, (who of a poor man, was suddenly become very rich, so that all men had their eyes upon him, and some envied him) he assured himself that no inconvenience would befall him, if he should take the Ark to Jerusalem. It was carried by the Priests; and seven Quires of singing men who were appointed by the King, went before it: The King himself likewise played upon the Harp, so that Michol, David's

Wife

A Wife and Saul's Daughter, seeing him, mocked at him. The Ark then being thus carried, was placed in a Tabernacle erected by David, who offered Sacrifices of all sorts, in such abundance that he feasted all the People, both men, Women and Children, distributing unto every one a Cake, and a portion of the Sacrifice: and after he had thus feasted the People, he dismissed them, and retired unto his own House. But Michol his Wife, the Daughter of King Saul, drawing near unto him upon his return, besought God for him, that it might please him in all other things the might express unto her Husband all that which became her intire and unequalled love towards him: but in this she blamed him because that being so great and mighty a King he had dishonoured himself in dancing, and had thereby discovered that which became him not, doing all this in company with his Servants and Handmaids. To whom David answered, That he was not ashamed of performing a thing so acceptable unto God as that was who preferred him before her Father, and placed him above all others, assuring her that he should oftentimes behave himself after that manner. This Michol had no Children by David, but being married again to another (to whom her Father had betrothed her after he took her from David) the bare five Sons of whom we will speak hereafter. The King perceiving how by God's assistance his affairs prospered daily more and more, thought that he could not without offence dwell in an House of Cedar, and suffer the Ark to remain in a Tabernacle: wherefore he designed to build a Temple unto God, according as Moses had foretold, and to this intent consulted with the Prophet Nathan, who willed him to perform all that which he was minded to accomplish, assuring him that God would be assistant unto him: which confirmed him in the resolutions he had taken. But the same night God appeared unto Nathan, commanding him to tell David, that he accepted his will, and commended his resolutions, yet notwithstanding he permitted him not to proceed because he had embrewed his Hands in the Blood of many of his Enemies. But after his decease (which shall happen after he hath lived a long and prosperous Life) his Son Solomon (to whom he shall leave the Kingdom after his death) shall cause a Temple to be built, promising him to assist the said Solomon (even as the Father doth his Son) and that he would continue the Kingdom to his Heirs: And that if they shall happen at any time to offend him, he will only punish them with Sickness and Famine. David hearing this, was very joyful, because the Kingdom was assured to his Heirs: and for that his House should be renowned; and presenting himself before the Ark, he prostrated himself, and gave God thanks for all the benefits he had bestowed on him; for that from a poor and humble Shepherd, he had raised him to so great a height of Majesty and Glory, that he had promised to take care of his Posterity; and that he would secure the Liberty of his People which he had asserted in delivering them from Bondage.

David overcoming the neighbouring Nations, imposeth Tributes on them.

Not long time after this, David made War upon the Philistines, partly, that he might avoid the suspicion of Sloth and Idleness; and partly, that having (according as God had foretold) discomfited his Enemies, he might leave a peaceable Kingdom to his Posterity after him. He therefore assembled his Army, commanding them to be in a readiness to march, and departing out of Jerusalem, he made an inroad into the Country of the Philistines; whom he overcame in Battle, and took a great part of the Country from them, by means whereof he enlarged the Frontiers of the Hebrews. He made War also against the Moabites: whose Army being divided into two parts, was by him defeated and overthrown, and many Prisoners taken and Tributes were imposed on them. Afterwards he led out his Army against Adarezer Son of Ara, King of Sophona; and giving him Battle near the River Euphrates, he slew about two thousand Foot and five thousand Horse; he took also almost a thousand Chariots. The greater part whereof was wholly consumed, and one hundred of them only reserved to his own use.

CHAP. VI.

They of Damascus are overcome by David.

A Dad King of Damascus and of Syria, understanding that David had made War on Adarezer (who was his Friend and Confederate) raised great Forces to assist him: but entering the Field, and encountering with David near unto the River Euphrates, he was overcome and lost a great number of his Soldiers: for in that Battle there fell on his side twenty thousand, and the rest fled. Of this King, Nicholas the Historiographer makes mention in the fourth Book of his History, in these words: A long time after the War with David.

most puissant Prince of this Country called Adad governed in Damascus, and over the rest of Syria (except Phœnicia) who making War against David, King of Judæa, and having oftentimes fought with him; in his last encounter (wherein he was overcome near the River Euphrates) he signalized himself by such actions as were worthy of a great Captain and a great King. Moreover he speaketh of his Heirs that reigned successively after him. That he being deceased, his Sons reigned for ten generations after him, each of them receiving from their Father, the same Name and the same Kingdom, after the manner of the Ptolomies of Egypt. The third of these being more mighty than the rest, and desirous to revenge himself of the injuries, which were offered unto his Grandfather, led forth his Army against the Jews, and destroyed the Country called at this day Samaria. Wherein he varied not from the truth: for he of whom he speaketh, is that Adad, that made War in Samaria, during the Reign of Achab King of Israel, of whom we will speak hereafter. But when David had led forth his Army against Damascus, and against the rest of the Country of Syria, he reduced them all under his obedience placing Garrisons in their Country and imposing Tribute upon them. He dedicated also to him in the City of Jerusalem, the Golden Quivers and Arms of Adad's Guard: which afterward Syssak King of Egypt, took when he vanquished Roboham his Nephew, & carried away great Riches out of the Temple of Jerusalem, as it shall be declared hereafter, when we come to treat of that matter. This King of the Hebrews being inspired by God (who made him prosperous in all his Wars) encamped before the chiefest Cities of Adrezer, that is to say, Betha and Maccon, which he besieged, took and spoiled, where there was found great store of Gold & Silver and of Bras, which was more precious than Gold, whereof Solomon made that great Vessel called the Sea, and other fair Lavers at such time as he adorned and furnished the Temple of God. When Thoy King of Amoth understood all which had happened to Adrezer, and how his Power and Forces were destroyed, he grew afraid of his own Estate, and resolved to enter into a League and Confederacy with David, before he should come out against him: and to that intent he sent his Son Adoram unto him, to Congratulate his Success against Adrezer his Enemy, and to contract an Amity with him. He sent him Presents also, namely Vessels of Antique Work of Gold, of Silver, and of Bras, whereupon David made a League with him, and received the Presents that were sent unto him: and afterwards honourably dismissed his Son both for the one, and the other: and consecrated that to God which he had presented him (together with the Gold and Silver, which he had taken from the Cities and Nations that were subject unto him.) For God did not only so far favour him, as to make him victorious and happy in his own Wars; but having also sent Abisai Joab's Brother the Lieutenant of his Army against the Idumeans, he likewise granted him Victory: for Abisai slew in the Battle about eighteen thousand of them, and filled all Idumea with Garrisons, imposing a Tribute throughout the Country by the Poll. This King loved Justice of his own nature, and the judgment which he gave was always most equitable. He had for his Lieutenant General of his Armies Joab, and appointed Josaphat the Son of Achilles chief over the Registers. After Abiathar, he established Sadoc of the House of Phinees for High-Priest, who was his Friend. Sifa was his Secretary, Banaia the Son of Joisada was Captain over his Guard, and all the Elders were ordinarily about him to guard and attend him. He remembering himself also of the Covenants and Oaths that past twice him and Jonathan the Son of Saul, and of their amity and affection (for amongst his other excellent qualities he was always most eminent for his gratitude.) He caused inquiry to be made, if any one of the House and Family of Jonathan were left alive, to the intent he might return the Friendship he had received from Jonathan. Whereupon a certain man named Ziba, was brought unto him (who was entrained by Saul) that might inform him what one of his Race was alive: who asked him if he knew any of Jonathan's Sons then living, to whom he might make some return of the kindness which he had formerly received from their Father. Who answered him, That he had one Son remaining, whose name was Mephibosheth, who was lame of his Legs, for when the news came that both his Father and Grandfather were slain, his Nurse hastily snatching up the Child, let him fall from her Shoulders, and so hurt him. When he heard where he was brought up, he sent unto the City of Labath to Machir, with whom Mephibosheth, was kept, and commanded him to be brought unto him. Now when he came to David's presence, he cast himself on his Face before him; but the King exhorted him to be of good courage, and to hope hereafter for better fortune, and gave him his Father's House with all the possessions, that were purchased by Saul his Grandfather, appointing him to eat with him daily at his own Table. The young Man did him reverence, thanking him for the Royal Offers he had made him. At that time David called for Ziba, and told him how he had given Mephibosheth his Father's House and all Saul's Purchases, commanding

A manding him to manure his Possessions, and to have a care of all things, and to return the Revenue to Jerusalem, because Mephibosheth was every day to sit at his Table, charging both him and his fifteen Sons, and twenty Servants to do him Service. After the King had thus disposed of him, Sifa did him reverence; and after he had promised to perform whatsoever he had given him in charge, he departed, and Jonathan's Son remained in Jerusalem, where he lived at the King's Table, and was entertained and tended as carefully as if he had been his own Son: he had a Son also called Mica. These were the honours that those Children which survived after Jonathan and Saul's death, received at David's Hands. About the same day dyed Nabas King of the Ammonites, who during his lifetime was David's Friend, and his Son succeeded him in his Kingdom, to whom David sent Ambassadors to comfort him, exhorting him to bear his Father's Death with patience, assuring him that he would express no less love towards him, than he did unto his Father. But the Governours of the Ammonites entertained this Embassage very contemptuously, and not according as David had intended it, and murmured against their King, telling him that they were but Spies sent by David to inquire into their Forces, and discover the Strength of their Country under a pretext of Kindness; advising him to stand upon his Guard, and not to give ear to his Protestation, lest being deceived, he should fall into some remediless inconvenience.

Nabas King of the Ammonites, supposing that his Governours spake nothing but truth, unworthily affronted the Ambassadors that were sent unto him: for causing the half of their Beards to be shaven close by the Chin, and cutting away the half of their Vestments, he sent them back again. Which when David saw, he was much displeased, and protested that he would not suffer that injury so easily to be digested, but that he would make War on the Ammonites, and revenge those indignities that were offered to his Ambassadors. The Friends and Governours of Nabas considering how they had violated and broken the Peace, and how for that occasion they deserved to be punished; prepared for that War, and sent a thousand Talents to Syrus, King of Mesopotamia, desiring him that he would be their Confederate in that War, and receive their pay: they requested the like of Nabas: these Kings had 20000 Footmen in Pay. They hired also with Money the King of the Country called Michas, and the fourth called Ithob, which two brought with them twelve thousand men.

CHAP. VII.

How David overcame the Mesopotamians.

But David being nothing discouraged, either with the Confederacy, or force of the Ammonites; but trusting in God, since he was satisfied that his cause was just, persisted to the revenge of those Outrages which he had received from them. Having therefore Mustered under Joab the flower of his whole Army, he commanded him to depart and make War upon them: who came and incamped himself before their chief City called Aramath; which when the Enemies perceived, they came forth and ranged themselves in Battel, not in one Body but two several Parties. For their Confederates and Allies were Incamped apart in the Plain, and the Ammonites stood in Battel-array near unto their City Gate, to make Head against the Hebrews; Joab perceiving this, took this course, that he might meet them without any disadvantage: for he chose out the ablest and stoutest of his Men to serve under him against Syrus and the other Kings Confederate with him, and gave the rest to his Brother Abisai, commanding him to oppose himself against the Ammonites whilst he charged the rest; and appointing him, that if he perceived that the Syrians were stronger than he, and did put him to the worst, that he should come to succour him; promising to do the like, if he perceived him to be oppressed by the Ammonites. When therefore he had exhorted his Brother to behave himself valiantly, he sent him before to charge the Ammonites; and he on the other side assailed the Syrians who valiantly resisted him for a little space: but Joab having slain many of them, constrained them at length to turn their backs. Which when the Ammonites perceived (who were afraid of Abisai and his People) Retreated likewise, following the example of their Allies, they took their flight into the City. By which means, Joab having defeated his Enemies, returned in Triumph and with Victory unto the King to Jerusalem.

Yet were not the Ammonites wholly weakened by this loss: for although they had by experience a certain knowledge that the Hebrews were stronger than themselves, yet would they by no means hearken to a Peace. They sent unto Chalamia King of the Syrians on the other side of Euphrates, whose Confederacy they attained by Bribes and huge sums of money. This King had one called Sobac for his Lieutenant-General, and under him fourcore thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. David understanding that the Ammonites drew H to an head, and intended to assault him again, he forceaid to send his Lieutenants, but went himself in Person, and meeting them, he overcame them and killed forty thousand of their Foot, and seven thousand Horse: he hurt Sobac also, Chalamas Lieutenant, so that he died of his wounds. Hereupon the Mesopotamians yielded themselves unto David, and gave him many great and magnificent Presents. He therefore by reason of the Winter, retired to Jerusalem, but at the Spring he sent out his Lieutenant Joab once more to make War upon the Ammonites: who over-running their Country, utterly spoiled it, and shut them up in Aramath their principal City, which he besieged and took. About this time it so fell out, that David (notwithstanding he were a just man, and one that feared God, and an exact observer of all the Laws and Ordinances of his Forefathers) fell into a great sin, and offended God. For as he walked on the top of his Royal Palace, in the evening, he discovered a Woman of incomparable Beauty, (whose name was Bathsheba) bathing her self. His passion became forthwith so impetuous, that he could not resist it: whereupon he sent for her, and kept her with him till she conceived. She desired him to betink himself of some means whereby her shame might be concealed, and her life (which was in hazard, by the Law, for her Adultery) might be preserved. Who thereupon sent for Urias (Bathsheba's Husband, and one of Joab's Captains, who at that time was at the siege, of Aramath) and enquired of him upon his arrival touching the state of the siege, and of the Army: who answering him that all things were fallen out according to his wish; David took a part of his own supper and gave it him, willing him to repair unto his own house, and repose himself with his Wife. But Urias slept among his fellow-souldiers near unto the person of the King. Which when David understood, he asked him wherefore he repaired not to his own house, according to the custom of Husbands that had been long absent: and why he visited not his Wife from whom he had been so long parted? Urias replied, That it became him not either to repose or take pleasure with his Wife, whilst his Companions and General lay upon the ground in the Enemies Country. Which said, David commanded him to sojourn there all the day long, to the end that on the next morning, he might send him back again to Joab. That night the King invited him to supper, and although he were made drunk through the abundance of Wine he received, which the King had purposely caused to be given him, (yet he slept at the Kings gate, without any desire to go home unto his Wife.) Here- upon the King being much troubled wrote unto Joab, commanding him to punish Urias because he had offended him: enjoining him to place him in the greatest danger, and in face of the Enemy, to the intent, that he might be abandoned and left alone, whilst they that fought next unto him, retired when they saw him charged. When he had thus written and sealed up the Letter with his own seal, he delivered it to Urias to carry to Joab: who receiving the same, and conceiving the Kings pleasure, placed Urias in that quarter where he knew the Enemies would fight most desperately: appointing him some of his best Soldiers to second him: he assured him, that if he could make any breach in the wall he would come up to him with all his power, that he might through that place force M his way into the City.

Urias (who was a good Soldier, and a man of much honour and reputation among those of his Tribe, and refused no danger) valiantly accepted the charge: But Joab privately appointed those that were ranked next him, that when they should see the Enemy fall out with the greatest fury, they should abandon Urias. When therefore the Hebrews drew near unto the City, the Ammonites, fearing lest the Enemy should speedily Scale and enter the City on that side where Urias was placed, they chose out a Squadron of the most resolute men amongst them and setting open their gates they furiously assaulted their Enemies. They that were near Urias seeing them draw near, retired back again according as Joab had before-hand commanded them: but Urias being ashamed N to sile or forsake his rank, expected the Enemy, and valiantly encountering him, he slew divers of them; but at last being inclosed and shut in the midst of them, he was slain with some others of his companions. This done, Joab sent messengers unto the King, to let him know, that not enduring the delay of the siege, but attempting to carry the Town by Storm, he was compelled to return back into his Camp, with the loss of some of his men: but he commanded the messengers, that if they perceived the King to be displeased with the news, they should let him know that Urias was dead also.

The King hearing this seemed displeased, saying, that it was a fault in him: that he had so nearly approached the wall, alledging that he might have done far better, to have taken the town by Mine, or by battering it with his Engines: in the case of Abimelech instantane- ously, Gideon's son, who intending to surprize by force a tower that was within the City of Tobek, was stricken with a stone that was cast at him by a woman: whereof he died. In remembrance

A brace of whose disaster, they ought to have been more wary, and not to have approached the Wall of the Enemy so nearly. For it is the part of a Soldier to retain in his memory both fatal and fortunate successes, to the end that when he shall be in the like danger he may follow the one and fly the other. Whilst he thus rebuked them, the messenger certified him of Urias death, which did somewhat appease him. So that he commanded them to tell Jacob, that it was but an humane accident, and that such was the nature of War, that sometime the one had the better and sometime the other: To conclude, that he should provide for the siege, and take care lest hereafter they should receive any further loss; counselling him by Trenches and Engines to ruinate the wall, and commanding that all those that were in the Town, should be put to the Sword. The messenger thus dismissed, reported all these things unto Joab, according to the King's commandment. But Urias Wife having notice of the death of her Husband, wept and mourned for him divers days: And when her mourning for the dead was ended, the King espoused her, and the bare him a man-child: Yer God beheld not this Marriage with a favourable eye, but was wroth with David, and appearing to the Prophet Nathan in a dream, he commanded him to reprove David. Now Nathan, who was a wife and experienced man, knew well that when Kings are displeased, they suffer themselves rather to be guided by passion, than by reason: Wherefore he thought fit to conceal the threatnings of God for that time; and to begin his discourse with something that should be less harsh to the King; wherefore he addressed himself after this manner. Two Men (said he) dwell in the same City: The one of them was rich, having much great and small cattel; the other was poor, and had but one only sheep, which he fed and loved like his children. It hapned that this rich man had a stranger came to his house, for whose entertainment he would not suffer any one of his own Beasts to be slain, but sent a messenger, who took away, by force, the poor mans sheep, and caused it to be dressed, to entertain his guest. This report of Nathans much displeased the King, inasmuch that he swore unto him, that he that had committed such an act, was a wicked man, and that he should restore him fourfold, and that afterward he should be put to death. Whereunto Nathan replied, saying, That it was he that deserved this punishment, who had given sentence against himself; in that he had presumed to commit so grievous a sin. Moreover, he certified him of God's displeasure, who, notwithstanding he had made him D King over all the Hebrews, and Lord over all the Nations round about, which were many and great; and had protected him from the hands of Saul, and had given him Wives, whom he had espoused lawfully, was so dishonoured by him, that he had taken another mans Wife, and caused her Husband to be slain. For which sins, he pronounced that he should be punished by God, and his Wives should be violated by one of his own Sons, who should likewise lay a snare for him so that he should suffer an open shame for the sin he had committed in secret. Moreover, (said he) the Son which thou shalt have by her, shall shortly die.

After the King had received this message, he was troubled, and wept, confessing that he had done wickedly: For before this time he had always feared God, and had never in his life offended him, but in the case of Urias: Whereupon after his submission, God was E appeased, and took compassion of him, promising him to continue both his life and Kingdom, and that he would be no more displeased with him, if he repented him of the sin he had committed. After Nathan had declared these things unto David he departed unto his own house. But God, according to the word of the Prophet, inflicted a grievous sickness on the Infant that was born by Bathsheba: For which cause the King was troubled, and for seven days space would eat no meat, although he was earnestly pressed thereunto by his Servants. He put on likewise a mourning habit, and clothed himself with Sackcloth, beseeching God that it would please him to grant him the child's life. But when the Infant was deceased about the 7th day of his sickness, his servants durst not let him know it, supposing that if it should come unto his ear, he would the more obstinately abstain from eating, F & his health would be endangered by his inordinate grief, considering he had so vehemently been afflicted for his sickness. But the King perceiving that his Servants were troubled, and that they concealed something from him, and gathering thereby that his Son was dead: He called unto him one of his officers, who certifying him of the truth, he arose and walked himself, and changed his rayment, and presented himself before the Tabernacle of God, and commanded that they should bring him meat that he might eat. Whereat his Friends and Servants wondered, and besought him that they might know the cause; he answered, while the child was alive, and I had hope of his recovery, I omitted no means whereby I might move God to mercy; but now after he is dead, it were in vain for me to spend my self with unnecessary grief. Which when they heard they approved the wisdom of the King. After this Bathsheba his Wife brought him a second Son, who was called Solomon. Mean while Joab closely besegged the Ammonites, and cut off their water and supplies of Provision; so that they were nigh famished for want of victuals

 Viduals: for they had only one little spring, so that they feared lest it would be suddenly H dry. He therefore wrote unto the King, and certified him of the state of the City, and exhorted him to come in person, and be present at the taking of it, to the intent that he might have the honour of taking the Town.

 The King understanding what Joab had written, commended his affection and fidelity; and taking with him all the forces which he had, he came to the taking in of Rabatha, which being carried by force, and the plunder given to his Soldiers, he reserved for himself the Crown of the King of the Ammonites, weighing a talent of Gold, in the midst whereof was enchafted a Sardonyx of great value, which David wore upon his head. He found likewise in that City divers spoils of great price: But the inhabitants he put to the Sword, and did the like in all the Cities of the Ammonites which he took by force. But after the King was returned unto Jerusalem, a great misfortune befel his family, upon this occasion. He had a Daughter which was a Virgin, fair and beautiful, and surpassed all other women in perfections, whose name was Thamar, born of the same Mother with Abalom. Of her, Amnon the eldest Son of David became enamoured: And because he could not enjoy her at his pleasure, he grew to melancholy, that his body dried up, and his colour changed through grief. A certain cousin and friend of his called Jonathan, perceiving his passion, and observing every day how Amnon's beauty and strength decayed, came unto him, and asked him the cause thereof, alleging that that indisposition of his seemed to proceed from some amorous affection. Which when Amnon confessed, and he how he was in love with his Sister by the Fathers side, Jonathan suggested to him the means how to compass his desires: For he persuaded him to counterfeit himself sick, and that if his Father came to visit him, he should desire him to send his sister to attend him, by which means he should easily be delivered of his sickness. This counsel of his was plausible in Amnon's ears, who presently counterfeited a sickness: and laid him down on his bed (as Jonathan had advised him) and when David came to visit him, he desired him to send his Sister unto him. When she came, he prayed her, that with her own hands, she would make some Cakes for him, because they would the more content him if they were of her own making: wherefore she in her Brothers presence tempered the flower, and made certain Cakes, and fried them in a Pan, and presented them unto him: But he tasted them not, but commanded all his Servants to retire out of his lodging, because he intended to take his rest without noise or trouble. As soon as this commandment of his was performed, he prayed his sister to bring the Meat into his inner Chamber: He followed her, and discovering his passion began to offer violence. But the Virgin crying out, endeavoured what she could, to disuade him from an action so sinful, and dishonourable to their family; or if he had not the power to resist the same, she advised him to require her at his Fathers hands, and not to take her honour from her by force. But he enraged with love, neglected all these sayings, and violated her, notwithstanding all her resistance. And as soon as he had satisfied his lustful desire, he would not suffer her to remain there until night, but thrust her out in the day time, to the end the might have her shame discovered: notwithstanding all these just reasons of hers, he commanded his Servant to drive her out. She being grieved at the outrage and violence that had been offered her, tore her Garment (which was such as the Noble and Princely Virgins were wont to wear) and strewed ashes on her head, running thorow the City with cries and lamentation, wherein she expressed what wrong had been done unto her. Her Brother Abalom met her and enquiring what evil had befallen her, she reported all the injury which her Brother Amnon had done her: Whereupon he exhorted her to pacify her self, and to suffer moderately whatsoever had befallen her; and not to suppose her self to be dishonoured by any act of her Brother. Whereupon she was somewhat pacified and remained a long time with her Brother Abalom unmarried.

Per. 13. Amnon persecuted his sister to fulfill his lust. Amnon notwithstanding his sister's resistance, violated her.
Per. 20, 21. Abalom comforted his sister Thamar.
Per. 24, 25. Abalom invited his father and brethren to his sheep-shearing, and commanded his servants to kill Amnon, being overcharged with wine and sleep.
David having intelligence of that which had hapned, was displeased, notwithstanding he loved Amnon very intirely, (because he was his eldest Son) and would not disquiet him: But Abalom hated him extremely, expecting some fit opportunity, wherein he might revenge himself on the Ravisher. Now when two years were expired since his sister was deflowered, it chanced that Abalom intending a sheep-shearing in Bethsebon, a City of the Tribe of Ephraim, invited his Father and Brethren to come to his Entertainment. But when the King refused to go, lest he might be chargeable unto him, Abalom pressed and persuaded him to send his brothers thither; which he granted. Hereupon Abalom commanded his servants, that when they should see Amnon charged with wine and sleep, they should suddenly (upon a sign given by him unto them) kill him, without fear or regard of any person.

2 Sam. 24. 1-5. Abalom, by the subtilty of a woman, and the letting on of Joab, is reconciled from banishment unto Jerusalem.
 After that Abalom's servants had thus executed his Commandment; a trouble and fear seized all the rest of his Brethren, inasmuch as they suspected their own persons: wherefore mounting themselves on Horseback, they posted all in haste towards their Father. But a Messenger who arrived before them, reported unto David, that Abalom had slain all his Sons. Who, surprized with the dreadful apprehension of so heinous a crime, in supposing that such a number of his Children should be slain, and that by their own Brother, neither enquired the cause, nor had patience to expect the confirmation of the report, but gave himself over to extreme grief; and renting his garments, laid him down on the earth, bewailing all his children, both those that were slain, as him also that had slain them. But Jonathan, the Son of Sama his Brother, exhorted him to moderate his passion, telling him, That he could not be persuaded that the rest of his children were slain, in that he could conceive no probable cause of conjecture. But as touching Amnon, there needed no question, for that it was very like that Abalom (by reason of the injury which was offered unto his sister Thamar) would hazard himself to kill him. Mean while a great trampling of Horses, and a confused Troop of Men brake off their discourse. These were the Kings Sons, who returned in Post from the Entertainment, the afflicted Father ran forth to embrace them, accompanying their tears with a heavy and sorrowful countenance: And seeing (beyond all hope) how they, whom a little before he supposed to be lost, returned in safety, they gave themselves over to tears and lamentations; the Brothers returned bewailed the loss of their Brother, and the King his murdered Son. But Abalom fled into Gessur (unto his Grandfather on the Mothers side, and Lord of that place) and sojourned with him three whole years: At the end whereof, David determined to send for his Son Abalom, not to punish him, but receive him into favour, (for the indignation he had conceived against him, was at that time abated:) Joab also furthered this resolution by all means possible: For he caused a certain old Woman, attired in mourning Habit, to present her self before David, who said unto him, That betwixt her two Sons that lived in the Country, there hapned such a difference, that falling to handy-strokes, they were so enraged one against the other, that not enduring to be parted, the one of them so wounded the other, that he died; and because her Relations were incensed against the Murderer, and sought without mercy, to deprive him of life, she humbly besought the King that he would give her her Sons life, and not deprive her of that only comfort of her old age; which he should bring to pass, if so be he prohibited those that would kill her son, from executing their intents: For except it were for fear of him, they would by no means be withdrawn from their fatal and bloody resolution. Now when the King had granted her Request, the Woman proceeded, I most humbly thank your Majesty, (said she) who have had compassion of mine age, and do so providently take care that I be not deprived of my Son; but that I may be the better assured of thy sincerity, I beseech thee (O King) first of all pacify thy displeasure conceived against thy Son, and be no more incensed against him: For how can I persuade my self that you will grant me this favor, if you your self continue your displeasure conceived, upon the like occasion, against your Son? For it is contrary to the Rules of Wisdom, to add to the irreparable loss of one Son, the voluntary deprivation of another. Upon these words, the King began to suspect that Joab had suborned this Woman; and understanding no less by the old Womans report, he sent for Joab, and told him, That he granted him that which he desired, commanding him to send for Abalom, assuring him that his displeasure was pacified, and choler asswaged. Joab cast himself down prostrate before the King, and returning him Thanks, he went unto Gessur, and brought Abalom from thence with him to Jerusalem. The King understanding that his Son was come, sent out a Messenger to meet him, commanding that as yet he should not presume to come into his presence, because he was not disposed to see him so suddenly. Whereupon he forebore to throw himself unto him, and went and dwelt amongst his own Friends, and Household Servants: Neither was his beauty any way decreased by the sorrow he had conceived, or for that his entertainment was far different from the quality of a Princes Son; but he rather exceeded, and grew more famous thereby: So that for beauty, and comeliness of person, he excelled all others: his Hair was so thick, that it could scarcely be polled in eight days, and weighed 200 shekels, which amount to five pound. He lived two years in Jerusalem, and was the Father of three Sons, and one Daughter, which Roboam the Son of Solomon afterwards took to Wife, of whom he begat a Son called Abia. In process of time, he sent Messengers unto Joab, to desire him that he would pacify his Father, and prevail with him to admit him him to his presence, that he might see him, and submit himself unto him. But receiving H no answer from Joab, he sent his servants, and commanded them to burn Joab's Corn-fields that joined unto his: Who hearing what had happened unto him, he came unto Abshalom, accusing him, and asking him, For what cause he had done him this injury? To whom Abshalom answered, I have (said he) invented this stratagem, to make thee come unto me, seeing thou tookst no notice of the Address, which I made, to desire thee to reconcile my Father unto me. And now, I beseech thee, that thou wilt move my Father in my behalf; otherwise, I shall think my return more grievous than my banishment hath been, if my Father shall yet continue his displeasure. Joab was persuaded through the compassion he conceived of the King, who was in his low him, and went and solicited the King, with whom he so effectually debated, as touching, Abshalom, that altering his disposition, he graciously sent and called for him. I As soon as he came unto his presence, Abshalom cast himself prostrate on the ground, asking pardon for his offences: But David raised and lifted him up, and promised that from thenceforth he would no more upbraid him with those misdeeds. After these things had thus fallen out, Abshalom within a little space, provided a great number of Horses and Chariots, and entertained fifty Men for his Guard, and every day early in the Morning presented himself before the Kings Palace, and talked with those that resorted thither about the trial of their differences: And whereas some of them lost their cause, he talked with them according as he found them affected, alleging, That his Father had no good Counsellors, and that perhaps he himself had in some things judged amiss: And by these means endeavoured he to get the good will of all men, telling them, That if he had the like authority, he would make them know by proof what his equity was. Having by these plausible persuasions drawn the hearts of the common People unto him, he was perwaded they would serve him in whatsoever he intended.

Four years after his reconciliation, he came to his Father David, desiring that he might go to Hebron, and sacrifice unto God, according as he had vowed at such time as he fled from his presence. Which request when David had granted him, he went thither, being attended with a great concourse of People, (by reason he had appointed divers to meet him in that place, amongst whom was Achitophel the Gelimite, one of David's Counsellors, and 200 others of Jerusalem, who altogether ignorant of his design, assembled themselves in that place to be assitant to his Sacrifice:) by all whom he was declared King, according as he himself had commanded. When the News hereof came unto David's ears, and he was assured how his Son had behaved himself; he was much troubled for his impiety and arrogance: That he should so soon forget his pardon, which he had obtained for his enormous Crimes; and, contrary to all Law, plunge himself, and hazard his Reputation in more grievous offences, to pervert the state of the Kingdom which God had established, to deprive his own Father of the Crown and Dignity; wherefore he resolved to flie to the other side of Jordan, carrying with him his most trusty Friends, to whom he represented the unbridled fury of his Son, remitting all things unto God, who judgeth all things; and leaving the Government of his Royal House to the management of his six Concubines, he departed from Jerusalem. He was accompanied with a great number of People, besides those 600 Soldiers, who had followed him in his Banishment during Saul's life-time. And although the High Priests, Abiathar and Sadoc, with all the Levites, had resolved to depart with him, yet perwaded he them to abide with the Ark, assuring them, that God would deliver them, although the Ark should continue in its place. He commanded Abiathar likewise to send him private intelligence of each occurrence that should happen, referring with him for most intimate and trusty Counsellors, Achimaaz the Son of Sadoc, and Jonathan the Son of Abiathar.

But Ethieth the Gittite, by no persuasions of the King, could be induced to stay, but contrary to his Command, followed him, whereby he more manifestly exprest his affection towards him. But as he went on his bare Feet up the Mountain of Olivet, and all they of his Train followed him, (intermixing their travel with bitter tears) a certain Messenger came and certified him, that Achitophel was with Abshalom. Which report aggravated and increased his grief: So that he besought God, that it might please him to alienate the Affection of Abshalom from Achitophel, that he might not give heed unto any of his counsels, because Achitophel was a Man of a ripe judgment, and ready execution in all that concerned him. As soon as he came unto the top of the Mountain, he beheld the City: And as if he had utterly been banished from his Kingdom, he began, with abundance of tears, to call upon God. There he met with Chusai, his sincere and unfeigned Friend, whom, when he beheld with his Garments rent, with ashes on his Head, and lamenting the unhappy change which he beheld, David comforted him, and exhorted him not to be discouraged, and besought him to return unto Abshalom, under colour that he had forsaken his part, where diligently prying into his secrets, he might oppose himself against Against Achitophel's counsels, because he could not do him so considerable service in attending on him, as he might in staying with Abshalom: Chusai being after this manner persuaded by David, returned back to Jerusalem, where presently after he met with Abshalom, who repaired thither. In the mean time David marching onward a little further, chanced to meet with Siba, Mephibosheth's Servant; and Purveyor of all those Goods which David had given him, (for he was Jonathan's Son, who was the Son of Saul). This Man drove before him two Asses laden with Victuals, which he presented to David and his company, to refresh themselves and being demanded, Where he had left Mephibosheth? In Jerusalem (said he) where he expected to be chosen King, through the occasion of those troubles that have happened, and in memory of the benefits that divers men had received at Saul's hands. David displeased with this false report, gave Siba all those riches which he had conferred upon Mephibosheth in times past, judging him more worthy of the same than Mephibosheth. Whereupon Siba was very well contented.

When David drew near unto a place which is called Babbar, a Kinman of Saul's, called Simei, the Son of Gera, came out against him, and cast stones at him, and reviled him; and the more David's friends invironed and defended him, the more obstinately persevered he in his reproofs and scandalous railings: calling him Murderer, and Captain of the wicked, charging him like an execrable Man, to get him out of the Kingdom; giving God thanks for that he had deprived him of his Kingdom, by the means of his own son, as a punishment for those Crimes which he had committed against his own Master. This his licentiousness, moved all David's followers to displeasure, so that all of them were ready to revenge them on Simei; and amongst the rest, Abshalom would have slain him: But David would not permit him, but commanded him to forbear: For fear

(said he) lest to our present miseries we annex a further and new occasion. Forasmuch as concerneth my self, I sit light by this mad Dog, and refer the matter to God, who hath permitted him to be thus desperately bent against us. Neither is it to be wondered at, that I suffer myself to be thus abused by him, since mine own son is so wicked, that he dares openly declare himself my mortal enemy: But God, through his goodness, will at length look upon us with an eye of mercy, and his justice will certainly confound all those that have conspired to my ruine. He therefore walked onward on his way, not caring what Simei said, who ran on the other side of the Mountain, railing and reviling him. When David was arrived on the bank of

Jordan, he mustered and refreshed his Army, who were wearied with their march: mean while Abshalom entering Jerusalem with Achitophel his Counsellor, was saluted and applauded by the concourse of the People; and amongst the rest, David's friend came unto him who prostrated himself before Abshalom's feet, wishing him along and happy Reign. Abshalom asked how it came to pass, that he who was reputed to be one of David's most intimate friends and esteemed always to be most loyal and faithful unto him, should at that time (when occasion served to exprest his loyalty) abandon him, and submit himself to his enemy? To whom Chusai answered readily, That it became him to follow God, and the good will of the people.

Since therefore (said he, my Sovereign) that both these are on your side, it concerneth me to follow you, because you have received the Kingdom from God: If therefore you shall think fit to account me amongst your friends, I will approve unto you my loyalty and affection in like manner, as to your knowledge I have done unto your father, who ought not to be displeased at that which hath happened, since the Kingdom is not removed into another house, but remaineth in his own family, because he who was his son received the same. By these words he reconciled himself to Abshalom, and removed all suspicion. Hereupon Achitophel was sent for to consult about their affairs in hand: who advised him to abuse all his fathers Concubines, and make them his own. For (said he) from that time forward, the people will believe that you and he will never be reconciled; and will be more ready to bear Arms, and oppose your father for your sake. For hitherto (said he) they have unwillingly professed themselves to be his Enemies, supposing lest a peace should be concluded betwixt the father and the son. Abshalom giving heed to this advice, caused a Tent or Royal Pavilion to be pitched in the sight of all the people, whereinto he entred, and enjoyed his father's Concubines: And thus was accomplished what was foretold by Nathan the Prophet.

C H A P. IX.

Abshalom's War against his Father's: his death, and the discomfiture of his Army.

When Abshalom had done that which Achitophel had advised him, he requested him once more to counsel him concerning that War which he had undertaken against his Father: who required 10000 chosen Men, by whose assistance he promised to kill David, and to bring all that were with him under his subjection: assuring him, that Abshalom's

Salon's Kingdom would be then established, when David's Head was cut off from his H Shoulders. This counsel pleased Absalon, whereupon he sent for Chusai, who was the chief est amongst David's Friends, (for so David himself had termed him) to whom he discovered the advice which Achitophel had given him, and required him to give his Opinion what he thought thereof: who knowing very well, that if Achitophel's counsel were followed, David would be in danger to be surprized and slain; enforced all his arguments and counsels to the contrary: For, (saith he) Sir, you are sufficiently informed both what your Father's valour is, and their virtue that accompany him; who hath fought many Battels, and hath returned victorious over all his Enemies. It is not to be doubted but that he is at this present encamped in the Field. For he is well exercised in leading Armies, to prevent any Stratagems whereby the Enemy may injure him; and about the Evening, he hath perhaps left a Party of his Men in some Straits, or placed them in Ambush behind some Rock: and if our Men shall assail him, his Soldiers will by little and little retire; and afterward recovering courage, by reason that the King shall be near unto them; they will charge us afresh; and during the encounter, your Father will suddenly break out of his Ambush, and encourage his own Men, and discomfort yours: wisely therefore examine mine advice, and if you find that it be good, neglect that which Achitophel hath given you. Therefore in my opinion (without following the advice of Achitophel) your Majesty ought to gather together all your Forces, and to take the command of them your self; without committing them to the conduct of any other, and by this means you may assuredly expect to have an easy Victory over him, if you assail him in the open Field, because he is accompanied with a very few men, and your self are attended by many thousands, who will be very forward to express their affection towards you at the beginning of your Reign, whereby you may easily rid you of your Enemy. And if so be your Father shut himself up in any City, we may easily take the same by Mines and Engines. This advice of his seemed to be better than that of Achitophel's, so that Absalon accepted it. For it was God that put this into his heart; to neglect Achitophel's and respect Chusai's counsel.

Ver. 14.
Chusai's counsel accepted: Achitophel's rejected.

Now when Chusai had thus prevailed, he presently went to the High Priests Sadee and Abiathar, acquainting them with Achitophel's designs, and how he had contradicted him; finally, how his opinion had taken place, giving them in charge to send private intelligence unto David thereof; and to inform him of his Sons Resolution; wishing him with all speed to pass over the River of Jordan, lest Absalon, being informed of his abode in that Place, should make haste and pursue him, and overtake him, before he might recover a place of security.

Ver. 15, 16.
Sadee and Abiathar's Son sent unto David.

The High Priests before-hand, had provided that their Sons should lie hid without the City, on purpose, that they might be sent unto David, to inform him how affairs went. They therefore sent a trusty Servant unto their Sons, who brought them news of Absalon's Intentions, with express commandment to inform the King thereof with all speed, who presently, upon this intelligence, like good and faithful Ministers, posted away, to report their Father's Message unto the King.

Ver. 17, 18, ad 22.
The High Priests Sons being pursued, are hidden by a Woman in a Pit.

But scarcely had they travelled two Furlongs, when certain Horsemen discovered them, and brought news thereof unto Absalon, who presently sent out Scouts to apprehend them: which when the Children of the High Priest perceived, they forsook the Highway, and retired into a certain Village near unto Jerusalem, which is called Beccura, where they besought a certain Woman to hide them, and shut them in some place of security, who let them down into a Well, and covered the mouth thereof with bundles of Wool. She being demanded by those that pursued them, Whether she saw them: denied the same, saying, That as soon as she had given them drink, they departed from her presently, assuring them, that if they presently pursued them, they might easily apprehend them: But after they had a long time followed, and could not find them, they returned from whence they came. The Woman perceiving that they were departed, and that there was no cause of fear, left the young Men should be surprized, the drew them out of the Pit, and set them on their way: who, with as great speed as was possible, repaired unto David, and declared unto him Absalon's Designs. Hereupon David passed the River Jordan with all his Men, and although it were night, he was not discouraged by the darkness.

Ver. 22.
David informed of Absalon's deliberation, passeth himself and his whole Army over Jordan by night.

Ver. 23.
Achitophel perceiving his counsel was despised, hung himself.

But Achitophel seeing that his counsel was rejected, took his Horse; and went unto his Country of Gelmone: there calling together his household Servants, he related unto them what advice he had given Absalon: which since he had not accepted, he told them that they should shortly find that he was a lost man, and that David would be victorious, and return into his Kingdom. It is better therefore, said he, for me, as it becometh a valiant man, to depart out of this life, than to submit my self to David's punishment, for having joined my self unto Absalon, and giving him counsel. This said he went into the most private of his House, and hung himself, being both his own Judge and Executioner; after which, his Kinsman cut him down, and buried him. But David having past Jordan came and

A and encamped in a strong City, the best fortified in that Country: there was he kindly entertained by all the Noblemen of that Country, partly moved thereunto by the man's present necessity, partly through the reverence of his former felicity. The chief before Christ of these were Bersillai the Galaadite, and Siplar the Governour of the Province of the Ammonites, and Machir, the Chief of the Country of Galaad, who supplied David and his Army with whatsoever they wanted: so that they lacked neither Beds, nor Bread, nor Fleth, but were plentifully stored with all things. They that were sick and wearied also, wanted nothing that either might serve for their repose or refecton. In this state remained he. But Absalon assembled a great multitude of people to make War upon his Father, and after he had passed Jordan, he pitched his Tents near unto his Father's, within the Country of Galaad, and made Amasa General of his Army, opposing him against Joab his Cousin: for Amasa was the Son of Jothar and Abigail, the Sister of Saravia, the Mother of Joab, both of them Sisters unto David. When David had mustered and numbered his Forces, and found that he had 40000 fighting Men, it was thought fit to put it forthwith to a Battel, and not to expect till Absalon should attack him.

He therefore appointed Colonels over thousands, and divided them into three Squadrons: the one of which he gave to Joab, the second to Abisai his Brother, and the third to Eliebi his familiar Friend (who was of the City of Geth). In this Battel his Friends would not permit him to be present, (and that upon good consideration, for they said That if they should be defeated in his company, they should utterly lose all hope: but if one Squadron should be overcome, the rest might have recourse unto him, who might unite and reinforce the rather, for that the Enemies would always think it likely, that he had some other Recruits with him. This counsel pleased him, for which cause he remained within the City. But at such time as he sent out his Friends unto the Battel, he besought them (that in remembrance of all the benefits and favours he had bestowed on them) they would both shew themselves courageous in the Fight, and that having obtained the Victory, they would spare his Son, for fear lest his death should increase and redouble his discontents. Thus praying God to give them Victory, he dismissed them to the Battel. But when Joab had placed his Army right over against the Enemy, and had extended them on the Plain, having a Wood upon their Back, Absalon also drew out his Army against him; so that D encountering one another, they performed many notable actions on both parts: the one hazarding themselves in all dangers, and employing all their affections, to the intent that David might recover his Kingdom: the others neither refusing to do or endure any thing, so that Absalon might not be deprived, or exposed to his Father's punishment and displeasure for his insolent attempt. Besides that, they held it an indignity for them, that being so great in number as they were, they should be overcome by such a handful of people, as followed Joab: thinking it an utter disgrace unto them, that being so many thousands of them in Arms, they should be discomfited by David's followers.

But Joab and his men being more skilful and trained in Feats of Arms than the rest, discomfited and brake Absalon's Army: so that they fled through Woods, and into strong E places. David's Souldiers pursuing after them, took some and slew others: so that both in Flight and Fight, a great number of them were put to the Sword: for there fell that day about 20000 Men. But all David's Troops freshly set upon Absalon, who was easily known by his Beauty and Stature: he fearing to be surprized by his Enemies, mounted upon a swift Mule, and fled in great haste. But by the swift motion of his Body, his Locks being scattered abroad, his Bush of Hair was intangled in a thick and branchy Tree, where he hung after a strange manner, and his Mule ran onward with great swiftness, as if he had as yet born her Matter on her Back: but he hanging by the Hair amidst the Branches, suddenly fell into his Enemies hands. This when a certain Soldier perceived, he brought news thereof unto Joab, who promised him to give him 50 sicles, if he would kill him.

F The Souldier answered, That if he would give him 2000, he would not commit such a murder on the Son of his Sovereign, the rather, for that in the presence of them all David had requested them to spare him. Hereupon Joab commanded him to shew him the place where he had seen Absalon hang: who had no sooner discovered him, but thrusting a Javelin to his heart, he slew him. That done, Joab's Esquires surrounded the Tree, took him down, and cast him into a deep Pit, they overwhelmed him with Stones: so that in appearance it seemed to be a Tomb or Monument. After this, when Joab had founded a retreat, he withdrew his Souldiers from Pursuit, as thinking it unnatural for one Countryman to imbrue his hands in the blood of another. Absalon had erected in the Royal Valley, two furlongs distant from Jerusalem, a Marble Pillar, with an Inscription upon it, to G the intent that if his Race should be extinct, his memory might be preserved by that Monument which he had erected. Now he had 3 Sons, and a daughter called Thamar, who was married to Roboam, David's Nephew, and had by him a Son called Abia, who succeeded his Father in the Kingdom; of whom we shall speak more at large.

CHAP. X.

The year of the World, 2900. before Christ's Nativity, 1044.

Ver. 21 ad 32. Chufai sent to certify David of the Victory.

After that Abfalon was slain, all the People returned privately to their own Houses; but Achimaas, the Son of the High-Priest Sadoe, drew near unto Joab, requiring him leave to repair unto David, and to certify him of the Victory, and how by God's help and providence he had vanquished his Enemies. This did the General deny him, telling him That it was not convenient that he, who heretofore was wont to bring joyful news, should now certify the King of his Son's death. He therefore commanded him to stay, and calling Chufai to his presence, he gave him commission to certify the King of that which he had seen. Achimaas requested him the second time that he would suffer him to go, promising him that he would make no mention but of the Victory: and that as touching Abfalon's death, he would not utter any thing, whereupon he dismissed him also, who choosing the shorter way, outstripped Chufai. Now as David sat in the Gate of the City, (expecting some Messenger that might certify him of the success of the Battle) one of the Sentinels perceiving Achimaas, that came running hastily, and not being able to distinguish who it was, told David that he saw a Messenger coming towards him: who answered, that it was some one that brought joyful news. Anon after, he told him that a certain other Messenger followed: to whom David answered likewise, that it was one that brought glad tidings. And when the Watchman perceived that it was Achimaas, Sadoe the High-Priest's Son, and that he was near at hand, he ran first of all and certified David: who was very glad thereof, saying, That he brought some good and desirable news touching the event of the Battle: and no sooner had the King spoken the word but Achimaas entred, and fell down upon his Face before David, to whom he reported that his Army had the Victory. Being afterwards demanded what was become of Abfalon? He answered, that he incontinently departed from the Camp, as soon as the Enemies were put to flight, but that a great number of Soldiers pursued Abfalon: and further then that he knew nothing, because by Joab's commandment he was speedily sent away to bring tidings of the Victory. When Chufai was come, and had humbled himself before the King, and had declared unto him the success of the Battle, the question was asked how Abfalon did? Whereunto he answered: The like fortune happen to all thine Enemies (O King) as hath hapned to Abfalon. These words quite extinguished the delight and joy that David conceived in the Victory, and the excess thereof much troubled his Servants; for the King ascending into the highest part of the City, bewailed his Son, beating his Breast, tearing his Hair, and afflicting himself after such a sort as cannot be expressed, and crying out in a mournful manner: My Son, (said he) would God, my Son, that I were dead with thee. For although of his own nature he was of a tender disposition, yet loved he Abfalon above all the rest of his Children.

Ver. 33. David hearing of Abfalon's death by Chufai, grievously bewailed him.

2 Sam. 19. 1, 2, 3. Joab and his Army enter the City in mournful manner.

Ver. 4 ad 8. David is careful for lamenting his Son, and upon Joab's persuasion persuadeth himself unto the People.

When the Army and Joab were informed that David lamented his Son in this sort, they had this respect unto him that they would not enter the City after a Triumphant and Victorious manner, but they entred hanging down their Heads, and weeping all of them most tenderly, as if they had returned from some Defeat. But when the King, having his Head covered, perlevered to bewail his Son, Joab entred into him, and said, O King, you consider not in this behaviour of yours, you dishonour your self: For it is to be thought that you hate those that love you, and expose themselves to all perils for your sake; yea, that you hate your self and your own succession: and that contrariwise, you love your most mortal Enemies most entirely, since you bewail them, when they are justly deprived of their lives. For if Abfalon had had the Victory, and had possessed the Kingdom, there had not any one of us been left alive that love you, but had all suffered death; nay, and in the first rank, your self and your own children; neither would they, being our Enemies, have lamented, but laughed at our deaths; yea, they would punish them likewise, who should have any compassion of our miseries: yet are you not ashamed to lament after this manner for a man that hated you, who, although he received his life from you, yet he shewed not that honour and respect which he was obliged to express towards a Father. Desist therefore from thy unjust lamentation, and offer thy self in presence to thy well deserving Soldiers, and give them thanks, that by their valour have obtained this Victory: otherwise if thou continue as thou hast begun, this day will I translate the Kingdom from thee, and give thee a more just occasion to lament than hitherto thou hast had. By these words Joab allayed the King's Lamentations, and drew him to the care of his Commonwealth; for cloathing himself in a Royal Habit whereby he might appear the more glorious unto his Soldiers he sat in the Gate: so that all the People hearing thereof, flocked out to salute him.

Whilest

Whilest these things past after this manner, they that remained alive of Abfalon's Army, returning home unto their houses, sent messengers to every Village, to remind them how many benefits they had received at David's hands, and how after many and grievous Wars, he had brought them to a secure liberty, and how unjustly they had revolted from him, and translated the Kingdom unto another. For which cause it behoved them, since he was dead whom they had chosen, to make their submission unto David, that he might be reconciled to them, and receive the people into his favor, and that according as heretofore, so now also, he would vouchsafe them his pardon and protection. David being informed of these things, by express Letters, commanded Sadoe and Abiathar the chief Priests, that they should certify the Princes of the Tribe of Juda, that it would be a great indignity for them, that other Tribes should prefer David to the Kingdom before them, especially since he was of their Tribe. In like manner he commanded them to speak with Amasa the General, and expostulate with him, why he who was his Nephew by the sisters side, did not persuade the Army to recommend the Kingdom to his hands: willing them to assure him, that he was not only to hope for pardon for that which was past, but also for the government of the whole Army, according as Abfalon had granted it unto him. Hereupon the High Priest not only conferred with the Princes, but also informed Amasa what the King had promised in his behalf, whereby they drew him to their party. And first of all, those of his own Tribe recalled David into his Kingdom; the rest of the Israelites, by their example, and Amasa's authority, did the like, and flocked from all parts, to congratulate his happy return to Jerusalem. But the Tribe of Juda signalled themselves above the rest, by going out as far as the bank of Jordan to meet him; with these came Simei the Son of Gera, with a thousand men, which he had brought with him of the Tribe of Benjamin; Siba likewise Saul's freeman came thither with his 15 Sons, and 20 Servants, who made a bridge over Jordan, that the King might the more easily pass over with his Army. As soon as he came unto Jordan, he was saluted by the Tribe of Juda: and Simei marched forward on the bridge, and prostrating himself at the Kings feet, asked pardon for his offences, and besought him to be reconciled: And that in recovering his Authority, he would not make him the first example of his justice, but that he should remember this also, that he had repented of his error, and did with the foremost march out to meet him upon his return. Whilest thus he besought the King, and lamented, Abifai, Joab's brother, spake after this manner: Why should he not dye that hath thus villainously reproached the King, whom God hath established? But David turned back unto him, and said, Ye Sons of Servia, will you never cease to promote new troubles, and to add new divisions to your former commotions? Know ye not that this is the first day of my Reign? For which cause I swear an oath that I will pardon all them that have committed any crime against me, and that no man shall depart from me without my pardon. For which cause be of good cheer Simei, and fear thou not that I will seek thy blood. Whereupon he cast himself down before the King, and afterward marched on his way. After this, Mephibosheth, Saul's Grandchild, came out to meet him, cloathed in mean apparel, having his Hair hanging down in a neglected and sorrowful manner. For since the time that David fled and forsook the City, he had been so afflicted, that he neither had trimmed his Hair, nor changed or cleaned his garment, supposing this calamity to touch him as nearly as it did the King: and he was the rather grieved, that Siba his Steward, had unjustly detracted from him, and accused him to the King. After he had prostrated himself, and adored the King, David asked him, For what cause he forsook him in his troubles, and offered not himself to accompany him in his flight? Who answered, That it was the wickedness of Siba, who was the cause thereof: for he, said he, being commanded to prepare my necessities for that journey, neglected the execution thereof, concerning both me and it, as if I had been some abject slave: otherwise, had I had the use of my feet, and the means to have waited on thee in thy journey, I had never endured to have forsaken thee. Neither was he contented to hinder me from performing my duty, and to give your Majesty a testimony of my affection and loyalty, but furthermore, he hath maliciously incensed your Majesty against me: yet know I well, that your wisdom will not give credit to his detractions, both for that you are just, as also for that GOD and Truth, which you only aspire to, are only beloved by you. For whereas during my Grandfathers days, you were always conversant amongst the greatest dangers, and persecuted by him; and whereas all our posterity by that means deserved to be utterly extinguished, yet have you used moderation and meekness in forgetting those indignities, when it was in your power to revenge them. And notwithstanding all these things, you have entertained me like your Friend, seated me at your Table, and dignified me with no less Honours, than if I had been one of your nearest Kinsmen. When David heard these things, he thought neither good to punish Mephibosheth, nor to examine whether Siba had wrongfully accused him; but after he had certified him, that he had given Siba all his Goods, yet did he pardon him, him, and promise him the restitution of half his possessions. Whereunto Mephibosheth replied, Let Siba possess the whole, it only sufficeth, that I see your Majesty restored again to your Kingdom. After this, David invited Berzillai the Galaadite (a virtuous man, and of great authority, and by whose bounty, during the time of his War, he was assisted, and who had attended him as far as Jordan) to accompany him unto Jerusalem, promising him to make no less account of him than of his Father, and assuring him that he would allow him all things that were suitable to his age and quality. But he being desirous to live in private, besought his Majesty to dismiss him from the Court, because (as he said) his age was so great as it made him unfit for pleasures, considering that he had attained to the age of fourscore years: Alledging, that it better became him to think of death, and his departure out of this World. For which cause he besought David to favour him so much, as that he might govern himself according to his own desire, because that by reason of his age he neither knew how to favour meat nor drink; besides, for that his hearing was lost, so that he could not distinguish or discern the sound of instruments, wherein they who converse in Kings Courts do most usually take such delight.

To this David replied, since (said he) thou dost so earnestly request me to give thee leave to depart from me, I dismiss thee: But leave thou thy Son Achimaas with me, that I may express that kindness unto him which thou hast deserved. Hereupon Berzillai left his Son with him, and taking leave of the King (with prayer that God would grant him the fulness of his desires) he returned to his own house. But David went unto Gilgal, (having already the half of the people with him, and the whole Tribe of Juda.) Thither resorted then unto him the chief governors of that country, attended by a great multitude of people, complaining unto the Tribe of Juda, for that unwitting to the rest they had resorted to him, when as by a mutual consent they should all of them have met him together. But the Princes of the Tribe of Juda requested them in no sort to misinterpret their prevention of them. For that by reason of their alliance, and being of the same Tribe with the King, they were obliged to shew him a more particular respect, neither for that diligence of theirs received they any reward, whereby they that came after should think themselves prejudiced. This answer of theirs the Princes of the Tribes took not in good part, but spake thus unto their brethren: We wonder (said they) that you only challenge the King to be your kinsman, as if he were not to be accounted an Ally unto us all, whom God hath equally placed to be Governour over us all; when as therefore the noble people consisteth of Eleven parts, you only are but one; besides, we are your elders: So that you have not dealt uprightly, in that you have secretly sought out the King, without giving us notice of your design. Whilst the Governours after this manner debated the matter, a certain wicked seditious person called Siba, the Son of Bochri, of the Tribe of Benjamin, standing up in the midst of the people, began to cry out with a loud voice, and exclaim after this manner: We have no part with David, nor inheritance with the Son of Jesse. This said, he sounded a Trumpet, and proclaimed War against the King, so that all men followed him, and forsook David. Only the Tribe of Juda remained with him, and established him in the Royal Throne in Jerusalem: upon his first coming thither he removed his Concubines (which his Son Abshalom had known) out of his Palace, and never after that time had any company with them. After this he declared Amasa General of the Army, and placed him in the same degree which Joab had, near unto the Person of the King; commanding him that he should assemble what forces he could out of the Tribe of Juda; and that within three days he should return unto him, to the end that having delivered him both the Army and the place of General, he might fend him to make War upon the Son of Bochri. After that Amasa was departed, and had employed his time in gathering up his Army; the King seeing that he failed to return upon the third day, told Joab that it was dangerous to permit Siba to gather a greater head by delay, and thereby breed more trouble and molestation than Abshalom had done. For which cause (said he) I say thou not, but take unto thee those forces which thou hast in readiness, and my six hundred men, with thy brother Abitai, and pursue thou the Enemy, and in what place soever thou meetest him, by all means endeavour to give him the Battle. Hasten therefore, and overtake him, lest he seize some of our strongest Cities, and thereby create us a greater trouble.

Joab with all expedition obeyed his commandment, and took with him the six hundred, and his Brother Abisai, and commanded all the forces that were in Jerusalem to follow after him, and marched in good order after Siba. When he came unto Gaboon (a Village about forty furlongs distant from Jerusalem) Amasa met him, with great forces. Joab having his Sword girt by his side, whilst Amasa came onward to salute him, he on purpose let his Sword slip out of his sheath, and taking it up from the ground with one hand, he drew near unto Amasa, under pretence to salute him, and taking him by the beard, he thrust

v. 9. 10. Joab killeth Amasa.

He thrust the Sword that was in his other hand into his belly, and slew him. Which action of his was heinous and detestable; proceeding from a jealousy he had conceived against a virtuous young man, one of great merit, and of great hopes, being his near Relation, who had in no sort offended him; but only by accepting the place of General, which the King had conferred on him; and because David had equalled him in honour with him; for which very cause heretofore he had slain Abner. Notwithstanding that act of his seemed in some sort more excusable; by reason of the wrong which he had pretended to be done unto his Brother Azab, yet was not this a sufficient colour to excuse the murder of Amasa. When this was done, he pursued Siba, and left a certain man to wait upon the body of Amasa, who had commandment given him to proclaim with a loud voice, I throw the whole army, that he was justly and deservedly slain; commanding those that favored the Kings title, to follow their General Joab, and his Brother Abisai, whilst his body lay thus in the way, and all the multitude (as it is usual in such like accidents) looked round about it, he that had charge of the body took it up, and bare it into a certain place out of the way, and covered it with a Garment: which done, all the people followed Joab.

Now whilst he pursued Siba thorow all the Region of the Israelites, he told him that he had retired himself into a certain strong City called Abelmacha; where he no sooner arrived, but that he begirt the City, and entrenched it round about, commanding his Soldiers to undermine and overthrow the walls: For he was much incensed because they had shut the gates against him. But a certain prudent woman, seeing her country in extreme peril, she went up to the top of the walls and called unto Joab; who coming forth unto her, she spake after this manner, God hath ordained Kings and Generals of Armies, to the end they might destroy the Enemies of the Hebrews, and plant amongst them an universal and perpetual peace: but you enforce your selves to destroy one of the chief Cities of Israel, that hath in no sort offended you. Joab declared, that far from any such design, he wished them all happiness and prosperity, and said, that for his own part it was not his meaning that any one of the City should die, neither his pretence to raze and deface so famous a City; his intent only was that if Siba the Son of Bochri and the Kings adversary were delivered into his hands, to do of the justice on him, he would raise the siege, and cause his Army to retire from thence. When the woman heard what Joab had said, she prayed him to stay a little while, promising him

Very speedily to cast his head over unto him. Whereupon the came down amongst the assembly of the Citizens, to whom she spake after this manner: Wretched men that you are, will you miserably suffer your Wives and Children to be slain for a wicked mans cause, and a stranger whom ye know not? will you admit him in the place of David your King, from whose hands you have received so many benefits? think you that one only City can resist so vast an Army? After this manner persuaded the them to cut off Siba's head, and to cast it into Joab's camp: Which done, Joab commanded the retreat to be sounded, and raised the siege; and returning back unto Jerusalem, was once more declared General of all the people. The King also appointed Benaja Captain of his Guards, and of six hundred Soldiers.

Adoram was made Treasurer to gather in the Tributes; Saphat and Achilais had the charge of Registers; Susa was made Secretary; Sadoc and Abiathar were made the High-Priests. After this, it hapned that the Country was afflicted with a famine: For which cause David besought God that he would have compassion on his people, and that it might please him to manifest not only the cause, but also the remedy of the malady.

The Prophets answered him, that God would be revenged of the wrong done to the Gibeonites whom King Saul had deceived and Traitorously slain, without respect of the oath, which the Governor Josiah and the Elders made unto them. If therefore he would suffer the Gibeonites to revenge the death of their slaughtered friends according to their desire, God had promised to be appeased, and to deliver the people from their imminent and present evils. As soon as he understood by the Prophets what God required, he sent unto their hands seven of Saul's Sons to take their revenge on them; Whereupon the King made search after them, only sparing and protecting Mephibosheth the Son of Jonathan. When the Gibeonites had laid hold of these seven, they executed them according to their pleasures: And thereupon God incontinently sent down Rain, and disposed the earth to bear fruit; allaying the drought, so that the Land of the Hebrews recovered again its former fruitfulness. Not long after, the King made War upon the Philistines, and vanquished them in a great Battle; but it so fell out, that the King hotly pursuing the chase, was left alone, and discovered in his weariness by one of the Enemies called Acmon, the Son of Arath of the race of the Giants, who beside his Sword had a javelin. O the point whereof weighed three hundred ficles, and a coat of Mail; this man turning back charged David very violently, with an intent to kill the King of his enemies, by reason that he saw him spent with travel. But about the same instant, Abisai, Joab's Brother, arrived in the place, who kept between them, and preserved the King, and slew his A Enemy. The whole Army, for a while, was very much concerned for the danger where- in the King had been; and the chief Captains obliged him to promise with an oath, that he would never, for the future, engage himself in person, lest he might fall into some disaster, by reason of his forwardness; and by that means should deprive the people of a most excellent Prince, whose wife conduct was the chief security of their happiness. The King having intelligence that the Philistines were assembled in the City of Gaza, sent out an Army against them, in which the Hittite, Sadoach one of David's chief Captains behaved himself very valiantly, and got great reputation: for he slew divers of them and pulled up with presumption of their valour, and was the chief author of that victory B which the Hebrews obtained.

After this last defeat, the Philistines once more hazarded their fortunes, against whom when David sent out an Army, Nephthai his kinsman shewed himself very valiant. For fighting hand to hand against him that was accounted the most valiant Champion amongst all the Philistines, he slew him; and put the rest to flight, very many of them dying in the Battel, in process of time they re-incamped near unto a City not far from the Frontiers of the Countrey of the Hebrews: In this Army there was a man six Cubits high, who had on either foot six toes; and on either hand six fingers. Against whom Jonathan the Son of Samai (one of those that were sent by David in this Army) fought hand to hand, and slew him: so that approving himself to be the means of that victory, C he bare away the honour of the Battel, and praise of his valour; for this Philistine boasted likewise that he was defended of the Race of the Giants. After this Battel, they warred no more on the Israelites. Hereupon David, delivered from War and danger, and ever after enjoying perfect peace, composed Odes and Hymns in praise of God, in divers kinds of verse: For some were Trimeters, other were Pentameters. He made Instruments also, and taught the Levites to praise God upon them, on the Sabbath days and other Feasts. The form of these Instruments was after this manner. The Viol was Composed of ten strings, and plaid upon with a bow. The Nable containeth twelve foends of cords and is stricken with the fingers. The Cymbals were large and made of Brass, of which it sufficeth, in this fort, to make some mention, lest the nature of those D Instruments should wholly be unknown. Now all those that were about the King were valiant men; but amongst all the rest, there were eight most notable and heroic men. The noble actions of five of which I will declare, which will give some specimen of that extraordinary and heroic courage by which they were able to conquer whole Nations: The first of them was Ifsem the Son of Achem, who having thrust himself into the midst of his disordered Enemies, never gave over fighting till he had slain nine hundred of them. After him was Eleazar the Son of Dodeias, who had accompanied the King in Sarphat: He, in a certain Battel (wherein through the multitude of the Enemies, the Israelites were affrighted and put to flight) kept his place, and faced the Enemy, and rushing in among them, made a great slaughter of them, so that thorow the E great quantity of blood which he shed, his Sword stuck fast to his hand; and the Israelites seeing the Philistines put to flight by him, came down and ran upon them, and obtained a great victory over them. For Eleazar slaughtered those that fled, and the rest of the Army followed and spoiled those that were slain. The third was the Son of Illu called Sebai, who fighting against the Philistines, in a place called the Jaw, (and seeing the Hebrews to be afraid of their power, and almost out of heart) resisted them alone, as if he had been an Army, and slew some of them, and pursued and put the rest to flight, in that they were unable to sustain his force and violence. These three performed, with their own hands, these great achievements. About that time that the King lived in Jerusalem, the Army of the Philistines came out to make War upon him; F and David (as we have declared heretofore) was gone up into the higher City to ask counsell, of God, what the event of that War should be; and the Enemies being encamp- ed in this Valley (that extendeth it self as far as Bethlehem, a City some twenty Furlongs distant from Jerusalem,) David said to his companions: There is very good water in the place where I was born, and especially that which is in the pit, which is near unto the gate; if any one will bring me of that water to drink, I shall esteem it more than if he gave me great riches. These three men hearing these words, instantly ran out, and past thorow the Enemies Camp, and went to Bethlehem; where having drawn water, they returned back unto the King, forcing their way through the midst of their Enemies, declaring that the Philistines being afraid of their hardiness, and great courage, kept themselves upon their guard, and dared not charge them; notwithstanding their small number. G But the King tasted not of this water which they brought him, saying, that it was bought

A with the danger of mens lives, and therefore that it was no reason that he should drink there- of, but he poured it out as an oblation unto God, giving him thanks because he had delivered his servants: After these three followed abisai Joab's Brother, who slew six hundred of the Enemy in one day. The fifth was Banai of the race of the Levites, who being defied by certain Brothers, famous amongst the Amalekites for their valour, overcame them. Moreover a certain Egyptian of a wonderful stature, having defied him (notwithstanding the said Banai was naked and the other Armed) yet charged he him, and took away his Javelin and slew him. To these fore said Acts of his, a man may annex this as the most valiant, or very nearly equalling the rest. For it came to pass, that after a certain Snow, a Lyon fell into a pit (whose mouth was so narrow, B that a man could not discern where it was, especially since it was at the same time cover- ed with Snow) where being inclosed, and seeing no means to escape, he roared out; which when Banai who passed that way heard, he followed the voice, and drew near unto the place; and afterwards went down into the pit, where with a staff he bear in his hand, he fought with, overcame and slew the Lyon. The thirty three other were of like valour and courage. But King David being desirous to know how many thousand men he could number amongst the people, and forgetting the Commandment or- dained by Moses (who had given order that if the people should be numbered, there should be paid unto God for every head half a shekel) he commanded Joab to go and number all the people: And although Joab represented it unto him as a thing C no ways necessary; yet could he not persuade him, but that he enjoyed him with all expedition to set forward on his way, and muster the people of the Hebrews.

Hereupon Joab took with him the principals of the Tribes and the Scribes, and went about the Countrey of the Hebrews, to know how many there were; and at the end of nine months and twenty days, he returned to Jerusalem to the King, and presented him with the list of the people, the Tribe of Benjamin only excepted (for he neither numbered that Tribe, nor the Tribe of Levi.) The King when it was now too late, per- ceiving that he had displeased God, was very sorrowful and penive. The number of the other Israelites was of 900 thousand men, able to bear Arms, and to follow the War, besides that the only Tribe of Judah contained 400 thousand men. When the D Prophets had certified David how God was displeased with him, he began to pray and beseech him, that it might please him to appease his wrath, and to pardon his offence. Hereupon God sent the Prophet Gad unto him, who brought him the choice of three things, willing him to make choice which of the three he would endure: either that Fa- mine for seven years space should reign in his Countreys; or that War for three Months space should afflict the same, wherein he should always have the worst; or that the Plague and Pestilence should rage for three days amongst the Hebrews. Being thus troubled by reason of his difficult choice, amongst these imminent Miseries; and the Prophet urging him to return a short Answer, whereby God might be satisfied: the King be- thinking him that if he should ask Famine, he should rather seem to respect his own E security, than the Common Wealth, in that no danger might by that means touch him, for that he had great store of Corn in his Barn, and they were unfurnished; and if for three months he would make choice to be overcome by the enemy: in that case also he might seem to have care of himself in that he had many strong Castles, and a valiant Guard of men, to attend his person; he therefore made choice of a Plague, that was both as incident to the Prince as the Subjects; wherein each man is equally concerned in the danger: saying, That it was better to fall into the hands of God, then into the hands of his enemies. When the Prophet had received this Answer from him, he reported it un- to God; who sent a Plague and mortality amongst the Hebrews, which afflicted them so variously, so that it was very hard to discern the Malady; which being but one F kind, yet notwithstanding it discovered it self with great variety of Symptomes. For one of them died after another, and the sickness seizing them unawares, brought a sudden dissolution of the Spirits, and swooning upon them; so that some of them gave up the Ghost with grievous torments, and strange dolours. Others were presently parched up through the burning Agonies they endured, and (irrecoverably by any Counsil or Re- medy) departed in the midst of their Tortures. Others died strangled, having their eyes suddenly darkned and blinded. Others giving order for the burial of their hou- shold servants, died before they were thoroughly interred; and from the day-break (at which time the pestilent Mortality began to rage) until dinner time, there died seven- thousand persons. And now had the Angel of God stretched out his hand over Jeru- G salem ready to inflict punishment thereon, when the King put on sack-cloth, and prostrated himself on the ground, beseeching God, that it would please him to appease his anger, and be content with the number of those that were already consumed with the Pesti- lence.

lence: Whilst thus he prayed; lifting up his eyes, he beheld the Angel of God hovering in the air over Jerusalem, with his naked Sword: whereupon he be sought God and said, That it was he that was the Shepherd, who had deserved to be punished, and not his flock; and ought to be spared, in that they had not any ways offended, praying him to satisfy his displeasure upon him and his posterity, and to spare the people.

Whereupon God giving ear unto his prayer, ceased the Plague, and sent the Prophet Gad unto him; commanding him that he should presently repair to the threshing-floor of Oronna the Jebusite, and there build an Altar, on which he should offer sacrifice unto God: Which when David understood, he neglected not this command, but went presently to the appointed place. When Oronna (as he was threshing his Corn) saw the King accompanied by his Sons coming towards him, he ran out to meet him, and humbled himself before him. This man was by Nation a Jebusite, and one of the greatest friends that David had (by means whereof he plundered him not at such time as the forefathers of the Jebusites was taken, as we have heretofore declared.) Oronna asked him for what cause his Lord came thus unto him, who was his Servant? David answered, that he was to purchase his threshing-floor, to the intent that he might build an Altar in that place, and offer sacrifice unto God. Oronna replied, that both his Floor, his Ploughs, and Oxen were the Kings to offer up for a burnt-sacrifice, beseeching God that he would graciously accept that offering. To this the King answered, that he commended his liberality and beneficence, and that he accepted the offer he had made him, yet that it was his pleasure that he should receive the price of the same, because he ought not to offer sacrifice unto God upon other mens charges. To this Oronna answered, that his Majesty might do as he pleased him: Hereupon he bought the foresaid Floor of him for fifty Sicles. Then erected he an Altar in this place, and offered sacrifice thereon, as well burnt-offerings as peace offerings: and by this means the Divine Majesty was appeased, and ever after shewed himself favourable. (Now this place was the very fame, whereto Abraham in times past had brought his Son Isaac to offer up for a burnt-sacrifice unto God; and as he was about to sacrifice him, a Weather upon the instant presented it self, unto the Altar, which Abraham offered up instead of his Son, as we have heretofore related) David seeing that God had heard his prayer, and favourably accepted his sacrifice, decreed that in that place the general Altar of the people should stand, and that on the very same Floor he would build a Temple unto God: which words of his, God afterwards ratified: For sending his Prophet unto him, he assured him that his Son that should succeed him, should build a Temple: After this Propheticall declaration, the King commanded to number the Inhabitants of Jerusalem, and it was found that there were one hundred and fourscore thousand men: of which number he appointed Helio & Rufinus, chap. 14. The workmen allotted for the building of the Temple. 1 Chron. 22. 2. 14. David gathered great store of Iron, Brass and Wood.

CHAP. XI. DAVID during his life-time, surrenders the Kingdom to SOLOMON.

THEN calling unto him his Son, Solomon, he charged him that after his decease, and in his own inheritance in the Kingdom, he should build a Temple unto God: Telling him that though he had both a will and intent to perform the same, yet that he was not permitted by God, because he had been a man of blood, and brought up in War. Adding further, that it was fore-prophecied unto him, that the finishing of that Edifice was by Gods appointment referred to his younger Son that should be called Solomon: whom God should not forsake and care for, than the Father doth the Son: and how the whole Land of the Hebrews should be made happy under this Prince; and among other benefits, that they should have peace (which is an especial blessing) and not only be freed from foreign Wars, but also from civil dissensions. For which cause (said he) since by God thou wert appointed King before thou wast born; take care to make thy self worthy so great an honour by thy piety, justice and fortitude, and keeping shofe his Ordinances and Laws: Which he gave us by Moses, and not permitting others to transgress the

the same. And as touching the Temple (which he will that thou shalt build when thou shalt obtain the Kingdom) take care to discharge that duty towards God: neither be thou dismayed, or afraid at the greatness of the work. For, before I shall depart out of this world, I will bestow all things in a readiness for thee. Know therefore that I have already gathered ten thousand talents of Gold, and an hundred thousand talents of Silver; and an incredible quantity of Brass and Iron, and of Stone and of Wood. Moreover thou shalt have many thousands of Masons and Carpenters, and if after this anything else shall be wanting, thou shalt thyself make provision thereof: Thou shalt hereby perform that which is most agreeable in the sight of God, and he shall be thy Sovereign and safe conductor. He exhorted also the Governors of the people to set to their helping hand, and yield their assistance to his Son in finishing this Work. B and in furthering the service of God without suspicion of any inconvenience; assuring them that they should enjoy a firm peace, and flourishing estate (such blessings as God bestoweth upon those that study after piety and justice.) Moreover he charged him to place the Ark within the Temple at such time as it should be finished, with all other sacred utensils, for the reception whereof the Temple should long since have been builded, had not their forefathers neglected Gods command, who had enjoyed them, that at such time as they should possess their Enemies Land, they should build him a Temple. These were Davids exhortations, not only unto his Son, but also to the other Princes.

Now when David was very old, so that by reason of his years his body was cold and benumbed, that notwithstanding the many coverings and clothes they laid upon him, yet could he not be warmed: it was the advice of his Physicians, that one of the fairest Virgins that was in the Country should be chosen to lie with the King: because by this means the might warm his chill limbs, and comfort his decaying heat. Whereupon after search made, they found out a Damself called Abisag, which surpassed all other in beauty, who slept with him and warmed him: for by reason of his age, he was unable to have the use of a woman. But of this Virgin hereafter we shall make further mention.

The fourth Son of David was a goodly tall young man, called Adonias, the Son of Aegistha, who (resembling Absalom in complexion and ambition) designed to make himself King: And amongst his ordinary discourses which he used to his friends, he said that the succession of the Crown belonged of right unto him. To this intent he prepared many Chariots and Horses, and fifty men to attend him for his Guard: His Father certified of these his proceedings, reproved him not, nor crossed his designs; nor demanded any account of his actions. Joab the General, and the High-Priest Abiathar, were engaged on his side, and stood firm to his interest; but they that opposed him, were the High-Priest Sadoc, and the Prophet Nathan, and Benaia the Captain of the Guard, with Simei, Davids friend; besides all other the Valiant Men at Arms. Whereas therefore Adonias made a Banquet without the City, and in the Suburbs near unto the Fountain of the Park-Royal, he invited all his Brethren unto the same, except Solomon; and took with him Joab and Abiathar, with the Governors of the Tribe of Juda: But as touching Sadoc, the Prophet Nathan, Benaia, and the rest of the contrary party, he called them not unto the banquet. This did the Prophet Nathan tell to Bethsabe, Solomons Mother, certifying her that Adonias was made King, without the knowledge of David, advising her both to have care of her own security, and the state and Majesty of her Son (who by reason of Adonias usurpation was like to be supplanted) withing her in person to certify the King thereof: And further promising, that while she debated these things with the King, he would come in the mean while and confirm that which he had said. Bethsabe being thus perswaded by Nathan, came unto the King, and humbling her self before him (and afterwards desiring leave to speak unto him) the informed him of all those things that had happened, according as she had been advised by the Prophet, particularly giving him an account of the banquet which Adonias had made, and what guests he had invited (namely Abiathar and Joab, with the rest of his Sons, except Solomon and his particular friends) urging this furthermore, that the people expected who it should be whom David would nominate to succeed him: For which cause she earnestly besought David that he would provide, that he who should succeed him in the Government, should neither seek her blood, nor the death of her Son Solomon. Whilst Bethsabe discoursed after this manner, the King had notice that Nathan attended to speak with him. Whereupon, David commanded that he should be called in, and as soon as he was entered; he asked the King if that day he had appointed Adonias to govern and succeed in the Kingdom after him? For that (said he) he hath made a sumptuous feast, whereunto he hath invited all thy Sons; but Solomon, thy eldest son, hath he called Joab: where after the great cheer and banquetting they have proclaimed and cried, Long live the King Adonias: Furthermore (said he) he hath neither invited me, nor the High Priest Sadoc, nor the Captain of the Guard Benaia: It therefore becometh thee to let us know, if this be done by thy approbation and allowance.

As soon as Nathan had made an end of his speech, David commanded that Bethshabe should be called in (who had retired out of the Kings Chamber, at such time as the Prophet entered in.) As soon as Bethshabe re-entered the Chamber, David said unto her, I swear unto thee by the great God, that thy Son Solomon shall reign after me, according as before this time I have already sworn unto thee, and he it is that shall sit upon my throne, yea even this present day. Upon these words Bethshabe humbled her self, and besought God to grant the King long life. Whereupon he called for Sadoe, the high-Priest, and Banaiia the Captain of the Guard, and appointed them to take the Prophet Nathan with them, and all the men at Arms that attended him in Court; charging them to mount his Son Solomon upon his Royal Mule; upon which only the King was wont to ride, and to conduct him out of the City, near unto the Fountain of Gethon: in which place (after they had appointed him with holy oyl) he willed them to proclaim Solomon King; commanding the High-Priest Sadoe, and the Prophet Nathan to see his will performed: charging those that followed him through the City, with sound of Trumpet, and a loud voice, to cry out, that Solomon was fitted for ever in his Fathers throne, to the intent that all the people might understand that by his Fathers consent he was declared King. And calling Solomon unto him, he gave him instructions, by which he might, with justice and integrity, govern the Tribe of Judah and the rest of the Israelites. After this, Banaiia besought God that it would please him to be favourable unto Solomon; and with all expedition Solomon was mounted upon the Kings Mule, and conducted out of the City near unto the Fountain; where (as it had been anointed with oyl) they brought him back again into the City with great joy and applause, wishing him a long and prosperous Government: then re-conducting him to the Kings Palace, they placed him on his throne; and the people generally gave themselves over to feasting and mirth and to sport, and joye with dances and Instruments of Musick; so that by reason of the multitude of Instruments, not only the air resounded, but the earth also seemed in a manner to be moved therewith. So that Adonias and they that banqueted with him, hearing the noise, were all of them troubled, and Joab in particular said, that those Tunes and Trumpetings did no ways please him.

Whilst thus they late at the Banquet, and every man thorough pensiveness forebore to eat (being distracted through variety of thoughts) Jonathan the Son of Abiathar came hastily in amongst them. This young man did Adonias most willingly behold, and said that he was a Messenger of some glad tidings: But contrariwise he recited unto them all that had befallen Solomon, or had been decreed by David. Whereupon Adonias, and all his Guests forsook the Banquet, and suddenly fled every man unto his own house. But Adonias fearing the Kings displeasure (by reason of his Ambition and Arrogancy) ran unto the Altar, and laying hold of it, after the manner of a Suppliant, hung thereon, according as he in reason had cause to do.

Now when these Tydings were brought unto Solomon, and what he had done, and how he required that Solomon would assure him, that he would never more call to memory that which had happened, but pardon his Offence: Solomon answered him graciously and moderately, and pardoned that fault; notwithstanding with this caution, that if hereafter it should appear that he intended or acted any Rebellion, it should be Adonias himself, who should be the Author of his Mischief: with this Answer he sent some to deliver him from the Altar.

When as therefore he came into Solomons presence, and had saluted him, he was commanded to repair home unto his house, without fearing any Mischief that might befall him: yet by the way was he admonished to behave himself uprightly for the time to come, if he respected his credit or profit.

But David willing that his Son should be accepted for their known and anointed King amongst the people, assembled the Governours in Jerusalem, with the Priests and Levites; and first of all taking the number of them, he found thirty three thousand men that were N above thirty three years old; 23002 of which he appointed to take charge of building of the Temple, six thousand to be Judges and Scribes, with the like number of Musicians to play upon Instruments, who were furnished therewith by David (as we have heretofore declared) and distributed by him accordingly to their Families. So that separating the Priests from the rest of their Tribe, he found four and twenty Families of them; sixteen of the house of Eleazar, and eight of the house of Ithamar, giving order that one only Family should officiate for the space of eight days. And thus were all the Families distributed by lot in the presence of David, of the High-Priest Sadoe and Abiathar, and of all the Governours. The first Family that went up to the Temple was enrolled first, the second next, and so successively the rest, to the number of 24. (and this order remaineth even unto this day.) He made also 24 divisions of the Tribe of Levi, (who ascended according as they were chosen by lot, in the same manner as the Priests, every Hevery eighth day.) He honoured in particular those of Moses posterity, for he appointed them to be keepers of Gods treasury, and of those presents which the Kings should offer. He appointed also, that all (as well Levites as Priests) should serve God day and night, according as they were commanded by Moses. That done, he distributed his whole Army into twelve companies, with their Governours, Centurions, and other field Officers: Every Squadron contained four and twenty thousand men, whom he appointed to guard and attend King Solomon, for the space of thirty dayes (continuing from the first to the last, with their Captains over Thousands, and Centurions.) He likewise established those men in Office and Authority over every Squadron, whom he knew to be most resolute and courageous. He appointed also Surveyors, who should have the charge of the treasure, of the burroughs and fields, and of the Cattel (whose names in mine opinion it were unnecessary to declare.) After that every one of these things were in this manner disposed, he summoned all the civil Magistrates of the Hebrews (and in general all those that had any commission over the affairs or domains of the Kings) to a general assembly, and placing himself on a high Throne, he spake after this manner: My brethren and countrymen, I am desirous that you should know, that having determined with my self to build a Temple unto God, I have made provision of a great quantity of Gold and Silver, the summe whereof mounteth to an hundred thousand talents: but God by the Prophet Nathan, hath forbidden me to build the same, by reason of your Wars, and because my hands have been stained with the slaughter of the Enemies, which I have conquered in so many Wars in which I have been engaged for the publick good and the interest of the State; but he hath commanded that my Son (who shall succeed me in my Kingdom) shall erect a Temple unto him. Now therefore, since you are satisfied that amongst the twelve sons of Jacob, Juda, by the general consent of them all, obtained the principality; and that I amongst my six brethren have been preferred and placed by God in the Kingdom, and notwithstanding no one of them supposeth himself to be injured: So do I also request that Solomon having obtained the Empire, my other sons should neither in respect of him nor amongst themselves nourish any unnatural hatreds and seditions, but knowing that he is chosen by God, they may willingly submit themselves to his dominion. For whereas if God shall think meet you ought patiently to submit yourselves to the yoke of a foreign Prince, how much greater reason have you to rejoice that God hath conferred this honour on one of your Brethren, whereof you also by your Proximity of blood may seem in some measure to partake. I desire nothing more than that Gods promises may be accomplished, and that the felicity which attendeth this Nation (under the Government of Solomon) may be durable. Which without doubt will so fall out, and all things shall happily succeed, if thou my Son be a maintainer of piety and justice, and the ancient Laws and ordinances of thy progenitors: otherwise, if these be neglected, there is no other thing to be expected, but misery and destruction. After he had finished these sayings, he gave his Son the model of the building of the Temple, with all the foundations: both of the houses and chambers, together with the number, height and breadth of the same. He also limited the weight of those vessels that were to be fashioned either of Gold or of Silver, exhorting him to employ all his care and diligence in performing the same. He encouraged likewise the governours and the Tribe of Levi to assist him, both because his years were not yet come to maturity, as also because by Gods divine providence he was elected King, and appointed to build the Temple, assuring them that the building would be very easie, and no ways laborious; considering that he had prepared a great number of talents of Gold, and far more of Silver, and Wood, besides a great multitude of Carpenters, and hewers of Stone, a great quantity likewise of Emeraulds, and other sort of precious Stones. Lastly, he told them, that now also for the present he would bestow on them, to that use, other three thousand talents of pure Gold, out of his own treasury to adorn the holy place, and the chariot of God, and the Cherubims, that should stand upon the Ark, and cover it with their wings.

N This speech of the Kings was received with great joy by all the Governours, Priests and Levites who hewed a greater readines, and voluntarily proffered to contribute towards the carrying on of this holy work five thousand talents of Gold, and ten thousand stateres, of Silver an hundred thousand, and of Iron many thousand talents; and if any one of them had a precious Stone, he brought it and delivered it into the Treasurers custody, who was called Jafur, being one of Moses posterity. This thing pleased all the people, and David (seeing the affection and readines of the Governours and Priests, and in general of all the rest) began to bless God with a loud voice, calling him the Creator and Father of this whole World, the fashioner both of divine and humane things, and the President and Governour of the Hebrews, whose Kingdom he had committed into his hands. After this, he prayed for all the people, that God would be pleased to continue his favors unto them, and to enrich the heart of his Son Solomon with all Princely virtue. He commanded the people likewise to sing praises unto God; which they

The next day as a sacrifice to God they offered up a thousand Calves, a thousand Rams, and a thousand Lambs, for a burnt-offering; and for peace offerings they flew many thousand other Beasts. The King celebrated a feast all that day with the whole people, and Solomon was anointed with Oil the second time, and proclaimed King. Sadoc also was established High Priest of all the people; and Solomon was conducted into the Kings house and placed in his Fathers Throne, and from that day forward they obeyed him.

CHAP. XII.

The last instructions of David to Solomon: his death, and the magnificence of his funeral.

NOT long after this, David failing through age, and knowing that he should depart out of this world, he called for Solomon his Son, and spake unto him after this manner: My Son, I must now depart and sleep with my Fathers, and enter the common way which both they that now live, and those which come after shall tread: from whence we shall not return, nor behold and revisit those things that are done in this life. For which cause, whilst I yet live and draw onward to my death, I earnestly exhort thee (as heretofore I have counselled thee) that thou behave thyself justly towards thy Subjects, and piously towards God, that hath honoured thee with this kingdom; charging thee to keep his precepts and Laws, which he hath given us by Moses, and to take heed, lest either surprized by flattery, or misled by favour, or seduced by covetousness, or any other sinister affection, thou be drawn to neglect and forsake the same: for thou canst by no means continue in Gods favour except thou keep his Laws, for otherwise he will withdraw his providence from thee. But if according to the obligation which lieth on you, you shall follow my counsel, and diligently perform your duty, thou shalt establish the Kingdom in our family; and no other house at any time but our own, shall obtain the dominion over the Hebrews. Remember likewise the iniquity of Joab, who, through emulation, slew two good and just Generals, Abner the Son of Ner, and Amasa the Son of Jethram; punish him as thou thinkest meet, for hitherto he hath escaped punishment, because he was stronger and more powerful than my self. I commend also unto thee the Sons of Berzillai the Galaadite, whom for my sake advance to honour, and dignity: Nor would I have thee esteem the Kindness which thou shalt show them to be any courtesy, but only a recompence and requital of the obligations which I have received from their Father in the time of my banishment, and for which he made us indebted to him. As touching Simci the Son of Gera, of the Tribe of Benjamin, who during the time of my flight, and at such time as I retired my self into my Camp, injured and reviled me, and afterwards came out to me near unto Jordan, and took assurance of me, that for that time I should not punish him: I leave him to you to be punished according as you shall find an opportunity.

After he had thus exhorted his Son, and had communicated with him all his affairs, both touching his friends, and those whom he thought worthy of punishment, he gave up the ghost (after he had lived seventy years, and Reigned in Hebron a City of Juda for the space of seven years and an half, and thirty three in Jerusalem over the whole Nation.) He was a just man, adorned with all virtue, requisite in a King that should govern so many Nations. For he was valiant beyond comparison, and in those battels which he fought to behave themselves valiantly, not commanding them like their Governour, but fighting with them as their fellow-fighter. He was very well qualified by his knowledge and experience to make the best use of the present, and to manage his future occasions: he was moderate and just, courteous and favourable to those that were afflicted; which are those ornaments which are worthy of a great Prince, and in this great Authority wherein he was placed, he kept not any ways awry, but in the case of Urias Wife. He left as much or rather more riches behind him, than any other King of the Hebrews, or other Nations had done. His Son Solomon buried him most Royally in Jerusalem, with all those ceremonies which were accustomed in Royal obsequies, and amongst other things, he buried a great quantity of riches with him; the incredible estimate whereof may be conjectured by that which followeth. For one thousand three hundred years after, the High-Priest Hircanus being besieged by Antiochus furnished the Religious (who was Demetrius's Son) and willing to gratify him with some sum of money (to the intent he might raise the siege, and remove his Army) and unable to levy money by any other means, he opened the Sepulchre of David, from whence he took three thousand talents, which he delivered to Antiochus, and by this means delivered the City from the siege (as we have declared in another place.) And again a long time after, this Herod also opened it, and took from thence a great sum. Nevertheless no man violated that part of the monument where the body of the King was laid, for it was so artificially hidden under ground, that it would be very difficult to discover it.

CHAP. I.

How Solomon obtaining the Kingdom, expelled his Enemies.

WE have declared in the former Book what David was, how great his virtue hath been, what profits and benefits those of his Nation received by him, what Wars he undertook, what Victories he obtained, and how happily at last (through extremity of age) he departed out of this life. But after that Solomon his Son (being at that time very young) had obtained the Kingdom, and was placed in his Fathers Throne (according as David had determined, and the divine power had decreed) the whole people (according to the common course in the election of new Princes) with many Acclamations wished him a long and prosperous Reign. But Adonias, who during his Fathers life-time, thought to possess and seize himself of the Royal estate, came unto the Kings mother, and with all humility and reverence saluted her. To whom Bathsheba said, That if there were any thing wherein she might serve him, he should let her know it, and that she would willingly apply her self unto it. Whereupon he began to say, That it was a thing very well known, that the Kingdom appertained unto him, both in regard of his age, as also in respect of the favor and good liking of the people: but since that it had been transferred unto Solomon, her Son, by the Will of God, he was content therewith, and would be his servant, being very glad of the fortunate success of his Affairs. He therefore besought her, that she would sollicite Solomon in his behalf, and persuade him to give him Abisag to Wife, who had slept with David for that he had not any carnal company with her by reason of his age, and that as yet she was fully possessed of her virginity.

Bathsheba promised him to further his suit to the uttermost of her power, and willingly to employ her self toward the accomplishment of the Marriage, since she knew the King was willing to gratify her in whatsoever he should desire, as also for that she would instantly intreat him: So that he departed from her with assured hope of good success in his designed Marriage. Whereupon Bathsheba presently addressed her self to the King, intending to certify him both what Adonias had requested, and what she had granted. When Solomon heard that his Mother came to visit him, he went out to meet her, and embraced her, and afterwards conducting her into his Presence-chamber, he sat him down, and commanded his servants to place a seat on his right hand, for his Mother; who being seated by him, spake unto him after this manner: My Son, vouchsafe me one favor that I shall request at thy hands, and send me not hence discontented, and dissatisfied through thy refusal. Solomon answered her, That she should command him; by reason that duty tyed him to the satisfaction and favor of his Mother's suits, reproving her for that intimation he had used, by reason that thereby she evidently expressed that she was not thoroughly assured to obtain her demand, but that she feared a refusal and repulse: he therefore required him to give the Damself Abisag for Wife to Adonias his Brother. The King displeased at this her suit, dismissed his Mother, alledging that Adonias had ill designs, signs, and that he wondered that in requiring Abisag to Wife, he had not requested Solomon likewise to give him place in the Kingdom: for Adonias was elder than he, and had more mighty friends than he had; namely, the General Joab, and the High-Priest Abiathar. For which cause he forthwith sent Benaia, Captain of his Guard, to kill Adonias his Brother. Then calling unto him the High-Priest Abiathar, The pains (said he) that thou hast endured by accompanying my father David, and attending and bearing the Ark with him, make thee escape from death; yet notwithstanding, for that thou hast been assiduous to Adonias, and followed his faction, I banish thee from my presence, charging thee not to see my face any more, but to retire thy self to thine own house, and there to live in thy Country, until thou hast ended thy days: since you have made your self unworthy of that charge whereunto you are entrusted. For this cause was the House of Ithamar deprived of the Priestly dignity (according as God had foretold Eli, one of the Ancestors of Abiathar) and translated to the Race of Phinees, and established in Sadoc. Those of the Race of Phinees, who led a private life all that time that the Priesthood remained in the Family of Ithamar (whereof Eli was the first) were these: Boccias, the Son of Joseph; Joabab, the Son of Boccias; Mareoth, the Son of Joabab; Aropha, the Son of Mareoth; Achitob, the Son of Aropha; Sadoc, the Son of Achitob, who was the first High Priest under King David.

Joab having heard of the death of Adonias, was very much surprized; for he loved him more than King Solomon: And by reason of that friendship which he bare unto him, he, upon good grounds, apprehended his own danger, and in this respect he fled unto the Altar, hoping in that place to be secured, in regard of that reverence which the King bare unto God. But when Joab's resolution was made known unto the King, he sent Benaia unto him, with Commission to bring him from the Altar, and to conduct him to the Judgment-seat, that he might in that place justify his actions: but Joab said, That he would never abandon the Temple, but that he had rather dye in that place than in another. When Benaia had certified the King of this his answer, he commanded him to cut off his Head in the same place, as he required, and that in that sort he should be punished, by reason of the two murders which he had curiously committed upon the persons of Abner and Amasa: Commanding that his body should be buried in the same place, to the end that his sins should never depart from his Race, and that both David and Solomon might be held guiltless of the death of those Men that had been murder'd by Joab. This command of the Benaia executed, and was afterward made General of the Men of War. Moreover the King established Sadoc solely in the place of Abiathar whom he had deposed. He commanded Simeï also to build him an House in Jerusalem, to keep himself therein, without passing the Brook of Cedron: For if he should break that commandment, the penalty which he should incur, should be no less than death; and to the more serious performance of this his injunction, he tyed him by a solemn oath. Simeï thanked Solomon for the charge he had imposed on him, and swore that he would fulfil the same: So that forsaking his own Country, he came and dwelt in Jerusalem, whereafter he had sojourned for the space of three years, it happened that he had news that two of his slaves had fled, and betaken themselves into Gath: Whereupon he went to find them out, and no sooner returned he back again with them, but that the King had intelligence that he had neglected his commandment; and which is more, that he had broken that oath which he made unto God: Which incensed him very much. Wherefore calling unto him, he spake after this manner: Hast thou not sworn (said he) that thou wilt not go out of this City to another place? And dost thou think it a small matter, to add Perjury to that other Villany which thou hast been guilty of, in so scandalously reproaching my father of blessed memory, when the rebellion of Abiathar compelled him to forsake the capital City of his Realm? Prepare thy self therefore to suffer the punishment which thou deservest, which shall be such as shall suffice to convince the Murtherer though the punishments of the wicked are oftentimes late, yet they are abundantly recompensed by their sureties and severity. Whereupon Benaia slew Simeï, according as he was commanded. From that day forward, Solomon had his Royal estate secured; and after that his enemies had received condign punishment, he took to wife the daughter of Pharaon King of Egypt, and afterwards builded the walls of Jerusalem, far larger and stronger than they were before: And all the rest of his life he governed his Commonwealth in peace, so that his youthful years hindered him not from the observation of Justice, and the maintenance of Laws, neither excluded the remembrance of that which his father had charged him at the hour of his death: But behaving himself in all things exactly, he executed the affairs of his Kingdom with that Circumspection, that such as excelled him in years, could not surpass him.

of the wisdom, Prudence, and Riches of Solomon, and how first of all he builded the Temple in Jerusalem.

AS soon as he came to Hebron, he determined to pay his Vows unto God, on that brazen Altar, which was erected by Moses, and sacrificed thereon in Burnt-offerings a thousand Head of Cattle; which honourable Devotion of his was most acceptable unto God. For the very same night he had appeared unto him in a dream, and commanded him to ask whatsoever blessing he thought fit, as a recompence of this his Piety. But Solomon required a most excellent thing, which God both liberally bestowed, and Men very happily receive. For he demanded neither Gold nor Silver, nor any other kind of Riches, (such as a youthful man would require) for these are only affected by the common sort, when the other are only worthy of the Divine Magnificence: But give me (said he) O Lord, a ripe Judgment, and a good Understanding, to the intent that by these means I may administer Justice to this people with truth and equity. With this demand of his God was well pleased, and promised him to give him all other things whereof he had made no mention, namely, Riches and Glory; and above all these, such an Understanding and Wisdom, as no King or private Man hath had before him. Moreover, that he would continue the Kingdom in his Family for many Ages, if he continued in the ways of Justice, and obeyed God in all things, and walked in his Fathers ways, and imitated his Virtues.

C After that Solomon had received these blessings from God, and was made happy by these Promises, he forsook his Bed, and worshipping God, returned unto Jerusalem, where he offered great Sacrifices before the Tabernacle, and magnificently feasted all those of his Household. About the same time a very difficult Case was brought him to decide, the Resolution whereof was very hard to be discovered. And I have thought it necessary to declare the occasions whereon at that present the debate was grounded, to the end that the Readers may understand the difficulty of the thing in question, and that if they happen at any time to be concerned in such affairs, they might by his example learn to discover the truth. Two Women of loose Life and Conversation came unto him, one of the which (who seemed to have suffered the injury) began after this manner:

D I, O King (said she) and this Woman, dwelt together in one Chamber; but so it fortune, that both of us on one day, and at the same hour, bare each of us a Son; some three days after we were delivered, this woman laying her Infant in sleep overlaid it, and stifled it, and hath taken my Child from between my knees, and laid it by her, and put the dead Child, whilst I slept, into my bosom. Now on the morrow, when I thought to give my Infant suck, I found not mine own, but perceived that her Child lay dead by me: for I knew it, because I had exactly marked it. This my Child I have demanded at her hands; and because I could not recover it, I have made my address unto your Majesty: for in that we were alone, and she is obstinate, and feareth not to be convicted by any, she persisteth in her denial of the same.

After the King had heard her request, he enquired of the other if she had any thing to answer to this Accusation. But she denying the Act, and averring that the Child which remained alive was hers, and that the dead one appertained to the other: and besides that, since no man appeared that might determine the Controversie, but all that stood by were amazed at the obscurity and difficulty of the Debate; the King at last found out this expedient of discovering the Truth: He commanded that both the Children should be brought before him as well the living as the dead; and calling one of his Guard unto him, he commanded him with his naked Sword, to cut both the Children into two parts, to the intent that both of them might take the half of the living, and the other half of the dead Child. This sentence of his at first seemed so ridiculous, that it was exploded by all that stood by. In the mean time the true Mother began to cry out; and desire that

F the matter might not pass so far, but rather that they should give the whole Child that was alive, unto the other: for that it sufficed her, so she might see him alive, though he might be supposed to be another. The other willingly consented to the division of the Infant; and moreover, required that the true Mother should be punished. But the King conjecturing by the discourse both of the one and of the other, which was the true Parent, adjudged the Infant unto her that opposed his death (for that in equity she was the true Mother) and condemned the wickedness of the other, who had murdered her own Child, and laboured as much as in her lay, to procure the death of her Companions innocent Infant. All the people took this Judgment for an assured proof and sign of the Kings Prudence and Wisdom, and from that time forwards, they respected and honoured him, as one that was endowed with a Divine Spirit. The Chierfains and Governors under him thorough all the Kingdom, were these: Uri governed the Country of Ephraim, wherein was comprised the Rule of Bethlehem; Aminadab commanded over the quarter of Dura, and

and the Sea-coast, and had espoused the Daughter of Solomon. The great Plain was subjected to Benaiia the Son of Achilai, who governed likewise all the Countrey that extended towards Jordan. Gaber commanded the Galadites and Gaulonites, as far as the Mountain Libanus, and had under him sixty great Cities and Forts. Achinadab governed all Gihlee as far as Sodon, and had espoused also one of Solomon's Daughters called Basma: Baradat presided over the Maritim Countrey near to the City of Arce: Saphat commanded the Mountains Itaby and Carmel, and the Land of Galilee as far as Jordan: Soudan governed the whole Land of the Beniamites: Tabar had all the Government on the other side of Jordan, and was elected Governour-general over them all. Thus about the time did the Hebrews wonderfully increase in Riches, and particularly the Tribe of Juda, by reason that the people addicted themselves wholly to the tilling and manuring of their Lands: For they were assured of their peace, and not distracted by any warlike Tumults, and besides that fruitfully enjoying a most desired liberty, they especially intended this thing only, to encrease their private Estates. The King also had other Governours who ruled the Syrians, and commanded other strange Nations, which are extended from Euphrates as far as Egypt, who gathered the Tribute of those Nations for the King. These Barbarians every day furnished the King for his own Table, and the maintenance of his Household, with thirty Measures of fine flower, and sixty of the courser: Ten fat Oxen, and twenty grags Beeves, with a hundred fat Lambs: All which things, besides Venison and Buffaloes taken in chase, Birds and Fish were furnished daily by the Barbarians to serve the Kings Household. He had likewise a great number of Chariots, so that he had forty thousand Mangers wherein his Horses fed; and besides these, he had twelve thousand Horsemen, half whereof kept always about the King in Jerusalem, the rest were billeted in divers Villages belonging to the Kings, and remained there. And they that had the charge to furnish the Kings Expences, provided likewise necessary Provender for the Wildom and Prudence which God had bestowed upon Solomon, that he surpassed all his Progenitors, and the Egyptians likewise, who are esteemed the wisest of all Men, were far behind him. For he excelled all those that in that time were in the greatest account amongst the Hebrews, whose names I will not omit; these were Eisan, Eban, Chai, and Dodan, all four the sons of Machol. He composed also 5000 Books of Odes and Songs, and 3000 Books of Parables and Similitudes; beginning from the Hyfion, unto the Cedar. The like did he of all living Creatures that feed on the earth, swim in the waters, or fly in the air; for none of their natures was he ignorant of: Neither had he omitted to search after their qualities in particular, and discoursed of them all, and had knowledge of their several and secret Properties. He obtained also the knowledge of the Art of Magick, for the profit and health of Men, and the exorcising and casting out of Devils; for he devised certain Incantations, whereby the diseased are cured, and left the method of Conjunction in Writing, whereby the Devils are enchanted and expelled: so that never more they dare return: And this kind of healing to this day, is very usual amongst those of our Nation. For I saw a certain private man amongst the Hebrews, by M name Eleazar, in the presence of Vespasian, his Sons, Tribunes, and other Soldiers, that cured divers that were possessed. And the manner of his Cure was this: He applied to the Nose of the Demoniack a Ring, under the Seal whereof was a root of those things that Solomon had declared, which drew the Devil out of the Nostrials of the Sick, as soon as he smelled the Root: And as soon as the Man was fallen, he adjured him never more to return, intermixing some mention of Solomon, and rehearsing those Incantations that were invented by him.

After this, the said Eleazar being desirous to shew unto them that were present, the efficacy of his Art, he set a Pot or Pitcher of Water not far from the place where the Possessed stood, and commanded the Devil at such time as he forsook the man, to overturn the Pot, and thereby to give a sign unto those that stood by, that he had forsaken the Possessed: which Act of his, manifestly declareth how great the Science and Wisdom of Solomon was. For which cause I thought good in this place to make mention thereof, that the worthy endowments of this King might be known unto all men; and how beloved of God he was, and how surpassing in all kinds of Virtue. When Adam King of Tyre understood that Solomon succeeded his Father in the Kingdom, he was glad thereof (for he was Davids friend) for which cause he sent Messengers unto him to salute him, and to congratulate his Succession to the Crown; by whom Solomon returned an Answer in these terms:

Solomon to Hiram the King: Know thou that my Father having a great desire to build a Temple unto God, hath been hindered from performing it, by the continual wars and Troubles he hath had: for he never took rest, before he either had defeated his enemies, or made them tributaries butaries unto him. For mine own part, I thank God for the peace which I possess, and that by the means thereof, I have opportunity (according to mine own desire) to build a Temple unto God: for he it is that foretold my Father, that his house should be builded during my reign. For which cause I pray you send some one of your skilfullest men with my servants to the mountain Libanus, to hew down trees in that place: For the Sidonians are more skilful in hewing and preparing timber, than our people are, and I will pay the Workmen according to your direction. When Hiram had read this Letter, he was very glad to peruse the Contents of the same, and wrote back again unto him to this effect:

The King Hiram unto King Solomon: Thou hast caused to thank God, that he had delivered thy fathers Kingdom (who was a wise and virtuous Prince) into thine hands. For which cause, since no news can come unto me more acceptable, I will accomplish all that thou requestest: for after I have caused a great quantity of Cedar and Cyprus wood to be cut down, I will send it thee by Sea by my servants; whom I will command (and furnish with convenient Vessels of burthen) to the end they may deliver the same in what place of thy Kingdom it shall best please thee, that afterwards thy Subjects may transport them to Jerusalem. And I desire that by way of exchange, you would furnish us with Corn, whereof we stand in need, because we inhabit an Island.

The Copies are yet at this day kept, not only by those of our Nation, but also by the Tyrians: So that if any man desire exactly to know what they be, let him search the publick Records of the Tyrians, and he shall find in them matters agreeing to that we have said. All which I say, to the end the Readers might be assured that I go not beyond the truth in any fort, and that I insert not in this History matters that are merely apparent and deceitful, and only fashioned for delight; neither fear I that any man shall examine my Writings, nor desire I likewise that every man give credit at the first sight to the same, or that I be held blameless in suffering my self any ways to vary, or improperly dilate ought in this History: but contrariwise, if I cannot approve the truth by sufficient Testimonies, I desire not to be allowed. As soon as Solomon had received these Letters from the King of the Tyrians, he praised his facility and benevolence, and presently sent him that which he demanded: Every year therefore he sent him two thousand measures of Wheat, and two thousand Baths of Oyl, and two thousand Baths of Wine (each Bath containing about 72 Quarts.) From that time forward, the friendship betwixt Hiram and Solomon increased more and more, so that both of them protested that it should continue for ever. The King ordered that thirty thousand Workmen should be provided, whom he gave in charge to work continually, allotting to each man his part. He ordained that ten thousand of them should cut Wood in Libanus for the space of one Month; and that then they should rest two Months, returning every man unto his own dwelling place, until such time as the twenty thousand had in their turn accomplished the Task in the time that was prefixed unto them, and then the first ten thousand renewed their work, and followed the same in the fourth Month. Adoram was constituted Superintendent over them. Besides these, there were seventy thousand men appointed to carry stones and wood, who were Strangers in that Countrey, according to the commandment of David. There were fourscore thousand Hewers of Stone, over which were 32000 Commissaries; these had the King commanded to cut the greatest stones, to make the foundation of the Temple: which after they had hewed and prepared in the Mountain, he commanded should be drawn and brought into the City, which was observed not only by his Country-men, but by those Workmen also that were sent him by Hiram.

Solomon began this building in the fourth year of His Reign, in the second Month, which the Macedonians call Artemisium, and the Hebrews Jar (which is the Month of April.) Five hundred ninety and two years after the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt, one thousand and twenty years since the arrival of Abraham in Mesopotamia: One thousand four hundred and forty years after the Deluge, and since Adam the first man until Solomon (who builded the Temple) all the years that are passed, have been Three thousand one hundred and two. But the beginning of the building of the Temple happened in the eleventh year of the reign of Hiram, who governed in Tyre: And since the first time that Tyre began to be inhabited, until the said building of the Temple, there passed two hundred and forty years. The King therefore laid the foundation of the Temple, and made a deep trench, and fortified it with most strong stones, which might be able to resist all the injuries of time. These stones were closely joyned the one unto the other, that by the strength of the foundation, they might make the base and ground, to sustain that which should be builded thereupon, which foundation was as much to be admired, as that Fabrick which it was designed to support: neither could the foundations be of less strength and hugeness, which were to sustain a sumptuous pile of that height, greatness, magnificence and ornament. The walls were made of white stone, and continued of the same matter even until the roof. The height of the Temple was sixty cubits, and the length as much, and the breadth twenty. Over that was another edifice, having the like dimensions, so that the whole height of the Temple was six score cubits, and the entry thereof was Eastward. The porch thereof had twenty cubits in length (which was the breadth of the Temple) and in breadth ten cubits; and the height thereof was six score cubits. About the Temple was built thirty Cells, which invironed the same on the outside, and served to sustain all the Edifice; for that they were of that number, and they passed out of the one into the other. The entries were made after the same manner, from whence a man might easily pass from the one to the other. Every one of these Cells had 25 Cubits in breadth, and as many in length, and 20 in height: And above them there were others built: And others likewise above these of like Number and Dimension; so that they were almost as high as the other buildings; they were all covered with Cedar: Every Cell had his cover apart, and had no dependence on the other Roofs. The rest of the building of the Temple was covered with long beams, mortized the one within the other, which sustained the whole: So that the walls being in this manner fastened the one unto the other, were the stronger. To these beams was fastened Waincoat of the same stuff, which was curiously polished, carved and gilded. The walls on the inside were covered with Cedar plants, intermixed with Gold: So that the Temple shined, and the burnished Gold dazzled their eyes that entered into it. All the whole building of the Temple was most artificially made of Stones most exactly carved, and most closely and cunningly joyned together: So that they that curiously pryed into the same, could not any ways observe the stroke of any Hammer nor other Workmans Tool, but all the whole Mass seemed to be a natural and no artificial cial frame; and rather growing in that place of it self, than garnished by the hands of cunning workmen. Touching the ascent into the highest part of the Temple, the King so contrived it, that in the thickness of the wall he included a pair of winding stairs to that purpose. This part had not a great Gate towards the East as the lower had, but in the sides there were little doots made: All the whole Temple both within and without was covered with Cedar-planks fastned together with strong chains to strengthen the same. The Temple within was divided into two parts, the one whereof contained the Santum Sanctorum, of twenty Cubits (which was unaccessible) the rest of the space of forty Cubits was consecrated to the use of the Priests. And in the midst of the wall made he two gates of Cedar, enriched with store of Gold, and divers curious carved works, and hung them with Tapistry: wherein were imbroided divers Flowers of Hyacinth, Purple, and Scarlet intermingled with pure white and delicate Linen. He placed also upon the Holy of Holies (which was twenty Cubits broad, and as many long) two Cherubins of massie Gold, each one five Cubits high; and each of them had two wings that were spread five Cubits broad, by which means they were not far distant the one from the other, but that the one of their wings touched the Southern wall of the sacred place, and the other the Northern wall: The other wings that touched one another served for a cover for the Ark, which was placed between them both. But what the figure of the Cherubins was, it is impossible to exprefs: He made the Pavement of the Temple also, of Plates of beaten Gold. To the Gate of the Temple he also fastned convenient doors twenty Cubits high, answerable in height to the wall, and covered with plates of Gold. In a word, he left not one place either within or without the Temple, that was not garnished with Gold: He likewise adorned the outside of the gates as he had done the inside. But the Gate of the Porch had no such ornament. After this, Solomon sent unto Eiram King of Tyre, for one who was a cunning Workman, called Uram, the Son of a woman of the line of Nephthali, and of Urias the Israelite; this man had great knowledge in all kind of works, but his especial excellency was in working Gold, Silver and Brass, who made all that which covered the Temple according as the King commanded. He made two Pillars of Brass four fingers thick and eighteen Cubits high, and twelve in the circumference, on the chapters of each of them, he placed Corniches in the form of Lillies, of five Cubits in height, which he invironed with certain Grates made of Brass after the manner of entrelaced nets, which covered the Lillies on each side, on which there hung down two hundred pomegranats in two ranks. These Pillars placed he in entrance of the Porch, the one on the right hand called Jachin, the other on the left called Boz. He founded also the Brazen Sea, made after the manner of a Hemisphere, and this vessel was called the Sea by reason of the hugeness thereof. For it was a laver that by measured line was ten Cubits broad, the thickness of a hands breadth, the midst thereof was sustained with a Pillar ten times twisted, whose bigness was a Cubit. This laver was sustained by 12 Heifers, which by three and three were placed directly opposite against the quarters of the four Winds: and the hinder most part of these Heifers were set somewhat slooping, to the end that this round and ample Vessel might be the more surely supported by them. This Sea contained two thousand Baths, which is a measure made use of for liquids. He made also ten brazen bafes four square, for the lavers, each one in length five Cubits, in breadth four, in height three; thus were the parts of this work severally fashioned. There were four little Pillars square and erected at every corner one, in which the sides of the Bafes were adjoyned, and divided into three forts, according to the place distinguished between the joyns; with Images, here a Lyon, there a Bull, and in another place an Eagle. The Pillars likewise were adorned with the same engraving; and all this whole work hung upon four wheels, which were made of cast work, which had certain naves or spokes a Cubit and a half in the Diameter: and it was a wonderful thing to see the circumferences of them, how cunningly they were wrought, and properly tyled to the sides of the Bafes by their naves, or strakes. They were thus made: the corners or Angles on the upper part were sustained by certain shoulders made after the manner of extended hands, on which there was placed a Spire, to which the laver was fastned, being upheld by the paws of a Lyon, and an Eagle, which were fashioned and so properly united, that they that beheld them, would have supposed them rather to be natural creatures, than otherwise: and betwixt them also there were certain Palm-trees figured: Such was the composition of the ten lavers. Moreover, he made ten other Brazen lavers after the manner of a round Cockleshell, each of which contained forty Choes: for they were in height four cubits, and from brim to brim, there were likewise four cubits: which lavers he placed upon ten bafes or feet called Meconoth, five of which stood on the left side of the Temple, that extended Northward, the other five on the right hand toward the South. Here likewise placed he the Sea full of Water, to the intent that the Priests entering into the Temple, might wash their hands and feet before they went up upon the Altar. The other lavens served to wash the inwards and feet of those Beasts A that were sacrificed. He builded likewise a brazen Altar of twenty Cubits long, and as many in breadth, and ten in height, to offer burnt-offerings thereon. He made likewise all the Vessels that belonged thereto of Brass: as Kettles, Water-pots, Hooks, and Forks, and such like, that in brightness equalled the pure Gold. The King also dedicated many Tables, and amongst these, one great one of Gold (on which the Sacred Bread was laid) the rest not far inferior, yet made after divers manners, held Ewers and Platters of Gold, to the number of twenty thousand, and of Silver forty thousand. He made likewise ten thousand Candlesticks (according as Moses had commanded) whereof one he dedicated to the Temple; that according to the Law it might give light there in the day time. He made a Table also, on which the Loves of Bread were laid on the B North-side of the Temple, hard by the Candlesticks, which were placed towards the South.

The Altar of Gold was placed betwixt them both. All which things were inclosed in the part of the Temple that contained forty Cubits, before the Tabernacle of the Holy of Holies, where the Ark was to be placed. The King also caused fourscore thousand Pots, and an hundred thousand Ewers of Gold, and twice as many of Silver to be made, and fourscore thousand plates of Gold, and twice so many of Silver to offer the kneaded flower in them upon the Altar; and threecore thousand Cups of Gold, and twice so many of Silver, to lay the Flour mingled with Oyl thereon; and two thousand measures of Gold, and twenty thousand of Silver, wherein the perfume was burnt, to hallow the Temple; C thousand Censers also of Gold, wherein the perfume was burnt, to hallow the Temple; and other Censers likewise in which they carried fire from the great Altar, and laid it on the lesser, which was within the Temple, to the number of fifty thousand; he prepared also a thousand Vestments for the use of the Priests, with their surcoats, heads, and pectorals, notwithstanding there was but one Crown, wherein Moses had written the Name of God, which had continued even until this day. He made also ten thousand Stoles for the Priests of fine Linen, with scarlet Girdles for every one of them; two hundred thousand trumpets according to the ordinance of Moses, and forty thousand Instruments of Musick, to record and praise God with (as the Ptery and Harp of a mixt matter of the fifth part of Gold, and the fourth part Silver.) All which Solomon most magnificently prepared for the Service of God, sparing no cost, but employing himself to the utmost D of his power, toward the ornament of the Temple; which he beautified and endowed with all these Treasures. He invironed the Temple likewise with a wall three Cubits high, which in our Tongue we call Gison, to exclude the prophane multitude, and admit none but the Priests only. Without this wall there stood a Temple four-square with great and broad Idles; which opened with very great Gates; every one according to the quarter of the wind; and the doors thereof were covered with Gold. Into this place all the people that were purified might enter, and they likewise that kept the ordinances of Moses. It can scarcely be believed how admirable that exterior Temple was:
for he filled huge Trenches, which by reason of their unmeasurable depth, could not be lookt down into without vehement apprehension of fear (for they were four hundred Cubits deep) yet notwithstanding he filled them and raised them to the height of the E Hill, whereon the Temple was built; and by this means it came to pass, that the walk without the Temple was equalled with the Foundation of the same. This did he begin with double Porches, sustained by Pillars of rich stone; the Roofs whereof were of polish Cedar, and the Gates were of Massive Silver.

After that King Solomon had in seven years finished these so fair and magnificent buildings, and all the other necessities which he had bestowed upon the Temple, and declared thereby his great Riches, and shewed his Power, that that which at the first fight might require a mans whole Life to finish, he accomplished in few years: He wrote unto the Governours and Elders of the Hebrews, commanding them to assemble all the people in Jerusalem to behold the Temple, and to bring in the Ark of God: And al- F though this Assembly was publicly proclaimed, yet scarcely did the people make their appearance in Jerusalem before the seventh month which we call Thuri, and the Mace- donians Hyperbete. About this time fell the feast of Tabernacles, which the Hebrews most Religiously observe and honour with great Festivals. They therefore took the Ark and the Tabernacle that Moses had made, with all those necessities which appertained to the Divine Service, and bare them into the Temple. The King and all the people, with the Levites marched before, having their Cattel ready to sacrifice, and filling the way with offerings, and the blood of divers slaughtered beasts, burning an infinite quantity of perfumes, wherewith the Air was filled round about, the scent whereof dispersed it self far and near, to make it known that God would be present in that new builded G and consecrated place (if we may so speak of divine things after a humane manner.)
These ceased not to sing and dance until they came unto the Temple; and after this fort con-

He conducted thby the Ark. But when it was to be carried into the Holy of Holies, the rest of the multitude departed; and the Priest only placed it under the two Cherubims; who embraced it with their wings, as if it had been covered with a Pavilion or some Canopy:
for they had been fashioned after that manner by the Workmen. The Ark contained nought else but the two Tables of Stone, in which were kept in Writing the Ten Commandments pronounced by God on Mount Sinal. For as touching the Candlestick, and the Table and Altar of Gold, he placed them in the Temple before the most Holy of Holies; in places correspondent to those where they stood, when they were in the Tabernacle. Then offered they the ordinary sacrifices, and placed the brazen Altar before the Temple near unto the Gate: So that when it was opened, the other stood in sight, and a man might see the service and magnificence that was used in the sacrifices. And as touching the other utensils, he gathered them all together, and placed them in the Temple: But after the Priests (having given order for all things about the Ark) were departed from thence, suddenly there fell amidst the Sanctuary a thick Cloud, not pitchy, nor such as re-sembleth Winter Clouds laden with rain; but diffused, and renniss, which darkened the sight of the Priests so that they saw not one another. But thereby every mans mind was easily induced to believe, and his opinion confirmed, that God was descended into the Temple which was dedicated to his Name, to testify how acceptable it was to his divine Majesty: In effect all men had no other opinion: But King Solomon arising from his Throne whereon he was seated, addressed his Prayers unto God, in such words as he thought to be agreeable to the divine Nature, and convenient for him to use: O Lord (said he) thou hast an eternal house, neither are we ignorant that thou hast framed thy whole mass of the Universe for thy self; which consisteth of Heaven, Earth, Air, and Sea:
which thou altogether fillest, yet art thou not contained by them. But therefore have we adored and erected this Temple to thy Name, to the end that we might offer up our Prayers in the same, and send them up to heaven (as a sweet sacrifice) to obtain thy favour, assuring our selves that thou art here present also; and wilt never be absent from this place. For whereas thou see'st all things, hearest all things, yet forsakest thou not us at all, neither dost thou abandon the place where thou dost inhabit: but rather thou art always near unto all men, but in especial present with those that do humbly desire to approach unto thee day and night. These words spake he, looking upwards towards God, and afterwards addressing himself unto the people, he spake unto them touching his power and providence, how he had foretold his father David of all this which should happen: The greater part whereof was already accomplished, and the rest was shortly to succeed.
Furthermore he declared how God himself had given him his name before he was born, and that it was known how he should be called: and how at such time as he should be King after the decease of his father, he should build him a Temple; which things they saw brought to pass according as they were foretold; for which they ought to give God thanks, and not to lose any hope of any of those things that had been promised them for their future happiness, having sufficient encouragement to believe by the accomplishment of those things which were already come to pass.

When the King had spoken after this manner unto the people, he turned again, and beheld the Temple, and lifting up his hands towards the people, he began thus: It is impossible (said he) for men to return thanks unto God according to the greatness of those benefits which they have received, for he is by his infinite greatness placed so far above us that our Oblations are altogether unprofitable unto him. But (O Lord) it becometh us, that since of thy grace thou hast made us more excellent than other living creatures, we should bless and give thanks unto thy Majesty, and in special it concerneth us to honour thee for the benefits thou hast bestowed on our Family, and all the Hebrew Nation. But by what other means can we appeale thee when thou art displeased, than by that voice which we draw from the Air, and which returneth into the air again; I ought therefore first of all to give thee thanks in respect of my Father, whom from a low degree thou hast raised to the highest honour: Next that thou N hast fulfilled all those things which thou hast foretold of me until this present day; I beseech thee for the time to come to furnish me with those things, that thou bestowest on such as are dear unto thee, that thou increase our house every way, according as thou hast promised my Father David, establish the Crown on my Head, and continue it I beseech thee, to my successors, for many Generations. Beslow thou this benefit upon us, and bequeath unto all mine, that spirit wherein thou takest delight. Moreover I beseech thee that a portion of thy Spirit may come and dwell in the Temple, to the intent that we may understand that thou dwellest upon earth; for not only this Temple, but the whole heavens are too little for thy habitation. I beseech thee therefore, that it may please thee to take care of it as thine own, to the end it may never be destroyed by the enemy, but that thou mayest always secure it, as thine own peculiar inheritance.
O And if thy people shall at any time forget thy name, and offend against thy Majesty, let it suffice,
I beseech thee, to chastise them with famine or pestilence, or such other calamities, as thou art wont to inflict on the disobedient; but when they shall be touched with repentance for their former sins, and have recourse unto this Temple, and beseech thy mercy; hear them I beseech thee,

 Neither did I only intreat thee for the Hebrews when they shall have offended thee: but if on all the World. This said, he cast himself on his face, and continued in Prayer a long time, and afterwards rising again, he offered sacrifices upon the Altar; and having filled the Temple with offerings, he knew most evidently that God did graciously accept of his oblations; for a fire passing through the Air, and lighting upon the Altar in the sight of all men, consumed and devoured the sacrifice. When this Vision had happened, the people manifestly conjectured that Gods abode should be in that Temple, and with great joy humbled themselves on their faces, and lay prostrate on the Pavement. But the King began to praise God, and incited the people to do the like, considering they had already received the testimonies of his mercy, exhorting them to pray that he would be always merciful unto them, and that he would keep them for ever in cleanness and uncorrupt minds, and that they might justly and religiously lead their lives in observing those commandments which he had given them by Moses. For in so doing, the people of the Hebrews should prosper and grow more happy than all the Nations of the World. Moreover he exhorted them to keep in their remembrance those means, by which the benefits they possessed had been gotten; assuring them that by the same they should be continued, increased and multiplied. For they ought to think that they received them not, but for their piety and justice; and that those blessings were not to be preserved, but by the same means by which they were first required. When the King had spoken after this manner to the people, he dismissed the Assembly (having first of all accomplished the sacrifices both for himself and the people, by offering up twelve thousand Oxen, and six-score thousand sheep.) For then first of all was the Temple embrewed with the blood of the slaughtered sacrifices, and all the Hebrews with their Wives and Children were entertained therein. The King also feasting with the whole people, celebrated the Solemnity of the Tabernacles for the space of fourteen days in great Pomp and Magnificence. And when all things were performed, and nothing was deficient that concerned the Service of God, every one (dismissed by the King) departed to his own dwelling-place, giving him hearty thanks for the care he had taken of them, and for the Works he had done for them; praying God that it might please him to grant their King a long life.

 And thus they returned home with joy, praising and singing Hymns unto God, to that they arrived at their own habitations, without being sensible of the toil of their Journey.

After they had conducted the Ark into the Temple, and beheld the greatness and beauty of the same, and had celebrated most excellent sacrifices, and made great solemnities, they returned every one unto his City. But a Vision that night appeared unto the King during his sleep, which gave him assurance that God had heard his Prayer, and that he would guard his Temple and dwell in the same for ever (if his Posterity and all the people should observe his Commandments) promising him, that if he continued in the observation of those commands which were given him by his Father, he would secure his blessing unto him, that none but his Posterity should sway the Scepter, and rule over the Tribe of Judah for ever; provided that they kept his Statutes and observed his Law: but if he forgot the Lord and followed strange gods, he would pluck him up by the roots, without leaving any Remainder to reign after him; neither should the people of Israel remain unpunished, but should be exterminate by infinite Wars and Adversities, and be cast out of the Country which he had given unto their Ancestors, and become banish-men, and Runagates in a foreign Land. And concerning the Temple which is built at this present, I will (said he) deliver it to the Enemies to ransack and burn it, and the City shall be destroyed by the hands of the Enemies: And their miseries shall be so numerous through the World, and to such extremity shall they be driven, as it shall hardly be believed: so as their Neighbours round about them, hearing of their Calamities, shall be astonished, and shall seek out the cause why the Hebrews are thus hated by God, who before time have been so advanced by him in Riches and Honours, and they shall be informed by those that survive, that those calamities are brought upon them by their sins; and the transgressions which they have committed against the ordinances of their Forefathers.

These things that were declared unto him in a dream, are registred in the sacred Letters.
 Seven years after the Temple had been thus built (as it hath been heretofore declared) he began the building of his Palace, which he scarcely finished in thirteen years space; for he was not so intent and earnest in building thereof, as he was in the structure of the Temple. For although the Temple was very great, and of incredible and marvelous magnificence, yet to it that God (for whom it was made) assisting the workmen, it was thoroughly

A thoroughly finished within the term of the years aforesaid. But the Royal Palaces, being far less than the Temple, were built more slowly, because the stuff had not been prepared so long time before, nor with so great diligence; and the rather, because the Palaces that were, were not for God, but for Kings: notwithstanding, this House was built very magnificently, according as the Wealth of the Country, and the power of the Hebrew King required. But it will not be amiss if I declare all the order and disposition of the same House, that by the description thereof, the Reader may be informed of its capaciousness. It was a great and goodly Fabric, sustained by divers Pillars, prepared to receive and contain much people at the time of their Assemblies, wherein they treated of Affairs, and held Pleas. It was an hundred Cubits in length, and in breadth fifty; and in height thirty, supported by sixteen square Pillars covered with Corinthian work, with stairs and carved gates, which contributed no less to its beauty, than its security.

In the midst of this space, and hard by the Temple, there was another Pavilion thirty cubits square, sustained with strong Pillars, within which there was another magnificent Tribunal, on which the King fate to give Judgment, unto which there was adjoined another Palace prepared for the Queen. All the Chambers, as well those that were ordinarily in use, as those for Recreation, after he had retired himself from publick Affairs, were adorned with planks of carved Cedar, and were built partly of stone ten Cubits square, partly of curious Marble, and very rarely and cunningly wrought by the most curious and exact Masons. And that which made it more beautiful, were three panes of Tapitry, and the fourth admirable for the artificial Engravings: For the Workmen had made therein Trees and Plants of divers sorts, shadowed with their Branches and Leafs, hanging in such sort, that to behold them, a man would have thought that they shook, the Workmanship was so exquisite and curious that covered the stone. The rest, as far as the Roof, was enchaïed, and flourished with divers Antiques and Pictures. Furthermore, he built other places of Pleasure, with very long Porches to beautify the Palace; amongst which, there was one most magnificent to make Banquets and Feasts in, which was throughout adorned with Gold: and all the necessaries for entertainment were of Gold. It would be difficult to give an exact account of the Variety, the Capaciousness and Magnificence of these structures, whereof some were of a greater, and some of a lesser bulk; some under ground, and others raised to a great height: The pleasant Arbors likewise, and the Gardens, which were so fashioned that they afforded a pleasant prospect to the eye, as well as refreshment from the heat. All the building was made of white Marble, of Cedar, of Gold, and of Silver: the floors and walls were figured with diversity of Flowers, and of precious Stones, enchaïed in Gold, after the manner of the Temple of God, which shined with such like Ornaments. There was likewise erected a very large Throne, made in form of a Tribunal, with six steps of pure Ivory: On each side of which there stood two Lyons, and the like number were placed above. About the place where the King fate, there were several Armes stretched out, which seemed to succor or protect him; and he fate upon an Ox looking backwards: this Throne was all covered with Gold.

Solomon built all this that hath been spoken of, in the space of twenty years, being furnished by Hiram, King of the Tyrians, for these his buildings, with great sums of Gold, and far greater of Silver, besides a quantity of Cedar and Pine trees. Solomon also remunated him, and gave him great Presents, and sent him every year abundance of Corn, Wine and Oyl (as we have heretofore declared) whereof he stood in great need, by reason that his Countrey was an Island. And besides that, he gave him twenty Cities in Galilee, not far distant from Tyre. Hiram having visited them, and not well pleased with them, sent unto Solomon to certify him thereof, that he had no use for his Cities: And from that time forward they were called the Countrey of Chabel, which is as much as to say in the Phenician tongue, unpleasant. Hiram likewise sent unto Solomon certain Mysteries and difficult Questions, requiring him to explicate them, and solve those Doubts and Difficulties that occurred in his Demands. Solomon being a man of ripe Judgment and Understanding, explained them all with a great deal of perspicuity. Of these two Kings, Menander (who translated the Antiquities of the Tyrians out of the Phenician Tongue into Greek) maketh mention, after this manner: After the death of Abibale, Hiram his son succeeded him in the Kingdom; who lived fifty and three years, and reigned thirty and four. He annexed the Field, which is called the great Field, unto the Island, and consecrated a golden pillar in Tapitry's Temple. He also caused a great quantity of Wood to be hewed down in the mountain Libanus, to make pillars and roofs for Temples. For having pulled down some ancient Temples, he builded that of Hercules, and that of Asarte, and made his first building of Hercules in the month of Petition (which is February) and made War against the

the Eycens, who refused to pay their Tributes: and after he had brought them under his subjection, he returned to his own Palace. In his time lived a young man called Abdemon, who always resolved those questions which Solomon King of Jerusalem proposed.

Dion also maketh mention of him in these terms: After the decease of Abibale, his son Hiram reigned: he it was that fortified the quarter of the City to the Eastward, and enlarged the same, and joynd the Temple of Olympian Jupiter to the City, which before that time was in another place, and filled all the place between them with earth, and adorned it with pendants of Gold: and afterwards going up to Libanus, he hewed down timber to build Temples withal. He said also, that Solomon reigning at that time in Jerusalem, sent unto Hiram certain subtle questions demanding the exposition thereof under this Condition, that if he explained them not, by way of penalty he should pay a great Sum of money; and afterwards that a certain Tyrinn called Abdemon, expounded that which had been proposed, and in lieu thereof proposed certain others, which Solomon could not expound, and for that occasion he paid a great Sum of Money unto Hiram. This is that which Dion writeth.

The King seeing that the City of Jerusalem wanted both Bulwarks and Towers to secure the fame, and that the strength of it was no way answerable to the dignity thereof, he repaired the Walls, and erected great Towers on the same. Moreover, he built certain Cities, which deserve to be commemorated amongst the most Renowned, namely, Aschor and Magedon, and the City of Gaza in the Countrey of the Philistines: against which Pharaoh King of Egypt led out his Army, and took it by force; and after he had put all the Inhabitants thereof to the Sword, he destroyed the same, and he gave it in dowry unto his Daughter which was married unto Solomon. For which cause the King fortified it; seeing it to be already sufficiently fenced by nature, and that it stood very commodiously for the War, and to hinder the incursions of the enemy. Not far from thence, he fortified two other Cities, whereof one was called Betachor, and the other Balaeth. Besides these, he built others, which were Cities of Recreation and Pleasure, by reason of the good temperature of the Air, and the pleasantness of the Fruits, and in especially the sweet Rivers wherewith they were watered. Afterwards entering into the Desert that is above Syria, and conquering the same, he built another great City two days Journey distant from the higher Syria, a days Journey from Euphrates, and six from the great Babylon. The cause why this City was inhabited far from peopled quarters of Syria, was because in no place of the lower Countrey there was water to be found, and in this City only there were Fountains and Springs. He therefore built this City, and begit it with strong Walls, and called it Thadamor (which is the name which the Syrians term it by, even at this day, and amongst the Greeks it is called Palmyra. And these were Solomons Works in that time. But since divers are inquisitive to know the reason why the Kings of Egypt that have been since Mineus the Founder of Memphis (who reigned divers years before our great Ancestor Abraham) till Solomons time, for the space of more than Thirteen hundred years, have been called Pharaohs, deriving that name from one that reigned in the mid-time between both: I have thought fit to give some account of it. The name of Pharaoh amongst the Egyptians, signifieth as much as King. But I suppose that from their Childhood they had other distinct names, and that afterward when they are created Kings, they take upon them that name, which in their Mother-Tongue signifieth no less than Authority. (For the Kings of Alexandria having been heretofore called by other names, at such time as they take upon them the Kingdom, they are called Ptolomies, by the name of their first King.) The Roman Emperors likewise, notwithstanding they have other names at the time of their Birth, yet are they called Cæsars; because the Sovereignty and Honour whereunto they are raised, importeth that title on them: and the name that was given by their Fathers, is no more retained. For this cause it is, that although Herodotus of Halicarnassus, saith, that since Mineus the Founder of Memphis, there have been Three hundred and thirty Kings of Egypt; yet declareth he not their names, because they were called Pharaohs. For when after these a Woman had obtained the Kingdom, he called her by her own proper name, Nicaula: whence it appeareth, that the men who have been Kings, were usually called by this name, and that it had not been communicated unto this Woman: For which cause it was necessary to declare her own first name. For mine own part, I have found in the Books of our Nation, that since Pharaoh, who was Father-in-law to Solomon, none of the Kings of Egypt have been called by that name: and that some little while after, the forementioned Woman came unto Solomon, who reigned in Egypt and Ethiopia: of whom we shall speak hereafter. But at this present I have made mention of it, that it might appear that our Records, and the Chronicles of the Egyptians, agree in many things.

But King Solomon conquered the Canaanites (which till that time were not under his subjection) and those that inhabited the mountain Libanus, as far as the City of Amath, and

And made them Tributaries, and chose but from amongst them every year such, as he might employ in servile Works, and domestick Affairs, and tillage of the Land. For no Hebrew was slave: Neither was it convenient, that since God had subjected divers Nations under him (whom they might make slaves of) that they should tie those of their own Nation to that Bondage, who were all of them employed in Arms, and rather took delight to ride in Chariots, and on Horses, than to submit to any mean or servile Employment. Over the Canaanites (whom he employed in his service) he appointed Five hundred and fifty Commissaries, who had their Charge and Authority from the King, and imposed on them those works wherein they were employed. He built a Navy also in the Gulf of Egypt, in a certain place of the Red-Sea called Afiongaber, which is named Berenice, not far from the City of Elana (which Countrey in times past appertained to the Jews.) And toward the building of his Navy, he obtained of Hiram King of Tyre, a very considerable assistance: for he sent him Models of Ships, and men that were skilful in Navigation, whom he appointed to sail with his Factors to the Countrey at that time called ophir, and at this present the Land of Gold, in the Countrey of India, to bring Gold from thence: who returned back again unto the King, after they had gathered about Four hundred Talents.

About this time the Queen of Egypt and Ethiopia (a Woman adorned with Wisdom, and admirable in all other things) having heard of the renowned Virtue and Prudence of Solomon, desired to see with her own eyes whether those things which were reported of him were true; nor was she deterr'd either by the length or difficulty of the journey from underraking it, that she might thereby receive that satisfaction which she had promised her self. She therefore came unto Jerusalem with great pomp, glory, and riches: for she brought with her several Camels laden with Gold, Odors, and precious Stones of great value. After that the King had graciously entertained her, and honoured her in all things, he easily apprehended those doubts which she proposed, and gave her a more speedy solution of the same, than might be expected: So that she was ravished with the incredible Wisdom of Solomon, knowing by the effect, that it exceeded the report which she had heard of him. But in special, she wondered at his Palace, considering the greatness and beauty thereof; and above all, at the rich Furniture and curious Architecture of the same; wherein she perceived the great Wisdom of the King: but nothing more surprized her, than the beauty of one single Room, called the Forest of Libanus: but the magnificence of his ordinary Table, and the Furniture and service of the same, made her astonish'd. The attire of his Servants likewise, and the goodly order which they observed in their service. Moreover, the Sacrifices that were every day offered up unto God, and the care and diligence of the Priests in discharging their Offices, pleased her more than all the rest, when she observed them daily: And being not able to contain her self, she expressed how wonderfully she was affected; and her admiration still encreasing, she could not but express it to the King, after this manner:

We may very well doubt of things extraordinary, when we have no opportunity of being acquainted with them but by report: But the same of your riches, both those which you have in your self (I mean your wisdom and Prudence) as those also which your Kingdom hath brought you, is neither false nor feigned; but yet I must confess, that the happiness which I have seen, is much more excellent than that which was represented to me: for report dependeth only on hear-say, neither giveth it so certain a notice of things as the sight discovereth, when one is near unto the same. For mine own part, I gave no credit to what I heard, but I have seen far more than I could expect, and repute the people of the Hebrews to be most happy; and your servants and friends most blessed, who are continual witnesses and Hearers of your Wisdom. And each one of you ought to give God thanks, that he hath so much loved this region, and the Inhabitants thereof, that he hath established you in the Royal Seat. I shall relate also, how she expressed her affection the bare unto the King, by divers Presents which she offer'd unto him. For she gave him twenty Talents of Gold, and an innumerable quantity of sweet Odors and precious Stones. It is fit likewise, that we have that Plant that distilleth Balm, and which our Countrey bringeth forth at this day, by the gift of this Princess. Solomon for his part required her bountiful Presents with the like, which she made choice of according to her own liking, for there was nothing which she could require, which he granted not unto her: Shewing himself most ready to give her satisfaction with a liberal and Royal Heart. When the Queen of Egypt and Ethiopia had received these favours at the Kings hands (according as it hath been spoken) and he likewise had magnificently requited her, she returned back again into her own Countrey.

About the same time there was brought unto the King from the Countrey called the Region of Gold, a quantity of precious Stones, and of Pine-trees. This Wood was employed to make supportors in the Temple, and in the Kings house, and to make instruments

ments of musick likewise, as Harps and Cymbals, on which the Levites might praise H God. Amongst all the gifts that were ever presented unto Solomon, that which was given him at that time, was most excellent in greatness and beauty. But let no man think, that the Pine-wood (which we speak of) had any resemblance with that which we call by that name at this day, or which the Merchants, to delude their Chapmen, sell for the same. For they are like unto fig-trees, but that they are more white and clearer: which I thought good to take notice of in this place, lest any man should be deceived through ignorance, in not discerning the one from the other, because the affairs of Solomon have drawn us to make mention of this matter. The weight of Gold which this Navy brought unto the King, was six hundred sixty and six Talents: besides that which the Merchants bought themselves, or that which the Kings and Princes of Arabia had sent unto him by I way of Present. This Gold caused he to be molten down, and made thereof Two hundred Targets, each one weighing six Hundred Shekels; and three Hundred Bucklers, each one of them weighing three Hundred mines of Gold, and placed and hung them in the Hall, called the Forest of Libanus. He caused also divers Vessels of Gold and precious Stones to be made for the use of his Table, all curiously wrought; the rest of his necessities also were of Gold: for nothing was either bought or sold for Silver. For the King had many Ships upon the Sea of Tharfis, which upon his command carried divers Merchandize into remote Countries, by vent whereof they brought him home much Gold and Silver, and much Ivory and Ethiopian Moors and Apes; and this Navigation in sailing too and fro, was finished in three years. The renown and fame also of Solomon's Virtues and Wisdom, spread far and near throughout all Nations: so that Kings of the remote Countries had a desire to see him, because they believed not the Report, and desired to manifest their affection to him by magnificent Presents. They therefore sent him vessels of Gold and of Silver, scarlet Robes, and all sorts of Aromaticke Drugs, Horses and Chariots, Mules and Sumpter-Horses, wherein (as it was reported unto them) the King took pleasure, by reason of their strength and beauty: so that to the number of Horses and Chariots which he had before, there were annexed four Hundred more, which had been sent him as Presents. For before that, he had a Thousand Chariots, and twenty thousand goodly Horses, excellent for shape and swiftness: so that the like were not to be found, that were comparable to them for: beauty and pace. And that which gave them the greater Grace was, that they were backed by young Men of goodly personage to behold, and surpassing all other in height, having long locks, which they daily intermixed with wires of Gold, that when the Sun should shine upon their Heads, they might appear more glorious and bright. The King mounted on his Chariot, and apparelled in a white Rayment, was accustomed to ride abroad about the Sun-rise, guarded with these young armed Men, having Bows and Quivers.

There was a certain place called Itan, some eight leagues distant from Jerusalem, delightful and enriched with Gardens and pleasant Fountains of Water, whither he usually retired himself for his pleasure. He forgot not likewise to make Causeys, but caused the high-ways that led to Jerusalem (where he made his abode) to be paved with black stone, to make them more accessible for those that travelled to and fro, and to shew his Magnificence and Riches. He then divided his Chariots, and placed them in such sort, that in every City there was a certain number, and some few he kept about himself, and those Cities he called the Cities of Chariots: he stored Jerusalem also with abundance of Silver, so that it was as plentiful as stones; and with Cedar-wood (whereof before that time there was no quantity) he stored the Country, that it was as plentiful to be had as wild Fig-trees. He commanded the Merchants of Egypt also to buy him certain Chariots drawn by two Horses, for the price of six hundred Drachms of Silver, which he sent unto the Kings of Syria, and to those on the other side of Euphrates.

Now although he were the most magnificent and entirely beloved of God, surpassing N both in prudence and riches all those that before him had the government of the Hebrews; yet continued he not in this state until the end. For, forsaking the Observation of the Ordinances of his Fathers, his latter years were not correspondent to his former: for he grew altogether dissolute, and immoderately given over to Women; and was not content only with those of his own Country, but took also strange Women for his Wives, as Sidonians, Tyrians, Ammonites, and Idumeans, whereby he transgressed the Laws of Marriage instituted by Moses, who inhibited to Marry with those of foreign Nations. Afterwards he began to honour their gods also, that he might the more affectionately express the love which he bare unto them: which thing the Law-maker foreseeing, he had forbidden the Israelites to marry with those that were not of their own Nation, for fear lest O conforming themselves unto foreign Fashions, they should transgress the Ordinances of their Fore-fathers: and by doing honour to those gods, should forget the honour due unto

H unto the true God. But Solomon transported with these brutish pleasures, made no account of these things, but took him Wives of the Daughters of Princes and Nobles, to the number of 700, and 300 Concubins, besides the Daughter of Pharaoh King of Egypt: by which means he was excessively overcome by them, inso much as he follow'd their ex-amples, and was forced to give a Testimony of the good will and extreme affection that he bare them, in ordering his life according to the fashion of their Countries. As there-fore he increased in years, and his Judgement grew weak, he was in such sort misled, that he could not retain in memory the Customs of his Country, but more and more neglected the God of his Father; and promoted the Worship of those gods which were introduced by his Wives. Before all this, he chanced to sin, and transgressed against the observation of the law, at such time as he made the similitudes of Beasts of Brasis to underprop the vessel called the great Sea, and those of Lyons which he caused to be set unto his Throne: For that Action of his ill-beseemed him, Who had a most excellent Example of Virtue in the person of his Father, besides the Glory that he had left him, by being a faithful Servant of God; whence it came to pass, that by neglecting to follow his steps (notwithstanding that God had exhorted him thereunto by appearing unto him at two several times) he dyed most ingloriously. There came therefore unto him a Prophet sent from God, telling him, That his sins were manifest, and notorious in Gods sight, threatening him that he long be should repent the wickedness he had committed. Yet notwithstanding the Realm should not be taken from him during his life, because God had promised David, that he should be his Successor; but after his decease, he would chastise his Son, for the iniquity of the Father: not so as all the people should revolt, but that he would give ten Tribes unto his Servant, and leave two unto the Grandchild of David, because he had loved God; and by reason of the City of Jerusalem, where it pleased him to make his habitation.

When Solomon heard these things, he was sore troubled, because all his felicity began to decline. Nor was it long after this Denunciation of the Prophet, but that there rose up an Enemy against him, who was called Ader, by Nation an Idumean, and of the Prince-ly stock, who upon this occasion, grounded his Rebellion and Insurrection. For at such time as Joab, General of David's Army, had conquered Idumea, and in the space of six Months defeated all the youth, and those that were capable to bear Arms, he fled unto L. Pharaoh King of Egypt, who entertain'd him very courteously, and gave him an House and Lands for his maintenance, and loved him dearly when he came to mans estate; so that he married him to Taphiner his Wives Sister, on whom he begat a Son, who was brought up with the Kings Children: who having intelligence in Egypt of David and Joab's death, address'd himself unto Pharaoh, and besought him to give him leave to repair into his own Country.

The King ask'd him what he wanted, or what the cause was that mov'd him to be so forward to forsake him? Notwithstanding therefore that he importuned and requested him divers times, yet prevailed he not with him. But when Solomon's Fortunes began to decline (by reason of his iniquities above-mentioned, and the Wrath of God provoked Against him) Ader, by Gods permission, came into Idumea, after he had obtained leave of Pharaoh to depart. But being unable to move the People to revolt from Solomon, by reason of the strong Garrisons he held; and knowing, that without hazard of his own Person, he could move no Alterations or Innovation in that place, he departed from thence, and went into Syria: where confederating himself with a certain man called Ras, (who was fled from his Master Adarezer, King of Sophone, and lived like an Out-law in that Region) he contracted Friendship with him, and a great sort of Out-laws and Thieves that were his Followers, and went into Syria, and seizing on that Country, proclaimed himself King thereof. From whence, making Excursions into the Lands of the Israelites, he spoyed and pillaged the same, during Solomon's life time. Thus were N the Hebrews enforced to sustain those Outrages at Ader's hands.

Moreover a certain Man called Jeroboam, the Son of Nabal, by Nation a Jew, rebelled against Solomon, and raised his hopes above his Estate, perfwaded thereunto by a Prophe-ty that concerned him, and incited him unto the Action. For being left very young by his Father, and carefully instructed by his Mother, as soon as Solomon perceived him to be of a noble and courageous Spirit, he made him Commissary over the building of the Walls at such time as he immured and fortified Jerusalem. In this Office he behaved himself so well, that the King thought very well thereof, and by way of Recompence, made him General over the Tribe of Joseph. Towards which, whilst he travelled from Jerusalem, a certain Prophet met him upon the way (who was of the City of Silo, called O Achias) who approaching near unto him, and saluting him, drew him out of the way into a place, where none but themselves were present, and there renting the Garment which he wore upon his back in twelve pieces, he commanded Jeroboam to take ten, telling him,

That God had so decreed, and how he would rent the Government from Solomon, and reserve it only to his Son, with that other which was annexed unto it, by reason of the promise made to David; and to thee (saith he) begetteth the other Ten, because Solomon hath offended God, and addicted himself to the love of strange Women, and the service of foreign gods.

ver. 40. Jeroboam fled into Egypt, and remained there until Solomon's death.

Now since thou knowest the cause wherefore God hath alienated the Kingdom from Solomon, be thou just, and observe the Laws; for if thou behavest thyself in such sort as thou knowest David did, a great reward of thy Piety, and recompence of thy observance attendeth thee, so that thou shalt become as mighty as David hath been before thee. Jeroboam confirmed in these hopes by these words of the Prophet, being by nature haughty, in years young, and besides that, desirous of Authority, he took no rest; but being possessed of the place of General, and remembering himself of that which had been told him by Achias, he presently began to persuade the people to revolt from Solomon, and to chuse him for their King. Solomon hearing News of this his Design, sought means to lay hands on him, and to put him to death: but Jeroboam preventing him, fled unto Susac King of Egypt, with whom he remained until the death of Solomon. And thus for that time escaped he punishment: and thus was he reserved to the fortune of a Kingdom.

C H A P. III.

After the death of Solomon, the people revolt from Rehoboam his Son, and proclaim Jeroboam King of the Ten Tribes.

The death of Solomon. Jedis & Esf. first chap. 9. al. 4. 1 Reg. 12. 1. ad 11.

The people require Rehoboam to mitigate their burthen.

v. 6, 7, 8. The whole some advice of the Elders.

v. 8, ad 11. Rehoboam rejects the advice of the Elders, and followeth the counsel of the young.

BUT when Solomon was very old, he dyed, after he had reigned fourscore years, and lived ninety four, and was buried in Jerusalem; of all Kings the most happy, rich, and prudent, (except that sin whereunto he was drawn by Women in his old Age) of whom, and those Calamities that presently after befel the Hebrews, we have sufficiently spoken. After the death of Solomon, as soon as his Son Rehoboam (whom he begat upon an Ammonitish Woman, called Noma) succeeded him in the Kingdom, the Governours of the people sent certain Messengers into Egypt, to recall Jeroboam: who arriving in the City of Sichem, Rehoboam came thither also, resolving in that Assembly of the Israelites, to take the Kingdom upon himself by the peoples consent. To him therefore the Principals of the people resorted with Jeroboam, beseeching him, That he would remit somewhat of their servitude, and shew himself more merciful than his Father had been: for that under his Government they had been sorely oppressed, assuring him, that by that means his Kingdom should be the more secured, if so be he had rather be beloved, than feared. He three days after promised them to return an answer to their demands, and by that means drew them into suspicion, that upon the motion he misliked of the offers they had proposed: For they thought it became his years to be affable, and ready to deserve well; yet remained there some hope in them, that they had not presently suffered a repulse. Mean while, he calling about him his Fathers Friends, consulted what Answer he should give the people: They that wished his welfare, and knew the nature of the people very well, persuaded him to speak familiarly unto the people, and remitting a little of his Kingly Austerity, to apply himself to the Favour and good liking of the multitude: for that by this his affability, he might the more easily draw their hearts unto him, because that by a natural Inclination, Subjects take delight in those Kings that are courteous, who with a certain decent familiarity, entertain themselves amongst them. But Rehoboam rejected this Counsel of theirs (which was both good and profitable in all occasions, but especially upon the first entrance into a Kingdom) and that not without Gods Providence, since contrary to all reason he neglected the right course, and followed the perverser: So that calling unto him certain young men of his own Humor and Disposition, he told them what the Elders had counselled him, and willed them to discover their Opinion in that matter: But neither their Age, nor Gods Permission suffered them to know that which was expedient. For which cause they counselled him to answer the people, That his little finger was more great than the loins of his Father; and that if they had experimented and endured grievances under him, that he would be far more rigorous; and that if his Father had chastised them with the stroke of the Rod, that they should expect to be punished by him with a severe chastisement. The King delighted herewith, supposed the answer to be agreeable to the dignity of his Empire. When therefore the people were assembled on the third day to hear his resolution, and all of them were in suspense, expecting and desirous to hear him speak, from whom they hoped nought else but sweetness: Rehoboam contemning the Counsel of his Friends, proposed unto himself that of the young men. All which happened by the Will of God, to the end that that which Achias had prophesied might be fulfilled.

They

The year of the world, 2071. before Christ's Nativity, 953. ver. 18, 19. The Israelites moved with their repulse, revolt from Rehoboam.

H They touched by these his answers, no less than if they had been wounded with a sword, were much displeased, and no less moved, than if they had already felt the mischief that was threatened: so that they began all of them to cry with a loud Voice, that from that time forward they had nothing to do with Davids alliance, neither with his succession, telling him, that they would only leave the Temple his Father had built, unto his charge, and threatening him to abandon him. Furthermore, they were so heinously incensed (that Rehoboam having sent unto them Adoram, the Superintendent of the Tribes, to pacify their wrath, and to persuade them to pardon his youth, if he had spoken any thing lightly, and unrespectively unto them) they could not endure to hear him speak, but flew and well-nigh overwhelmed him with stones. Which when Rehoboam perceived (supposing that it was himself, who in the person of his Officer was put to death, and stoned by the people) he feared lest in effect his life, and the fortune of his Kingdom should fall into the like disaster. Whereupon he took his Chariot, and fled to Jerusalem, where the Tribe of Juda, and that of Benjamin (by their common suffrages) made him King. But as touching the rest of the people, from that day forward they revolted from the Successors of David, and proclaimed Jeroboam King of their Estates. Rehoboam the Son of Solomon being sore displeased herewith, assembled the two Tribes, with an intent to muster one hundred and fourscore thousand chosen men, to make War on Jeroboam and his people, and to enforce them by war to acknowledge him for their Sovereign. But God restrained him by the means of a Prophet, who forbade him to make War, saying, That it became not those of the same Nation to contend one against another: and the rather, for that this their revolt had hapned by the will of God, by which means and persuasion he dismissed his Army. But first of all I will rehearse that which Jeroboam King of Israel did, and afterwards declare the acts of Rehoboam King of the two Tribes, and thus shall the course of the History continue in order.

The Court and Palace of Jeroboam.

After that Jeroboam had settled his Court in the City of Sichem, he made his ordinary abode in that place, except that sometimes he sojourned in the City of Phanuel. Not long after this, the feast of the Tabernacles being at hand, Jeroboam (supposing that if he permitted the people to go up and worship God in Jerusalem, and solemnize the feast in that place, they might either repent themselves of the revolt, or that by the magnificence of the Ceremonies used in the worship of God in the Temple, and service that was celebrated therein, they might be persuaded to forsake him, and submit themselves to their first King, and by that means he might be drawn into danger of his life) to prevent the danger of such a mischief, took this course: He caused two golden Calves to be cast, and built two several Temples, the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan, (which is situate near to the source of little Jordan) in which he placed these Calves; and afterwards assembling the ten Tribes that were under his subjection, he spake unto them in manner following:

ver. 25, 27, 28. Why Jeroboam caused Calves to be made.

My Friends and Countreymen, I know that you are not ignorant how God is in all places, and that there cannot be any place wherein he absetteth not, nor time wherein he beareth and beholdeth them not, that serve him with true affection: For which cause I think it not convenient, that you go up unto Jerusalem, which is a City at enmity with us, neither that you make so long a journey to perform your devotion: for it was a man that built that Temple, even as I have consecrated two golden Calves, the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan, to the end that every one of you that inhabit near unto those Cities, may go thither and worship God. Neither shall you want Priests and Levites: for I will elect some such among you, to the intent that you may have no more need of the Tribe of Levi, or the Sons of Aaron. Whosoever therefore amongst you would be a Priest, let him offer Calves and Muttons unto God, after the same manner that Aaron did when he was first appointed to be a Priest.

Jeroboam persuaded the people to idolatry.

By such like Speeches seduced he the people, and caused them to fall from their Forefathers Religion, and transgress the Ordinances of their Countrey, and this was the beginning of all those mischiefs that afterwards fell upon the Hebrews: By which means being overcome in War, they fell into captivity, and were made subject to strangers, (whereof we will treat further hereafter.) Now when the feast of Tabernacles (which hapned in the seventh month) was at hand, he himself intended to celebrate in Bethel after the same manner, as the two other Tribes had feasted in Jerusalem, and erected an Altar before the Calf, and was himself the High Priest, ascending up to the Altar, being assisted by the Priests.

The neglect of Gods service is the cause of all evil.

Now at such time as he was about to sacrifice, and to offer up burnt-offerings in the sight of the people, there came a Prophet and stood by him, called Jadon, (sent from Jerusalem by the commandment of God) who standing up in the midst of the people, and in the hearing of the King, turned himself towards the Altar, and spake after this manner: Thou Altar, thou Altar, thus saith the Lord, there shall a man rise of the Tribe of Da-

CHAP. V.

Jeroboams Expedition against the son of Rehoboam, the overthrow of his Army, Babasins routeth out the whole posterity of Jeroboam, and maketh himself King.

BUT Jeroboam nothing moved therewith, levied a great Army, with an intent to make War against Abias, the son of Rehoboam, who had obtained his Fathers Kingdom over the two Tribes. For he despised him, because he was young. Notwithstanding the young King, who was no whit dismay'd, (although he was inform'd of Jeroboams coming) with greater wilddom than was common to his years, and beyond all expectation of his forward adversary, levied an Army out of the two Tribes, with which he encountred Jeroboam at the Mountain of Sathmar; where incamping his Host near unto him, he provided all things in a readines that were requisite for the Batrel, and had with him four hundred thousand fighting Men, but Jeroboam had twice as many. Now when the Armies were ranged, and expected orders to charge, Abias stood up in a certain high place from whence he might be seen and heard, and making a sign with his hand, he required that Jeroboam and the people would first of all here him peaceably; which granted, and each one attending in silence, he brake out into these words: There is none of you but knoweth, that God hath promised the Kingdom to David, and his posterity for ever; I therefore greatly admire how you have revolted, from my Father, to submit your selves to Jeroboam his servant, whom at this present you accompany to war against those whom God had ordained to Reign, and to take the Kingdom from them; the greater part whereof Jeroboam asperseth unjustly even at this day, and which, as I suppose, he shall not enjoy long. For God shall certainly punish him for those Crimes which he hath committed, and which he continues daily to commit, and to the imitation of which he endeavoreth to seduce you that follow him. You have received no injury at my Fathers hands; but by reason that he was misled by the sinister counsels of certain wicked persons, and speak unto you certain words which seemed harsh in your ears, you have forsaken him in your displeasure: but, in effect, you have separated your selves from God and his Commandments. Truly you should have pardoned a young man untrained and anti taught in Oratory, not only for the rude words which he useth, but although his youth and ignorance should have moved him to commit some churlish and indiscreet action and error, yet should you have endured the same. For the obligations which you had received from my Grandfather Solomon, ought to have prevail'd with you, to pass by the defects of his son my father. But you have had no regard of all this, neither then nor at this present, but led forth a great Army against us. But whereupon ground you the hope of your victory? Is it on your Calves of gold? Is it on your Altars on the mountains, which are witnesses of your impiety and irreligion? Is it your great number that surpasseth ours by far, that maketh you confident? Truly, the force of many thousands is of no value, where the Army fighteth in an unjust quarrel. For in justice only and piety towards God, consisteth the most assured hope of obtaining victory over a mans enemies; which must needs be on our side, who observe at all times the ordinances of our MGod, whom mens hands have not fashioned of corruptible matter, nor the subtlety of a cunning King could forge to deceive a Commonalty, but such an one, whose work is the beginning and ending of all things. I therefore advise you, that presently you repent your selves, and that taking a better way, you desist from your War, and acknowledge the Laws of your Forefathers, and those Ordinances which have advanced you to so great felicity.

Thus spake Abias to the people. But whilst he yet continued his discourse, Jeroboam sent certain of his Soldiers by wayes to inclose Abias within two traits, before his followers could discover them. Now when Abias was thus inclosed in the midst of his enemies, his Army began to be discomfited, and to lose their courage: but he encouraged them, and exhorted them to put their trust in God, who could not be inclosed by his enemies: so that altogether having called upon God to assist them, and after that the Priests had sounded the Trumpet, they thrust in amongst their enemies with a great shout, and God so blinded the understanding, and abated the force of Jeroboams Soldiers, that they fled, and those on Abias side obtained the victory. Never was there war recorded by the Historians, either amongst the Greeks or Barbarians, that was perficed with so great a slaughter as the Army of Jeroboam: whereby it appeared, that this wonderful and admirable victory came from God. For they discomfited five hundred thousand of their enemies, and took their most defended places by force, and spoiled them. Beisel and Ithan also, with their lands and signories belonging unto them: so that as long as Abias lived, Jeroboam was never after able to raise any power since the loss he received. Abias survived after this his victory, onely for the space of three years; and was buried in Jerusalem, in the Sepulchre of his Ancestors, leaving twenty two sons, and sixteen daughters behind him, all which he began on sixteen Women. His son Asa succeeded him in the Targets and Bucklers of gold, which were made by King Solomon: neither left he behind him the quiver of gold, which was offered by David, and received by him of the King of Sophena: which done, he retired back again unto his own Countrey. Of this expedition, Herodotus of Halicarnassus maketh mention, (who differeth only in the name of the King) and saith that he assailed divers Nations, and subdued Palestina and Syria, and took many Men Prisoners without any resistance; whereby it is manifest that he meaneth no less than that our Nation hath been overcome by the Egyptians. For he saith, that in their gates, who yielded themselves up unto him without making opposition, as an eternal Reprach of their Cowardize and Luxury, he erected Pillars which were figured with the secret parts of a woman. For King Rehoboam was the only Prince that ever yielded up the City without opposition. It is said that the Ethiopians have learnt of the Egyptians the use of circumcision of the Prepuce. For the Phicians and Syrians that are in Palestine, confess that they have learnt it of the Egyptians. But it is very manifest, that no other are circumcised in Palestina or Syria, but our selves. But let each one speak of these things, according as he pleaseth.

After the Retreat of Sajas, King Rehoboam made shields and bucklers of brass, instead of those of gold, and gave the like number unto his guard: and instead of living in a brave Army, in a Royal and Princely state, he reigned after a servile manner, being all his life-time an enemy to Jeroboam. He dyed after he had lived fifty seven years, whereof he Reigned seventeen. He was a haughty and undifcreet man, and lost his estate, because he would not give credit to his Fathers friends. He was buried in Jerusalem in the Sepulchre of the Kings, and his son Abias succeeded him in the Kingdom, at such time as Jeroboam had already Reigned eighteen years over the Ten Tribes.

After having related the end of Rehoboam, we must give an account likewise of that of Jeroboam. He observing no mean or end of his impiety, employed himself continually in making of Altars and high places, and presumed to ordain Priests of the meanest of the People. But God with-held not long to heap the punishment of those his impieties, on the head of him, and of all his posterity. Whereas therefore his son Omies was sick, about that time he commanded his Wife to lay aside her Royal garment, and to apparel her self like a common Woman; and afterwards to go to Abias the Prophet, assuring her that he was admirable for his knowledge in foretelling things to come, and had foretold him that he should be King: Wherefore he advised her to go to him after the manner of a stranger, and enquire of him if her son should escape that sickness. Whereupon the disguised her self according as her husband had commanded her, and came unto the City of Silo where Abias dwelt; and as she was upon entering his house, (notwithstanding he had lost his sight through Age) God appeared unto him, and told him that Jeroboams Wife came unto him, and all that he should answer to her demands. At such time therefore as she entered into his House, after the guise of a common and strange Woman, Abias cried with a loud voice;

Enter, thou Wife of Jeroboam, wherefore hidest thou thy self? Thou canst not hide thy self from God, who had certified me of thy coming, and hath informed me what answer I shall give unto thee. He therefore said unto her, that she should return unto her husband, and certify him of Gods answer to this effect: Of little and nothing that thou wert, I have made thee great; and having dismembered the Kingdom of Davids posterity, I have given it unto thee: But thou hast forgotten me; and having forsaken my service, hast molten down new gods, whom thou honourst: Wherefore will I exterminate thee, and abolish all thy posterity, and cast them off for a prey unto the Dogs, and the Fowls of the Air. For I will constitute a King over my people, that shall leave no one of Jeroboams Race alive. The people also shall have part of this punishment, and shall be deprived of this fruitful Countrey, and be scattered amongst the Regions on the other side of Euphrates, because they have followed the impieties of their King, and adoring those gods that were forged by him, have omitted to offer sacrifice unto me. And as concerning thy self (O Woman) haste thee, and certify thy husband of these things; for thou shalt find thy son dead: for no longer shalt thou enter into the City, but he shall finish his days. He shall be buried with the lamentation of the whole people in general. For he only was good of all the Race of Jeroboam.

When Abias had finished his Prophecie, the Woman started back, sore troubled and dismayed, through the danger of her son, and went lamenting onward on her way, to find out the King, not considering that the more haste she made, the more she hastened the death of her son, who was not to expire till she arrived, and (according to the prediction of the Prophet) she was not to expect to see him any more alive. When as therefore she was arrived, she found her son dead, as the Prophet had foretold her; and rected the rest unto Jeroboam.

the Kingdom, whose Mother was called Maacha: under his Government the Countrey H of Israel enjoyed a firm peace for the space of ten years. This is that which we have observed of Abias, son of Rehoboam, the son of Solomon: Jeroboam the King of the ten Tribes dyed likewise, after he had reigned twenty two years, and Nadab his son succeeded him, at such time as Asa had already reigned two years. The son of Jeroboam governed two years, resembling his father in impiety and wickedness. During these two years, he made War against Gaba, a City of the Philistines, and encamped thereabout to surprize it by force: But being betrayed by the treachery of a certain friend of his called Basfa, the son of Machil, he dyed. This Basfa taking possession of the Kingdom, exterminated all the posterity of Jeroboam, and it came to pass, that they of Jeroboams Race that dyed in the City, were torn in pieces, and devoured by Dogs; and they that I were in the fields, were made a prey unto Birds, according as God had foretold by his Prophet. By this means the house of Jeroboam suffered a deserved punishment for their impiety and wickedness.

C H A P. VI.

The Ethiopians besiege Jerusalem during the Reign of Asa, and are repulsed.

BUT Asa King of Jerusalem, was a man of an upright and honest life, and one that feared God; neither propoled he to himself any other rule of his Actions, than the Divine law. He corrected whatsoever was vicious and irregular in his Kingdom, purging it from all impiety. He had an Army of three hundred thousand men of the Tribe of Juda, armed with Buclers and Javelins, and two hundred and fifty thousand of the Tribe of Benjamin, bearing Bucklers and Bowes. After he had reigned ten years, Zareus King of Ethiopia came out against him, with a great Army of nine hundred thousand footmen, and one hundred thousand horsemen, with three hundred chariots, and destroyed all the Land as far as Maresa, a City of Juda: in which place Asa met him, and set his Army in array against him, in the valley of Saphath, not far from the City. Where seeing the great number of the Ethiopians, he besought God that he would give him the victory over his enemies: because he had not come forth against so formidable a power but in confidence of his assistance, who had the power to make a few men superior unto many, and the feeble to overcome the mighty.

Whilst Asa prayed unto God, a certain sign of victory was given him; so being confirmed in that God had given him a token that he would assist him, he assailed his enemies, and slew a great number of the Ethiopians: as for the rest that were put to flight, he pursued them as far as the Countrey of Gerar; and after they had conquered their Enemies, they sacked the City of Gerar, and brought from thence a great mass of gold, and much spoil, with Camels, Dromedaries, and Herds of divers kinds of Cattel.

When Asa had obtained at Gods hands such a victory, and so great riches, he returned back again to Jerusalem: and when he drew near unto the City, the Prophet Azarias came out to meet them, who stayed him, and spake after this manner: That sith they had obtained from God so notable a victory, they ought to behave themselves like virtuous men, and as such as feared God, conforming themselves unto his will in all things; assuring them that if they persisted in the same, God would give them victory over their enemies, and all the happiness of this life: but if they forsook the service of God, they should fall into so great extremity, that neither true Prophet or Priest should be found amongst them, that should instruct them in righteousness; that their Cities should be overthrown, and their Nation should be scattered over the face of the whole earth, that they should live like Wanderers and Vagabonds. In the mean while therefore, while they had time, he counselled them to live uprightly, wishing them that they would not deprive themselves of that favour which God bare unto them. When the King and all the people heard these words, they were very joyful, and every one was careful to serve God. The King also sent out certain Deputies over the Countrey, who were commanded to see the laws duly executed. In this state were the affairs of Asa King of the two Tribes.

Now will I return to Basa King of Israel, who (having slain Nadab the son of Jeroboam) usurped the Kingdom. He made his abode in the City of Thersa, and reigned four and twenty years, shewing himself more wicked, than either Jeroboam or his son had been. He miserably oppressed his Subjects, and by his blasphemies dishonoured the Name of God, who sent the Prophet Gimon unto him, to foretell him, that his whole race should perish, and that his house should be persecuted with as many miseries as himself had inflicted on Jeroboams posterity: because that having received the government from God, he shewed himself ungrateful unto him for his goodness, and governed his people iniquously and unjustly: whereas justice and piety are both profitable unto those that practise them, and well-pleasing unto God. Moreover, in that he had conformed him-himself in his life, to the dissolute course that Jeroboam used, and had given himself over to follow the same vices, he might deservedly expect to suffer the same punishment. Although Basfa heard all those evils (that should shortly fall on him and his posterity, by reason of his wickedness) yet he redeemed not the time, nor endeavoured to obtain pardon of God, by repenting himself of his sins; but he continued still to engage himself further than before in all sorts of wickedness, and became worse and worse, to the utter ruine and confusion both of him and his household. In the end he assembled an Army, and assailed Ramath once more, which was a great City, some four Leagues distant from Jerusalem; which he took, placed a Garrison therein, and fortified it, with a resolution, from thence to make his inroads into Asa's Kingdom. But Asa fearing the invasion of his Enemy, and considering that the Soldiers who were left in Ramath, did grievously pillage the adjacent Countries, sent Ambassadors to the King of Damascus with gold and silver, to induce him to become an Associate in the War, and to renew that amity between them, which was begun betwixt their Fathers. The King graciously received those treasures that were sent him, and made a league with him, and break the truce which he had made with Basfa: so that he sent the Governours of his Dominions against those Cities that were under Basfa's subjection, with a commandment that they should destroy them.

Of these they burnt some, and rancked others, amongst which were Gelam, Dan, and Abelma. Which when the King of Israel understood, he gave over the fortifying of Ramath, and with all expedition turn'd to yield those of his subjects his assistance, who were assaulted by the Enemy. But Asa in the mean while built two strong Towns, Gabath and Maspha, of the materials which Basfa had prepared to build withal. Basfa afterwards (prevented by death) had no more opportunity to make War against Asa. He was buried in the City of Asane, and his Son Ela succeeded him in his Kingdom: who, after he had reigned two years, was traitorously slain by Zamri, a Captain of half his Horsemen. For whilst Ela banquetted with Ofa, who was the steward of his house, Zamri wrought so effectually, that he persuaded some of his horsemen to assault Ela, who at that time was alone, and destitute of his Guards, because all his Soldiers were at the siege of Gabathan, a City of the Philistines.

C H A P. VII.

Basfa's Offspring being extinct, Zamri reigned in Israel; and after him Amri, and his son Achab.

AFTER that Ela was slain, Zamri took the Kingdom upon him, and wholly rooted out Basfa's posterity (according as the Prophet Gimon had foretold.) For after the same manner was his Family utterly overthrown for their impiety; as Jeroboams progeny was extinguish'd for their iniquity (as we have before declar'd.) For the Army which besieged Gabathan, hearing news of the Kings death, and that Zamri had murder'd him, and seized the Kingdom, they made Amri General of the Army, and anointed him for their King: who raising the siege before Gabathan, came before the Royal City of Thersa, which he besieged, and took by force. Zamri seeing the City destitute of defence, had retired himself into the most secret place of the Palace; where setting it on fire, he burnt both himself and it, after he had reigned seven days. Suddenly after this, the Israelites fell at variance amongst themselves, because some of them thought to prefer Ithaman to the Kingdom, and others were wholly addicted to Amri; but they of Amri's side had the better: and being of the better sort, slew Ithaman, and made Amri Sovereign over the people. The thirteenth year of Asa, Amri began his Reign, and was King for twelve years space; six years govern'd he in Thersa, and six in Maroon, (which the Greeks Neall Samaria) himself imposed this name of Samaria, from the name of him whom he purchased the Mountain, on which he built this City. He differ'd in nothing from the other Kings his predecessors, but in that he was worse than any of them; for there was nothing which he left unattempted, that by daily impieties he might alienate the people from God. For which cause God being displeas'd, exterminated him and his posterity from the face of the Earth. This Amri dyed in Samaria, and Achab his Son was his Successor.

Hereby a Man may easily perceive, what care the Divine Majesty hath of humane affairs, and how he loveth the virtuous, and utterly rooteth out the vicious. For the Kings of Israel, through their impiety, in a short and successive course, the one after the other were cut off, and confounded with all their Families. But Asa (King of Jerusalem; and the two Tribes) living happily in the favour of God, for his piety and justice, attained to a reverend and old age: and after he had reigned one and forty years, he dyed a good death.

death: and after his death, Jehoshaphat his son (whom he begat on his Wife Abida) succeeded him; who, in all things that concern'd piety or fortitude, seem'd to emulate and equal his Grandfather David: according as it shall be declar'd hereafter. But Achab, King of Israel, made his abode in Samarina, and govern'd the Kingdom for the space of 22 years, without any alteration of those ordinances which his progenitors, Kings of Israel, had established; but that he exceeded them daily in wickedness. For he imitated all their impieties, (but especially the Apostasy of Jeroboam) for he adored those Calves that were erected by him; and besides that, he added far worse impieties than the former. He took to wife Jezabel the daughter of Ithobal King of the Tyrians and Sidonians, of whom he learnt to adore the Gods of her Nation: for she was a buisie and audacious woman, and so insolent, that she feared not to take a Temple in honour of Bell, the God of the Tyrians, and to plant a Grove furnish'd with all kind of Trees, and to ordain Priests and false Prophets also, in honour of that God. The King also took delight to have these Men oftentimes about him, exceeding all other Kings before him in madness and malice. To him came a certain Prophet named Elias, sent by Almighty God, that was born in Theston in Galaad, telling him that he fore-prophesied, that neither dew nor rain should fall on the Earth a long time, until that himself, who was prepar'd to depart from him, should appear again unto him: And binding the same with an oath, (for the better confirmation thereof) he retir'd himself to the Southward, where he liv'd by a certain River, from whence he fetcht his drink: for his meat was daily brought him by Ravens.

Now when the River, through want of rain, was grown dry, God commanded him to repair unto Sarepta, (a City not far from Sidon and Tyre, and situate in the midst between them both) where he should find a Widow-woman, who would furnish him with food. As soon therefore as he drew near unto the gate, he saw a Woman that lived by her labour, gathering of sticks, and God gave him to understand that it was she to whom he was sent. Whereupon he came unto her and saluted her, praying her that she would bring him some water to cool his thirst; and as she was ready to depart, he called her back again, and willed her to bring him some bread also. Whereupon she swore unto him, that she had nothing in her house but an handful of flower, and a little oyl, and that she was come forth to gather sticks, to the end the might bake the same, and make bread for her self and her Son; and when they had eaten the same, they must needs perish through famine, because they had not any thing more left. Go, said the Prophet, and be of good courage, and conserve better hopes; and when thou hast prepared meat for me, bring it;
for I will thee, that thy flower shall not fail, nor thy pot of oyl be empty, until God send rain upon the earth. When the Prophet had spoken thus, she approach'd unto him, and perform'd that which he commanded, and she herself had sufficient to feed upon, and she gave the rest unto her son, and to the Prophet: so that they wanted nothing, so long as the drought continued.

Menander maketh mention of this great drought, in the acts of Ithobal King of the Ty-rians, speaking after this manner: In this time there was a season without rain, from the Month of October, until October in the next year after; whereupon the Prince caused prayers and supplications to be made, which were follow'd with great store of Thunder.
He built the City of Borris in Phenicia, and Auzate in Lybia. Doubtless he expressed herby the drought that hapned in Achab's time: for about that time, Ithobal reigned over the Tyrians, as Menander testifieth in his History. The Woman (of whom we have spoken heretofore, that entertained the Prophet) seeing her son fallen sick, and lying fensible, as if he had been already dead, or yielding up the ghost, wept, and break out into too great a passion, that she forbore not to say, that the cause of her misfortune was, in that the Prophet was come into her house, and had discover'd her sins; and that he had been the cause, that God for her punishment, had taken away her only son. But he comforted her, and willed her to be of good courage, and commanded her to bring the child unto him, assuring her that he would restore him to life.

Now when he had brought him, he took the child, and carried him into his lodging, and hid him on his bed, and cryed unto God, saying, That since the loss of her only son seem'd to be but an unequal recompence unto her that had so charitably received him, he therefore besought him, that he would command the soul to return into the body, and restore life unto the Infant. Whereupon, God having compassion on the Mother, and being willing to gra-tifie the Prophet, and to the intent that no man might suppose that he came unto her to prejudice her, he restored the child to life, beyond all expectation. For which, the mother gave thanks unto the Prophet, saying, That by this means, she was thoroughly persuaded, that God had spoken unto him. Not long after, he sought out Achab, according as God had commanded him, to let him know that he should have rain. At that time the famine reigned reigned over the whole Countrey, and there was great want of necessary Victuals; so that men did not only faint for want of Bread, but the Earth also for want of Rain, could not bring forth that which was requisite for the sustenance of Horses, and other Cattel. The King therefore calling Obadiab unto him (who was the Master of his Herds) he commanded him that he should each way seek out for Fountains and Brooks, willing him, that if he found out any Grasse, he should mow the same, and give it to his Cattel for their sustenance. And whereas by his command the Prophet Elias was sought in divers places, and could not be found, he appointed Obadiab also to follow him. So taking both of them several ways, the King followed one, and the Master of the Cattel another.

This Obadiab was a godly and virtuous man, who, when the Prophets were put to death, hid one hundred of them in Caves, and furnish'd them with Bread and Water.
After this man departed from the King, Elias met him, and he ask'd Elias what he was:
which when he had told him, he humbled himself on his face before him. Elias commanded him to go unto the King, and to let him know, that he was nigh at hand. Obadiab ask'd him, Wherein he had offended him, that he should desire to put him upon so allon that might occasion the loss of his Life: For there was not any freight, whether he sent some of his men to find out Elias, with charge, that if they found him, they should put him to death. Now it may be (said he) that wilt thou repair unto the King, the Spirit of God shall carry thee away: the King not finding thee here, and frustrate of his desire, will revenge himself on me.
Nevertheless you may, if you please, save my life; and I conjure thee by the Kindness which I have shewn to an hundred Prophets, such as thou art, whom I have delivered from the fury of Jezabel, and taken care to preserve in Caves until this day. Notwithstanding all these words, Elias commanded him to go unto the King, and to cast off all fear, swearing unto him by an oath, how that that day he would make himself known unto Achab.

When Obadiab had told the King that Elias was at hand, Achab went out to meet him, and being full of Indignation, said unto him, Is it thou that heapest so much Mischief on the Hebrews heads? Art thou the man that art the cause of this sterility? To whom Elias replied, That it was he and his race that were the occasions of these Mischiefs, because they had brought strange Gods into their Countrey, whom they adored, and had forsaken the true God, who was, and is only to be worshipped. He therefore willed him presently to assemble all the people on mount Carmel, and bring with him his wife and her Prophets, whose number he reckon'd up: the Prophets likewise of the Woods, who were in number four hundred. When therefore all of them being summoned by the King, were gathered together in that place, Elias stood up in the midst of them, and said, How long will ye continue in this uncertainty, whom ye ought to follow? For if you think that the Hebrews God is the true and only God, whom ye follow him not, and why keep you not his Commandments: But if you think that the honour belongeth not to him, but to foreign Gods, follow them. When Elias perceiv'd that the people replied nothing hereunto, he proceeded: For an undeniable proof whereby ye may be satisfied which is the most powerful, either that God which I worship, or those false ones which ye are perjured to follow; and which is the true Religion, that which I profess, or that which is professed by these 400 Prophets, I will take an Ox and kill it, and lay it upon the wood, without putting any fire thereto to consume the Sacrifice; and they also shall do the like, and call upon their gods, and beseech them to send down fire to consume their sacrifice: which if they shall do, and confirm the same by a miracle, then shall we know that they are true gods.

This Proposal of his was generally approved. Whereupon, Elias commanded the false Prophets first of all to chuse an Ox, and to kill it, and afterwards to call upon their gods; and when it manifestly appear'd, that their Prayer was of no force, Elias began to mock them, saying, Why call you not out upon your Gods with a loud voice: for it may be they are on some voyage, or else haply they sleep. Whilst thus they had invocated from the morning till mid-day (cutting themselves with Knives and Lances, according to the custom of their Countrey) Elias that was to make his Sacrifice, commanded the false Prophets to stand aside, and the people to draw near unto him, and observe, for fear lest secretly he should convey fire under the Wood. When the people approached, he took twelve stones, according to the number of the twelve Tribes of Israel, and made an Altar, and digged a deep trench round about it; and afterwards heaping Wood upon the Altar, and laying his Sacrifice thereon, he commanded them to fill four Tuns with fountain water, and to pour it upon the Altar, that the trench might receive and drink up the Water. Which done, he began to Pray, and call upon God, beseeching him, That it might please him to manifest his power unto his people, who had so long run astray: No sooner had he finished his Prayer, but fire fell from Heaven upon the Altar, in the sight of all the people, and consumed all the Sacrifice; so that the Water was dried up. Which when the Israelites beheld, they fell down on their Faces upon the Earth, adoring one only God:

God: confessing him to be the most mighty and only true God, and that all other were A but vain and imaginary Names of Idols, which were without Holiness or Power; and laying hands themselves upon their false Prophets, they slew them by the Commandment of Elias. He willed the King also to depart, and take his refectory, and to take care for nothing, because he should very shortly see that God would send him Rain; and thus departed Achab from him. But Elias went up to the top of Mount Carmel and sat him down on the ground, leaning his head upon his knees: whilst he thus sat, he commanded his Servant to get upon a certain Rock, and look toward the Sea; and to tell him if he saw any Clouds to arise in any part (for till that time the Air had been always clear.) His Servant having often gone up to the top of the Rock, and told that he saw nothing, at length going up the seventh time, in descending, he brought him this News, that he saw some black appearance in the Air, not much unlike to a mans foot-step. When Elias understood this, he sent unto Achab, wishing him to retire himself within the City before the Rain fell; who had no sooner recover'd the City Jezabel, but that the Air was presently cover'd with thick Clouds, and a vehement Wind intermixt with Rain, fell upon the Earth, and the Prophet seized by the Spirit of God, ran with the Kings Chariot as far as Jezabel a City of Affer. When Jezabel Achab's Wife, had notice what Miracles Elias had perform'd, and how he had slain her Prophets; she was displeased and sent Messengers unto him, threatening him in like sort to revenge her self on him; as he had slain her Prophets. Which Elias fearing, fled into the City of Bersabee, which is upon the Borders of the Tribe of Judah, bounding upon Jadamsa: in which place he left his Servant, and retired himself into the Desert: where whilst he prayed God that he would take him out of the World, he fell asleep under a certain Tree, and after he was awaked, he arose, and found Bread and Water ready prepared by him. When he had eaten, and was refreshed, he went unto Mount Sinai (where it is said that Moses received the Law from God) where finding out an hollow Cave, he entered into it, and remained therein. And being demanded by a certain Voice which spake unto him, he knew not from whence, Wherefore he remained in that place and forsok the City? He answer'd, Because he had slain the Prophets of the false gods, and because he had persuaded the people, that there was but one only God, who ought to be honoured by all men, and that for this cause he was sought for by the Kings wife, that he might be put to death. The Voice replied again, and commanded him to shew himself openly, assuring him, that he should understand that which it behooved him to perform.

Hereupon as soon it was day, he forsook the Cave, and perceiv'd the earth to tremble under his feet: and after all things were appeased, the Voice which proceeded he knew not from whence, willed him, That he should in no way be discomfited with that which he saw: for that no one of his Enemies should have power to hurt him, charging him to return unto his house, to the intent to proclaim Jeshu the Son of Nimshi King of the people, and Azazel of Damascus King of the Syrians, assuring him, that in his place, Elizeus of the City of Abela should be Prophet, and that the wicked People should be destroyed, the one by Azazel, and the other by Jeshu. When Elias heard those things, he returned into the Country of the Hebrews, and met Elizeus the Son of Saphat at the Cart, and with him divers others, driving before them twelve Couple of Oxen: he came near him, and cast upon him his Garment, and he instantly began thereupon to Prophesize, so that forsaking his Oxen, he followed Elias. Yet required he; that before his departure, he might take leave of his Parents; which when he had perform'd, he committed them unto God, and followed Elias, attending on him, during all his life, like his Disciple and Servant. This issue had the affairs of this so excellent a Prophet. But a certain Citizen, called Naboth, of the City of Azar, had a Vineyard near unto the Lands of Achab, who required him to sell him the same, at what price he thought convenient, to the intent he might annex it to his own Lands, and make them one possession; wishing him, that if he would not sell it him for Silver, to choose in exchange thereof, any one field of his which he liked best. Naboth answer'd him, That he would not do it, but that he intended to gather the fruit of his own Land himself, which he had received as an inheritance from his Father. The King no less troubled with the repulse, than if he had lost his own Inheritance, would neither wail, nor receive any sustenance. Whereupon Jezabel his Wife inquired after the cause of his Discontent, and how it came to pass, that he neither wail'd, nor eat: he told her of Naboth's rude behaviour, and how having offer'd all just and reasonable Composition, he could not obtain what he requested. Hereupon Jezabel willed him to be of good cheer, advised him to continue his ordinary Entertainment, because she her self would take upon her to revenge him on Naboth. Whereupon she presently sent Letters in Achab's Name to the Governours of the Country, whereby she enjoyed them to celebrate a Fast, and to assemble the People, charging them, that in that place Naboth should have a seat prepared for him, him, by reason of his birth and equality; willing them afterwards, that forbearing three false Witnesses to depose against him, that he had blasphemed God and the King, they should by this means cause him to be stoned and put to death by the People. All which was performed according as the Queen had written, and Naboth (accused by false witnesses for scandalizing God and the King) was stoned by the People, and put to death. When Jezabel had tydings herof, she repaired to the King's presence, and told him, That he should enjoy Naboth's Vineyard, and distribute nothing for it.

But God displeased with this her wickedness, sent the Prophet Elias purposely to meet Achab in Naboth's ground, and to tell him, That he unjustly possessed the lawful inheritance of another, whom he had put to death. As soon as the King perceived that he came unto him, supposing it to be unseemly for a King to be reproved, he first of all confessed his fault, and offer'd him to make restitution according as he should think fit. Then did the Prophet foretell, That in the same place where Naboth's Carcase was consumed by Dogs, that both his and his Queen's blood should be shed, and that all his Race should be destroyed; for that they durst commit such an impiety, and so wickedly murder (against all Law) so good and innocent a Man. These words made so great an impression upon Achab, that he repented him of the offence he had committed: so that apparelling himself in sackcloth, and walking barefoot, he tasted not any meat, but confessed his sins, with hopes to appease God's wrath. Whereupon God certified him by the Prophet, That during his life-time, the punishment of his Race should be deferred, because he had repented him of his misdeeds: but that the threats and menaces should take effect in his sons time.

C H A P. VIII.

Adad King of Damascus and Syria, fighteth two several Battels with Achab, and is overthrown by him.

WHILST Achab's affairs were after this manner disposed, the son of Adad (that reigned over the Syrians; and those of Damascus) assembled the Forces of his whole Country, and associated with him two and thirty other Kings, with whom he came and made War against Achab. Who being far inferior to him in power, came not into the open field to bid him battle, but closing up his Soldiers in his strongest Cities, he himself retired into Samiria, (which was begirt with a very strong wall, and very hard to be taken.) For which cause the Syrian (taking his Army with him) came to Samaria, and encamping before it, intended to batter the City. But first of all he sent a Herald to Achab, to require him to give audience to his Ambassadors which he would send unto him, by whom he should be certified what his resolution was. As soon as the King of Jezabel had granted them free access, the Ambassadors came, and (according to the Kings directions) required that Achab's Goods, his Children and Wife should be at Adad's command: which if he would yield to, and suffer him to take so many as he pleased, he would raise the siege, and batter the City no more. Achab gave the Ambassadors order to certify the King of Syria, that both himself, and all whatsoever was his, was at his command. Upon which answer, the King sent a second Message unto Achab, enjoining him the next day to admit such of his Servants as he should send unto him, to search his Royal Palace, and the houses of his friends and kinsmen, and take from thence that which they liked best.

Achab amazed at this second Embassy of the King of Syria, assembled his People, and let them know, that he was ready to deliver up into the Enemies hands his wives and his children, for their safety and repose, and to abandon all that likewise which was in his possession; (for the Syrian had demanded no less at his hands in his first Embassy.) But that now he required that his Servants might be admitted to ransack all their houses, to the end they may leave nothing therein that was of any value, making it hereby appear to the world, that he had no intent to make Peace, since that after the Syrian was sensible that Achab's tenderness for his Subjects security, had prevail'd so far with him, as to grant him whatsoever belonged peculiarly to himself, he sought nevertheless an occasion of a breach, by demanding liberty to seize upon their Properties; notwithstanding that he would do whatsoever they should think good of. To this the People answer'd, That they could not endure that any of his demands should be listened unto, or respected; but that the King should prepare for War. Whereupon he called for the Ambassadors, and dismissed them with this answer, That they should report unto their Master, that Achab agreed unto those things which were required, (because he desired the happiness of his Subjects:) and thus sent he touching his second demand, that he would no ways descend thereunto: and thus sent he them away. When Adad heard this answer, he was moved, and sent unto Achab the third time, threatening him, That his Soldiers should make a bulwark higher than the walls (so so much trusted in) sea, though only each of them should bring but an handful of earth with them; (which boast he used to terrify him, and to expels thereby how great a multitude of Men he had to oppose against him.) But Ahab answered, That he ought not to glory in his Army, but in those actions that should determine the War. When the Ambassadors were returned back, they found the King at dinner with two and thirty Kings his Allies, to whom they made report of Ahab's answer. Hereupon Adad gave commandment to begin the City with Palliades, and to raise bulwarks of earth, and to strengthen the siege. Whilst these things were in hand, Ahab was grievously troubled, and all the People with him: but at length he grew confident, and cast off all his fear, through the arrival of a certain Prophet, who said unto him, That God promised to deliver all those thousands of Soldiers, and his Enemies, which he beheld, into his hands. The same Prophet being afterwards asked, By whose means this victory might be gained? He said, That it should be by the Sons of the Governours, whom the King himself should lead forth. Ahab therefore calling unto him the Governours Sons, found that their number amounted to 232; and having notice that the Syrians intended nought else but pleasure and banquetting, he opened the City-gates, and sent these young Men out against them. Now when the Centinels of the adverse part had discovered them, they certified Adad thereof, who sent out certain Soldiers against them, commanding them, That if they were come out in warlike sort to bid the battle, they should bring them unto him fast bound; and if they came in peace, they should do the like. Now Ahab had within the City ranged another Army, and kept them in a readines. When therefore the young Men had charged the Syrian guard, and slain a great number of them, and had pursued the rest even unto their own Camp, Ahab giving his present victory and advantage, caused his whole Army to fall forth; who flying an unexpected charge upon the Enemies, discomfited the Syrians, (who little expected such a stratagem from the Hebrews) and assailed them disarmed and drunken: so that they left both armour and weapons behind them, and fled from their Camp; and their King likewise was so hotly pursued, that he scarcely had opportunity to save himself by the swiftness of his Horse. Ahab made a long chase in following the Syrians, and slaughtering them that fled; he spoiled their Camp likewise, and carried thence great riches, and an huge quantity of gold and silver. He took Adad's Chariots and Horses also, and with them returned back into the City.

But whereas by the advice of the said Prophet, he was perswaded to prepare and keep an Army in readines against the next year, (for that the Syrians were resolved to assault him again) the King omitted no preparation that concerned the War. For Adad (being escaped from the fight with those few Forces that remained after the battle) consulted with his friends, how he might war against the Israelites. Who advised him from thenceforth, never more to fight with them in mountainous places, for that their God was powerful upon the Mountains, and for that cause they had been overcome by them: but if he fought with them in the Plain, both he and his should be assured to have the upper hand. Moreover, they counselled him, that he should dismiss those Kings that he had confederated with him, to the end that each of them might return into his own Country, and that in their stead he should retain their Forces, over which he should ordain Chieftains; besides, (to supply their places that were lost) they advised him to levy Horsemen and Chariots thorow all his Country. Adad supposing that they had discreetly counselled him in this matter, ordered his Army according as they had advised. And as soon as the Spring was come, he assembled his Army, and led them forth against the Israelites; and coming near unto the City of Aphe, he encamped in a plain field. But Ahab with his Forces marching out to meet him, pitched his Tents near unto him, although he was far inferior both in force and number. To him the Prophet appeared again, telling him, That God would once more give him the victory, to make it known, that his power was not only in the Mountains (as the Syrians persuaded themselves) but in the Plains also. Thus continued both the Armies, and encamped the one against the other, for the space of six days. On the seventh, when the Enemy forsook their Trenches early in the morning, and placed themselves in battel-array, Ahab drew out his Army and faced them, and presently charged them: where after a long and dangerous fight between them, the Enemies were put to flight, and many of them slain in the chase. For some of them were intangled with their own Chariots, others flew those of their own party, and some few of them found the means to fly unto their City of Aphe, who perished likewise to the number of seven and twenty thousand (being slain by the walls that fell upon them) besides One hundred thousand Men that perished in the fight. But Adad, attended by some of his principal Officers, went and hid himself in a Cave under the ground; and they representing unto him, that the Kings of Israel were merciful, and that there was hope of pardon to be had (if after the manner of Suppliants they sent unto him) Adad permitted them. Whereupon they incontinently presented themselves to Ahab clothed in Sack-

H sackcloth, with Ropes about their Necks; (according to the manner of Suppliants amongst the Syrians) telling him, That Adad besought his Majesty to grant him his Life; promising on his behalf, that from thenceforth he would always continue his Servant, and acknowledge his favour. Ahab answered them, That he was very glad that their King was as yet alive, and had escaped from the fury of the fight offering him, by them, that kindness which one Brother ought to show unto another. And Iware unto them, that he should offer him no wrong, if he discovered himself unto him. Whereupon, they brought him from the place where he was hidden, and presented him unto Ahab, who was mounted upon a Chariot. Adad prostrated himself before him: but Ahab stretching out his hand, made him come up unto him into his Chariot, and killed him to be of good Courage, assuring him, That he should be no otherwise treated by him than as became the dignity of a King. Hereupon Adad gave him thanks, protesting, That during his life-time, he would never be forgetful of his Favours: promising him moreover, to restore unto him those Cities which his Predecessors, Kings of Syria, had taken from the Israelites; and that he should have as free access to Damascus, as to Samaria. After this Treaty confirmed by oath, Ahab gave him many worthy presents, and sent him back into his Kingdom. Thus ended the War betwixt Adad and the King of the Israelites. After this, a certain Prophet called Michas, came unto another Israelite, commanding him to wound him upon the head, assuring him, That God was so pleased, and had so commanded him. When this Israelite would in no sort condescend hereunto, he prophesied unto him, That since he had disobeyed God's Commandment, he should meet with a Lion, which should rent him in pieces. Which coming to pass, according as it was foretold, the Prophet addressed himself again unto another, commanding him to do the like: and when he had wounded him in the head, he bound up the wound, and came unto the King, telling him, That he had been in the Wars, and had received a Prisoner in charge from his Captain's hands, and that (his Prisoner being fled from him) he feared lest he that had committed him to his charge, should for that cause take his Life from him; the rather, for that he threatened no less. Ahab answered him, That he was justly condemned. Whereupon, Michas discovered his head, and made it known who he was. And to this intent used the Prophet this Artifice, that his Words might be of greater force and value. For he told the King, That God would chastise him because he had permitted the Blasphemer Adad to depart unpunished; assuring him, That God would cause him to be slain by Adad, and suffer the People of Israel to be slaughtered by the Syrian Army. The King displeased with the liberty and free speech of the Prophet, commanded him to be cast into Prison; and being vehemently affrighted with this his Prediction, he departed home unto his House.

CHAP. IX.

The exemplary Piety of Jehoshaphat King of Juda, his Prosperity, his military Power. He marrieth Joram his Son, to a Daughter of Ahab King of Israel, and assisteth him with his Forces against Adad King of Syria.

Hitherto have we spoken of Ahab, but now I must return unto Jehoshaphat King of Jerusalem; who having enlarged his Kingdom, and planted Garisons in those Cities that were subject unto him, (and in those likewise which his Grandfather Abiah had possessed in the Tribe of Ephraim; at such time as Jeroboam reigned over the ten Tribes) the King had perpetual assistance and favour at God's hands, in that he was a just and virtuous Prince, studying day and night for nothing more than how he might please and honour God. The Kings, his Neighbours, round about him, honoured him with Presents: so that his Riches and Reputation were very great. In the third year of his Reign, he assembled the Governors and Priests of his Country, enjoining them to ride their Circuit about the Provinces, and to teach the Inhabitants of every City the Law of Moses, training them up in the observance thereof, and in the study of Piety. Which all the Citizens embraced and entertained so willingly, that they seemed to emulate and strive one with the other, which of them should exceed the rest in the Service of God. The Nations likewise that dwelt round about him, loved Jehoshaphat, and were at peace with him. The Philistines also payed those Tributes which were imposed on them. And the Arabians furnished him every year with six hundred and threescore Lambs, and the like number of Horses. He fortified also other great Cities of importance, and made preparation of Munition of War and Arms against the Enemy. He mustered in the Tribe of Juda three hundred thousand Men, over whom he placed Elisha General, and two hundred thousand under the Conduct of Johanan, who besides these, had two hundred thousand Archers on foot of the Tribe of Benjamin.

Another Chieftain called Ochobas, levied and led for the King one hundred and fourscore thousand Men armed at all points, (besides those which he sent into fenced Cities.)
 He married his Son Foram to Athalta the Daughter of Achab King of the ten Tribes.
 And not long after (reforting to Samarita) Achab received him very courteously, and magnificently entertained his Army with bread, wine and flesh in abundance; desiring him to yield him his assistance against the King of Syria, to the intent he might recover the City of Ramath in the Country of Galaad, which Adad's Father had won, and conquered from his Father. Jehoshaphat promised to assist him; and being no ways inferior unto him in force, he sent his Army from Jerusalem to Samarita. When these two Kings were departed out of the City, and each of them were seated upon their Thrones, they distributed their Pay to every one of their Soldiers. At that time Jehoshaphat commanded, That if at that present there were as yet any Prophets amongst them, they might be sent for to give notice what the issue should be of this their War against the Syrians: and whether they thought it good to make War against them, by reason at that time there was amity and peace betwixt Achab and the Syrians, confirmed for the space of three years, since the time that he took Adad Prisoner, and delivered him.

C H A P. X.

Achab fighteth against the Syrians, and is overcome and slain in the battel.

*H*ereupon Achab called for the Prophets, (who were in number four hundred) and commanded them to enquire of God, Whether he would give him the victory in that War which he undertook against Adad? And whether he should recover the City which he en-tended to besiege? Who answered and counselled him to hazard the Battel: For he should overcome the Syrian, and should take him Prisoner as he had done before. Jehoshaphat understanding by their words that they were false Prophets, asked Achab, If he had not any other Prophet of God, who might more exactly certify him of that which should follow? Achab answered, That he had none as yet remaining, but that he hated him, because he prophesied nought else but mischief and misery unto him, and had foretold him, That if he should fight against the Syrians, he should be overcome and slain; and for that cause he held him at that time in Prison, signifying unto him, that his name was Micheas the son of Imlah. Jehoshaphat defined that he might be brought into his presence, which was accordingly performed by one of his Eunuchs; who by the way certified Micheas, That all the other Prophets had prophesied to the King victory. But Micheas told him, That it was not lawful for him to be against God, but that it concerned him to speak that which God should inform him of, concerning the King. As soon as he came before Achab, and was adjured to speak the truth, he said, That God had bowed him the Israelites put to flight, and dispersed by the Syrians, that pursued them no otherwise than Sheep without their Shepherd. All which signifieth no less, (said he) but that the rest of the people returning home in safety, Achab only should be slain in the battel.
 When Micheas had spoken after this manner, Achab turning himself towards Jehoshaphat, said unto him, I told you before, how this fellow was affected towards me. But Micheas constantly avowed, That he prophesied nothing but that which God had commanded him to speak, assuring Achab that he was solicited by the false Prophets unto War, under hope of victory, whereas he should assuredly perish in the battel. These words of his made Achab much discomfited. But Sedechias, one of the false Prophets, stepped forth, and exhorted him to set light by Micheas's words, because he spake untruly. And for confirmation of this, he appealed to Elias, (who was a far more skilful Prophet in foretelling things to come, than Micheas was) yet that the same Elias had foretold, that the Dogs should lick Achab's blood in the City of Jerusalem in the field of Naboth, because Naboth had been stoned to death at the instance of Achab. Whereby it appeared manifestly, that since he contradicted a Prophet so excellent as he was, he lied, in saying that the King should die within three days. Moreover,
 (said he) it shall appear whether he be truly sent from God or no, if as soon as he shall receive a buffet from me, he cause my hand to wither, according as Isaiah made Jeroboam's hand shrink, at such time as he thought to apprehend him. For I think (said he) O King, that thou art assuredly informed hereof: which said, he struck him; and because no incon-veniency fell upon him, by reason of that his audacious attempt, Achab assured himself, and recovered his Courage, and set forth against the Syrian Army. For as it is to be supposed, the Will of God was such, that it caused the false Prophets to triumph over the true; which was the cause that the false Prophets were trusted more than the true, to the intent that God's preordained Will might be fulfilled.
 But Sedechias made him iron horns, and said unto Achab, that God by them signified unto him, that he should lay waste all Syria; but Micheas prophesied to the contrary, that Within very few days Sedechias should walk from Cave to Cave to hide himself, and avoid the punishment of his fallhood. Achab displeased hereby, commanded that he should be led thence, and kept Prisoner with Achmon the Governor of the City, allowing him nothing but bread and water for his sustenance. Thus marched these two Kings with their Armies against Ramath which is in Galaad: which when the King of Syria understood, he drew his Army into the field, and came out to meet them; and encamped near unto Ramath. Now it was concluded betwixt these two confederate Kings, that Achab should enter the battel in a private habit, and Jehoshaphat should be invested with the Royal ornaments, and supply Achab's place, to the intent that Micheas's prediction might be made frustrate. But notwithstanding this disguise, Gods justice prevented him: for Adad King of Syria commanded his Army, that they should put no one of the Enemy to the sword, but only the King of Israel.

As soon as the battel was begun, the Syrians perceiving Jehoshaphat in the front of the Army, and conjecturing that it was Achab, they made head all together against him, and having invironed and pressed him very nearly, they perceived that it was not he: for which cause they retired back again. But although they had fought from the Morning until the evening, and had the upper hand; yet slew they no man (because they fought after no other but Achab to put him to the sword) whom notwithstanding they could by no means meet withal. At length, one of Adad's servants called Aman, shot at random amongst the Enemies, and hurt Achab in the breast, and shot him thorow the lungs.
 This hurt of his concealed he from his Soldiers, for fear lest they should be discomfited.
 For which cause, he commanded his servant to drive his Chariot out of the Battel, for that he felt himself mortally wounded: and although he were in much pain, yet fate heia his Chariot until Sun-set, at which time he gave up the ghost. When night came, the Syrian Army withdrew themselves into their Camp, and receiving tydings by an Herald, that Achab was dead, every one retired home unto his house: but Achab's body was conveyed to Samarita, and interred in that place. As for his Chariot, it was washed in the fountain of Jerusalem, because it was bloody, by reason of the Kings hurt, whereon, by the truth of Elias's Prediction was ratified and confirmed, for the Dogs lickt his blood, and from that time forward, the common women continually washed themselves in that fountain: he dyed also in Ramath (according as Micheas had prophesied.) Whereas therefore all things fell unto Achab, according as two Prophets had foretold him, it ap-peareth that we ought to honour and magnifie the Majesty of God, and to reverence his Prophesies, and to ascribe always more credit unto them, than to the vain and plausible speech of flatterers; and no less to respect them, than things of infinite profit, since by them we are divinely admonished what we ought to take heed of. It behoveth us also to consider what force the Decree of God is of, by examining those things which befall Achab. For it is impossible to avoid what God has fore-ordain'd, notwithstanding that Men flatter themselves with vain hopes, which inveigle them so far, that finally they are overtaken in the snares thereof. For this careless inconsideration was fatal to King Achab, for that he believed not his death which was foretold him; but being deceived by the flattering persuasions of false Prophets, ran headlong upon his own danger and ruine. After him succeeded his son Ochozias.

Joram, Achabs Son, overcometh the Moabites in battel.

2 Chron. 19. 2.
Ver. 2.

Jehu the Prophet reprehended Joram for helping Achab.

Jehoshaphat re- neweth the true service of God.

Ver. 5.
Jehoshaphat placed Judges and Magistrates in every City.

As soon as King Jehoshaphat was returned back again to Jerusalem (from the war wherein he had assisted Achab against Adad the King of Syria, as we have before related) the Prophet Jehu (in his return) came forth and met him, and reproved him, because he had given Achab who had been an impious man) his assistance, assuring him that God was displeased with that his confederacy; yet notwithstanding that he of his goodness had delivered him from his Enemies, although he had provoked him to anger. After this admonition, Jehoshaphat began to offer sacrifices, and thanksgivings, and peace offerings unto God: Which done, he rode in progress about those Countries that were under his Dominion, giving order that the people should be instructed in those ordinances which were delivered from God by the hands of Moses, and exhorted his Subjects to the Practice of Piety. He placed Judges likewise in every City, commanding them to execute justice without respect of persons. He charged them likewise, that they should not be corrupted with rewards, or seduced by Dignity, Riches, or Nobility; but that they should do justice indifferently to all men, knowing that God seeth all things, how secretly soever they be carried or contrived. Having in this sort ordered every thing in each City of the two Tribes, he returned again to Jerusalem, where he likewise chose Judges from amongst the Priests and Levites, and the Elders among the people; exhorting them in all things to give upright and just judgement. And if they of other Cities had any causes of greater consequence (which should be referred to their final determination) he charged them indifferently to decide them: for that it was very convenient that the most uncorrupt sentences should be delivered in that City, where God had his temple, and the King made his ordinary abode. Over all these he placed his two friends, Amasias the Priest, and Zabadias, of the Tribe of Juda. After this manner did the King order his affairs.

About this time the Moabites and Ammonites (with their confederates, a great number of Arabians) assaulted and assembled themselves against him, and incamped themselves near unto Engaddi (a City situate near unto the Lake Asphaltites, and distant from Jerusalem three hundred furlongs) in which place flourished those goodly and whole- some

In some Palm-trees, whence distilled the pure and perfect Balm. When Jehoshaphat had intelligence that the Enemies had past the Lake, and were already entered into his Countrey, he was afraid and assembled the people of Jerusalem in the Temple, and standing up, and turning his face toward the Propitiary, he besought and requested God that he would give him power to overcome his Enemies. For such had been the form of their supplication, who in times past built the Temple: namely, that it might please him to fight for that City, and oppose himself against those that durst attempt or assault that place, to dispossess them of that Countrey which he himself had given them in possession; and in pronouncing this prayer he wept, and all the people likewise, both men, women, and children, made their request unto God. Presently upon this, a certain Prophet called Jaziel arose up in the midst of the Congregation, and cried out, and assured the people and the King, that God had heard their prayers, and promised them to fight for them against their enemies, enjoying them the next day to fall out in Arms, and to make head against their adversaries, whom they should encounter in the mountain situate betwixt Jerusalem and Engaddi, in a place called the hillock of Sis (which place in Hebrew, signifieth Emptiness) willing them not to fight against them, but only to stay in that place, and see how God would fight for them. When the Prophet had spoken these words, the King and all the people prostrated themselves upon their faces giving thanks unto God; in the mean while the Levites sung Hymns, with instruments and voices. About the beginning of the day, the King departed into the desert that is under the City of Thebes, advising the people to believe all that which the Prophet had said unto them, and not to range themselves in battel-array: he commanded the Priests to march before them with their Trumpets, and the Levites that they should sing Hymns of thanksgiving unto God, as if their Countrey were already delivered from their enemies.

This advice of the Kings pleased them all; so that they performed whatsoever he counselled them. But God sent a great terror and disorder among the Barbarians: so that supposing themselves to be enemies one against the other, they slew one another in such sort, that of so great an host, there was not one that escaped. But Jehoshaphat looking down into the valley (wherein the enemies had pitched their tents) and seeing it full of dead men, rejoiced greatly at the unexpected succours that God had sent him, who had given them the Victory, not by the dint of their own Swords, but by his providence and power only. He therefore permitted his Army to pillage the enemies Camp, and to spoil the dead; and so great was the multitude of them that were slain, that they could scarcely take the spoils of them in three dayes space. On the fourth day, the people assembled together in a valley, where they blessed God for the succours he had sent them, by reason whereof the place was called the valley of Benediction. From thence the King led back his Army into Jerusalem, and for divers dayes he spent the time in offering sacrifices and making feasts. After this discomfiture of his enemies was published amongst foreign Nations they were all of them afraid, supposing that God did manifestly express his power, and extend his favour towards him. And from that time forward, Jehoshaphat lived in great glory; he likewise was a friend to the King of Israel that reigned at that time, who was Achabs Son, with whom he adventured in a voyage by Sea, intending to traffique with certain Merchants of Tarsis, but he received great loss: for his ships were cast away because they were so large, that they could not be easily governed; and for this cause he had never more mind to exercise Navigation. Hitherto have we spoken of Jehoshaphat King of Jerusalem.

But as touching Ochozias, Achabs Son, who reigned over Israel, and resided at Samaria, he was a wicked man, and resembled his father and mother every way in his impieties, and was nothing inferior to Jeroboam in wickedness, who first fell from God, and made the Israelites revolt from him. The tenth year of his Reign, the King of the Moabites rebelled against him, and denied to pay him those tributes which he was wont to pay unto Achabs his Father. But it came to pass that as Ochozias ascended the stairs of his Palace, he fell down from the top thereof, and being indispoused by the fall, he sent to Accaron unto the god called Msydor, or the Flie, to enquire whether he should recover of that sickness or no. But the God of the Hebrews appeared to Elias the Prophet, and commanded him to go and meet those Messengers that were sent by Ochozias, and to ask them if the people of the Israelites had not a God, that the King sent to foreign gods to enquire of his health? and to charge them to return and declare unto their King, that he should not escape that sickness. Elias did that which God had commanded, and the Messengers of the King having understood that which was declared unto them, returned back again with all expedition.

Ochozias marvelling much at their sudden return, asked them the cause, whereupon they answered him, that a certain man came unto them, and forbade them to pass any further, but

but to return, and let their Master know from God, that his sickness should wax worse and worse. Hereupon the King commanded them to describe what manner of Man he was, that spake these words unto them: who answered, That he was an hairy Man, girded with a leatheren girdle. And understanding hereby that it was Elias, he sent a Captain with 50 Soldiers unto him, commanding him to bring the Prophet prisoner unto him. This Captain that was sent, perceiving Elias sitting on the top of a Mountain, commanded him to come down and repair unto the King, who had sent for him; which if he performed not presently, he threatened him to make him do it by force. Elias answered him, To the end thou mayest know by thine own experience that I am a true Prophet, I will pray that fire may fall from Heaven, and consume both thee and thy Soldiers. And incontinently after his Soldiers, prayed, lightning fell down from heaven, and consumed both the Captain and his Soldiers. When the King had tidings of this loss, he was sore displeased, and sent another Captain to Elias, with the like number of Soldiers, who threatened the Prophet, that if he would not willingly come down, he would violently pull him thence: but Elias prayed that fire might fall from Heaven, and incontinently both he and his were consumed in like manner as the first. When the King had understood like-wise how his second messenger had sped, he sent a third; but he being a discreet Man, when he came to the place where Elias was, he saluted him very courteously, and said unto him, That contrary to his own will, and to no other purpose but to fulfill the King's pleasure, he was come unto him; and that they that were sent with him, came not thither voluntarily, but by the same command. He therefore required him to have compassion both of him and his Soldiers; and to vouchsafe to come down, and to come after them to the King. Elias being moved by his discreet and courteous demeanour, came down and followed him. As soon as he came into the King's presence, he prophesied, and told him that God said, That since he had despised him, and so lightly accounted of him, as if he had been no God, or else such an one as had no power to foretell him any truth touching his sickness; but that he had sent to the gods of Aethiopia, to enquire after the success of his sickness: know (said he) that thou shalt dye. And not long after (according to the Prophecy) he dyed, as Elias had foretold him, and his brother Joram succeeded him in the Kingdom, because he departed without issue.

This Joram was a wicked man also, and as impious as his father: for abandoning the service of the true God, he set up strange gods. In all things else he was a man fit for government. In this time Elias was no more seen amongst men, and until this day no man knoweth what his end was. But he left a Disciple behind him called Elizeus (as we have heretofore declared.) It is written in Holy writ touching Elias, and Enoch who was before the Deluge, that they disappeared: for no man hath known the manner of their deaths. After that Joram had taken possession of the Kingdom, he resolved to make war upon Misae the King of the Moabites, (who paid Achab his father before him the tribute of two hundred thousand sheep bearing wool.) When he had assembled his Forces, he sent unto Jehoshaphat, requiring him, That since he had been his father's friend, he would likewise second him, and send him aid in his War intended against the Moabites, who had then newly revolted from his government. Jehoshaphat not only promised him to afford him succours, but moreover he assured him, That he would draw the King of Idumaea (who depended on him) into their association. When Joram understood these things by whom whom he had sent unto Jehoshaphat, he took his Army with him, and repaired to Jerusalem, where he was magnificently received and entertained by the King of that City: where, after they had concluded to march thorow the Desert of Idumaea, and that way to charge the Enemy, (in that they expected nothing less than to be endangered on that side) these three Kings departed together from Jerusalem, namely the King of Jerusalem, the King of Samaria, and the King of Idumaea. When they had marched seven days journey, they found a great scarcity of water amongst them, both to water their Horses, and to refresh their whole Army, by reason that their Guides had led them astray out of the high-way: so that they were in great want, and especially Joram, who, by reason of the necessity wherewith he was pressed, cried unto God, expostulating with him for what offence of his he would deliver up three such Kings into the hands of the King of Moab. But Jehoshaphat, who was a virtuous man, encouraged him, and sent into the Army, to know whether there were any Prophet of God that had followed them to the battle, to the intent (said he) that we may understand from God what we ought to do: and whereas one of the servants of Joram said, that he had seen Elizeus the Son of Saphar, the Disciple of Elias, all the three Kings (by the persuasion of Jehoshaphat) resorted unto him. When they drew near unto the Prophets Tent (which he had pitched apart from the rest of the company) they asked him, what should become of the Army, and Joram especially? To whom Elizeus answered, That he had no reason to sollicit him in this sort, but to repair unto his fathers and mothers Prophets, who would curse him the more. Notwithstanding,

Joram

H Joram intreated him, that he would prophesie, and preserve the Army, and his Life: but Elizeus swore by the living God, That he would answer him nothing, except for Jehoshaphat's sake, who was an upright Man, and one that feared God. Afterwards calling unto them a certain Man that could cunningly play upon Instruments (for so had the Prophet commanded) whilst he sung, Elizeus was fill'd with the Spirit of God, and enjoined the Kings to make certain Trenches in the Channel of the River: For (said he) you shall see the River full of Water, without either wind, cloud or rain; so that both the whole Army and all their Cattel shall be saved, and sufficiently justified: and God will not only bestow these Benefits on you, but will give you the upper hand of your Enemies also; and you shall surprise the fairest and strongest Cities of the Moabites; and you shall cut down their Trees, raze their Country, and fill up their Fountains and Rivers. When the Prophet had spoken thus, the next day before Sun-rise, the River flowed abundantly with Water: for three days journey off, God had suffered a very violent rain to fall in Idumaea, so that both the Soldiers and their Horses were sufficiently refreshed and watered. When the Moabites were informed that the three Kings came out against them, and took their way thorow the Desert, their King assembled his Army, and commanded them to keep the passages of the Mountains, to the end they might hinder the Enemy from entering their Country unawares. But beholding about the Sun-rise, that the Water of the River was blood-red, (for at that time it arose in the Country of Moab, and at this hour the Water is red) they conceived a false Opinion, that the three Kings being pressed by thirst, had slain one another, and that the River flowed with their Blood. Being in this sort seduced with this imagination, they besought the King to give them leave to gather their Enemies Spoils: which when they had obtained, they altogether inconsiderately marched forth, as if to a Prey already prepar'd for them, and came unto the Kings Camps, with hope to find no Man to resist them. But their hope deceived them; for their Enemies environed them round about, and some of them were cut in pieces, the rest turned their backs, and fled towards their own Country; and the three Kings entering into the Territories of the Moabites, destroyed their Cities, pillaged the Country, broke down their Inclosures, filling them with stones and mud taken out of the River; cut down their fairest Trees, stopped up the sources of their Waters, and levelled their Walls with the ground. The King of the Moabites himself, seeing himself pursued and besieged, and that his City was in danger to be taken by force, sallied out very valiantly with 700 Men, hoping by the swiftness of his Horse, to break thorow the Israelites Camp on that side again where he thought it was least guarded. Which when he had attempted, and could not execute, because he charged on that side which was best defended, he returned back again into the City, and committed a desperate action: for he took his eldest Son, who ought in right to succeed him in the Kingdom, and set him on the Wall of the City, and in the sight of all his Enemies, offered him for a burnt Sacrifice unto God. The Kings beholding this woful Spectacle, were moved with compassion and overcome with humanity, left the siege, and returned back again to their Countries. After that Jehoshaphat was returned unto Jerusalem, he enjoyed a peaceable Government, but lived not long after, but died when he was 60 years old, in the 25th year of his Reign, and was magnificently buried in Jerusalem, according as the Successor to David's virtue and his Kingdom ought to be interred.

CHAP. II.

Joram obtaining the Kingdom of Jerusalem, slayeth his Brothers and his Father's Friends.

Jehoshaphat, King of Juda, left behind him divers Children, the eldest of whom he appointed his Successor in the kingdom, who was called Joram (as his Uncle was, who was his Mother's Brother, and Achab's Son, lately king of Israel). The king of the ten Tribes turning back unto Samaria, kept with him the Prophet Elizeus, whose actions I will here recite, because they are notable, and deserve to be registered in writing, according as we have gathered them out of the Holy Scripture. The Widow of Obadiab, (who was sometime Steward of Achab's House) came unto him, and told him, That he was not ignorant that in that persecution wherein Jezebel sought to murder the Prophets, her Husband saved one hundred of them, for whose private maintenance he had borrowed much money of other Men; and that now being dead, his Creditors strove to draw both her and her children into bondage: For which cause she besought him, in consideration of this act, to have compassion on her, and to yield her some succour. Hereupon Elizeus asked her, If she had any thing in her House? he answered him, That she had nothing but a very little oil left her in an earthen Pot. Whereupon the Prophet commanded her to depart, and to borrow divers empty Vessels of her Neighbours: that done, he willed her to lock up her doors, and to pour the oil

Oyl into the Vessels, because it was God's Pleasure to fill them all. The Woman did according as he had commanded her, and all the Vessels were found full, so as none of them were empty: whereof when she had certified the Prophet, he advised her to go and sell her Oyl, and pay her Debts; and when all was paid, he assured her that there would be some remainder, that might serve to sustain both her and her Children.

2 Kings 6. 9. ad 12. Elizeus advised Joram to avoid Amibush, who lay in wait to kill him.
By this means Elizeus discharged the Widow of her Debts, and that Trouble which her Creditors intended against her. He admonished Joram likewise by certain Messengers, that he should take heed of a certain Place wherein the Syrians lay in ambush, intending to slay him: by means of which Admonition, the King went not out on a hunting, but Adad being fore displeased, because his Ambushment was discovered, began to suspect his own Followers: whereupon, calling unto him his Household-Servants, he maliciously termed them Traitors; and furthermore, threatened them with Death, for that they had discovered a Matter, which was only committed to their trust, unto his Enemy. Whereupon one of the Assistants told him, That he ought not to conceive that false Opinion of them, neither suspect that they had discovered his intended Ambush to cut off his Enemy: but rather that he ought to conceive, that the Prophet Elizeus had discovered all that which was intended against him.

V. 13. 14, 15. Elizeus besieged in Dothaim by his Enemy.
Whereupon, he sent out his Soldiers with an express charge, to know in what City Elizeus made his ordinary abode: who returning back, brought him news that he remained in Dothaim: For which cause, Adad sent a great number of Horsemen and Chariots to Dothaim, to lay hold on Elizeus, who begirt the City by Night, and laid Watch round about the Walls, that no Man might escape them. Early in the Morning, when the Prophet's Servant had notice hereof, and was advertised that the Enemies sought to surprize Elizeus, he fearfully hastened, and discovered their intent to his Master, who encouraged him, and commanded him not to be afraid, because he was assured of God's help: whereupon, he prayed to God that at that present he would shew his Power and Assistance both toward the relief of his necessity, and the confirmation and encouragement of his Servant.

V. 16. 17. The Angels about Elizeus the Prophet.
At that time God hearing his Prayer, represented to the Prophet's Servant a great number of Chariots and Horsemen that invironed Elizeus; so that he laid his Fear aside, and was assured, when he perceived these Succors. That done, Elizeus besought God again, That he would blind his Enemies eyes, and cause a thick Cloud to fall upon them, to the end they might not discover him. Which done, he presently thrust himself amongst the thickest of his Enemies, demanding of them, Whom they came to seek for? They answered him, That they sought for the Prophet Elizeus: he promised them to deliver him into their hands, if so be they would come with him into the City where he was. They being blinded in Eyes, and deprived in their Understanding, followed the Prophet willingly, who marched before them. When therefore Elizeus had brought them into Samaria, he willed King Joram to lock the Gates, and to inviron the Syrians with his Soldiers.

V. 18. 19. Elizeus seized the Syrians, and blinded them into Samaria, where by his perswasion they are courted by Elizeus and persecuted by Joram, and sent home.
This done, he prayed God that he would open the Eyes of the Syrians; and they being delivered from their Blindness, perceived that they were in the midst of their Enemies. Whereat being fore astonish'd, and uncertain whence this divine and unexpected Act had befallen them, King Joram asked the Prophet, Whether he should kill them with Darts? But Elizeus forbid him to do so: For (said he) it is a just and convenient Matter, that they who are taken in War should lose their Life; but that they had done no Evil unto his Country, but by God's Providence came thither, without their own Knowledge: for which cause, he counselled him to give them Presents, and refresh them, and afterwards to suffer them to depart without any Injury.

V. 20. 21. Joram giving ear to the Prophet's Words, entertained the Syrians magnificently, and with great Humanity, and sent them back unto Adad their King; to whom, upon their arrival, they declared all that which had happened unto them.
Adad astonish'd at this unexpected Event, and wondering at the Power of the God of the Israelites, and admiring the Prophet whom God so wonderfully assisted, he concluded from that time forward, F never more to attempt the King of Israel in secret, because he feared Elizeus; but concluded to make open War against him, hoping to have the upper hand of his Enemies, by means of the great number and force of his Army: so that he issued out with a mighty Power against Joram, who supposing himself to be overmatched by the Syrian Army, lock'd himself up within Samaria, putting his trust and confidence in the Fortification and Strength of the Walls thereof. Adad hoping to take the City, if not by Force, at least-wit by Famine, and default of things necessary, drew near unto Samaria to besiege it. But Joram was so destitute of convenient Supplies, that by reason of the incredible want of Victuals, an Ass's Head was sold in Samaria for 80 pieces of Silver; and a measure of Pigeons dung at five pieces of Silver, which they used instead of Salt: neither was there any thing that more troubled the King, than that he feared lest some one constrained by Famine, should deliver or betray the City unto the Enemy. For which cause, he

He every day walked the round about the Walls, and visited the Centinels of the City, for fear lest any one should lie hidden within: and with all care and diligence he gave order, That if any one had such a sinister intent; the means to execute the same should be taken from him. And whereas a certain Woman cried out unto him, Have mercy upon me, O King; he censured with wrath, and supposing that she asked him some meat, began to rail on her, telling her, That he had neither Grange nor Wine-press; whereby he might any ways supply her necessity.

V. 22. The famine so great in Samaria, that women eat their own children.
The Woman answered him, That she had no need thereof, and that she was not troubled for want of food, but only desired that he would determine a debate betwixt her and another Woman: whereupon he commanded her to express and declare what she required. Hereupon she said, That she had made an agreement with another Woman her Neighbor and Friend, that since the famine and scarcity was such, as they could find no redress for the same, that they should kill their children, (for each of them had one) and in this sort should nourish one another.

V. 23. Joram threatened Elizeus's death.
As for my self (said she) I have first of all strangled mine, and we have both of us yesterday eaten thereof: but now she will not do the like, but breaketh the accord betwixt us, and concealeth her child. Joram was grievously tormented to hear these words, and rent his garments, and cried out with a loud voice, and afterwards wholly enraged against the Prophet, he devised in his heart to put him to death, because he prayed not unto God to grant him means to escape those evils that invironed them round about: so that he sent a Man presently to cut off his head; who prepared himself with all expedition to the slaughter.

V. 31. 32. Joram threatened Elizeus's death.
But Elizeus was not ignorant of this resolution of the King's: for sitting at home with his Disciples in his house, he told them, That Joram the murderers son sent a Man to take away his head: but (said he) when he that hath the master in charge shall come hither, suffer him not to enter, but make him attend and stay at the gate; for the King will follow him, and will resort to me in his own person, having altered his resolution; and they, according as they were commanded, shut him out of the doors whom the King had sent. Joram repeating himself of that displeasure which he had conceived against the Prophet, and fearing lest he that had the commission to murder him, should speedily execute the same, hastened himself all that he might to hinder the slaughter, and save Elizeus.

V. 33. When therefore he came into his presence, he accused him, For that he had not besought God to deliver them from those many evils which they suffered; considering that he himself was an eye-witness, they were miserably consumed by them.
Elizeus promised him the next day, (about the same hour that the King came unto him) That he should have so great abundance of victuals, that two measures of barley should be sold in the market for a shekel, and a measure of flower for a shekel.

V. 34. By these words of his, the King, with all his attendants, were wonderfully comforted, and made no difficulty to believe the Prophet, because that before-time they had been accustomed by their experience of the truth of his Prophecies; and the expectation of this day, was the cause that the necessity and misery of the present was more patiently endured.
But a certain friend of the Kings, and the Governour of the third part of his Army (on whose shoulder the King at that time hapned familiarly to lean) spake unto him after this manner: Prophet, thou tellest us incredible matters: for as it is impossible that God should rain down heaps of barley and flower from Heaven, so cannot that which thou speakest come to pass. To whom the Prophet replied, Thou thy self (said he) shalt see the issue hereof, but shalt not partake of it. Which Prediction of his had a most certain effect, according as hereafter it appeareth.

V. 35. 36. The famine so great in Samaria, that women eat their own children.
It was a custom in Samaria, that they that were defiled with a leprosy, should live without the City-walls, for fear lest their conversation might infect others: and at that time also there were some who for this cause had their dwelling without the gate. These, for that (by reason of the extreme famine that reigned within the City) they received no relief or sustenance out of it, and whether they had licence to return into the City, or whether they contained themselves in their houses, they knew that they should assuredly perish by famine, resolved amongst themselves to submit themselves to the enemies mercy, to the end that if they spared them, they might live; and if it hapned otherwise, that they might die with less torture. Now having agreed upon this amongst themselves, they repaired by night unto the Enemies Camp. At that time God began to terrify and trouble the Syrians, and to fill their ears with a noise of Chariots and Arms, as if an Army had violently charged them. Whereupon they grew suspicious, and were so moved, that they forsook their Tents, and ran unto Adad, and told him, That Joram King of the Israelites had entertained the King of Egypt, and the King of the Isles of his Confederates, whom he let out against them, and how already they had heard the noise of them that approached to bid them the battle. Adad (whose ears were filled with no less rumor than those of the People) was amazed at their sayings; so that all of them abandoned gave him holy oyl, willed him to anoint Jehu, and to say, That God had chosen and anointed A him for King: and after he had given him some other instructions, he commanded him to depart; as one that fleeth, making no man privy to it. When this disciple of his came to the City, he found Jehu in the midst of the Captains of War, (as Elizeus had told him) and drawing near, he told him, That he would communicate certain secrets unto him, for which cause he arose and follow'd him. Whereupon the young man taking out the oyl, poured it on his head, saying, That God had chosen him to exterminate the race of Achab, and revenge the blood of the Prophets unjustly murdered by Jezabel: and that both he and his house might be brought to nought in like sort, as the sons of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, and the children of Basa, were extinguished for their impiety; so that no one of the race of Achab might survive in the world. As soon as he had spoken thus, he issued out of the chamber, that he might not be discovered by any of the Army. Now when Jehu came out, he returned to his place to his Captains; who befought him to declare unto them, wherefore the young man came unto him? (allegding, that they supposed him to be out of his wits.) Truly (said he) you have divined well; for he hath talked unto me after the manner of a mad man; wherein he told them what he had said unto him, namely, how God had chosen him to be King over the people.

As soon as he had spoke, every one of them cast off their Garments, and spread them before him, and sounding a Trumpet, they proclaimed Jehu King; who assembling his Army, determined to conduct them toward the City of Jezrael against Joram (who lay there to recover his Wound which he had received at the siege of Ramath, in Galaad, as we have heretofore declared.) Thither also resorted in the way of friendship and consanguinity, Ochozias King of Jerusalem to visit Joram, and to see how he was recovered of his Wound: for he was his Nephew, and Son unto his Sister, as we have said before. Jehu desirous to surprize Joram and his followers, on the sudden gave command, that none of the Souldiers should run before, to give any intelligence of his repair unto Joram, alleging, that it should be a demonstration of their good will towards him: whereas contrariwise, they that did otherwise, declared that they held him not for their King.

Per. 17, ad 23.

THE Men of War were very joyfull to execute this his command, and guarded the ways, that no Man might secretly steal into Jezrael, and bear tydings of that which had hapned. Mean-while, Jehu, attended by his choicest Horsemen, and mounted in his Chariot, marched towards Jezrael. And when he drew near unto the City, the Centinel that was appointed by Joram to discover those that repaired to the City, perceived Jehu resorting thither with a multitude of attendants, and told Joram that a Troop of Horsemen were at hand: Whereupon a Scout was sent out to discover who they were; who drawing near unto Jehu, asked him what News there was in the Army? telling him, that the King was desirous to know the same. Jehu willed him to take no care thereof, but to follow after him. The Centinel perceiving this, certified Joram, that the Messenger whom he had sent, went along with them that came, and followed their General. Whereupon the King sent out a Messenger the second time, and Jehu commanded him to attend him, as he did at first: which the Centinel signified to Joram likewise, who thereupon took his Chariot to meet them, accompanied with Ochozias, King of Jerusalem, who (as we have said) was come to the City, to see how the King was recovered of his hurt, because he was allied unto him: But Jehu marched on in good array, till Joram meeting him in the field of Naboth, asked him how the Army did: who instead of returning an Answer, reviled him bitterly, and called him the Son of a Poisoner, and of an Harlot. For which cause, Joram (fearing his turbulent spirit, and suspecting he designed some Treason against him) fled away as swiftly as his Chariot could be driven; telling Ochozias, that they were both of them betrayed: but Jehu flung a dart at him, and pierced him thorow the heart. Whereupon Joram instantly fell on his knees, and dyed. Hereupon Jehu commanded Badad to call Joram's Body into Naboth's Field, remembering him of the Prophecy of Elias foretold to Achab, who murdered Naboth: namely, That he and his Race should dye in that field. For sitting behind Achab's Chariot, he heard these words pronounced by the Prophet: in effect it so fell out as he had prophesied. When Joram was fallen down, Ochozias was afraid to be slain: for which cause, he turned his Chariot to take another way, hoping that Jehu would not discover him. But he was overtaken in a steep way, and was hurt with an Arrow: whereupon he forsook his Chariot, and being mounted on a swift horse, posted to Meggedo, where, after his wounds had been dressed some few days, he deceased, and was carried to Jerusalem, and buried there, after he had reigned one year, and surpassed his Father in wickedness.

Jehu reigneth over Israel, and keepeth his Court in Samaria; and after him, his Progeny, to the Fourth Generation.

AT such Time as Jehu arrived at Jezrael, Jezabel being on the Top of a Tower in her Princely Robes, cried out; O truly Servant, (said she) that hath slain his Master! He looking upward, asked her what she was, commanding her to come down unto him: at length he charged her Eunuchs to cast her down from the Top of the Tower: in her Fall the besprinkled the Walls with her Blood, and as soon as she came to ground her body was trampled under the horses feet, until she dyed. That done, Jehu repaired to the Palace with his Friends, and reposed himself there, commanding his servants that they should bury Jezabel; (in respect of the Royal Race from whence she was descended) but they to whom the Charge of the Obsequies were committed, found no part of her body, but her hands and head, for all the rest was devoured by dogs. Jehu certified hereof, wondered at the Prophecy of Elias, who had foretold that Jezabel should dye in that sort in Jezrael.

Now Achabs seventy Sons being brought up in Samaria, Jehu sent two Letters, the one unto the Masters of the Infants, the other to the Governours of the City, giving them to understand, that they should choofe one of the most Vertuous amongst Achabs Children, to reign as King over them, because they had a multitude of strong Chariots, Horses, Armor, Men, and strong Cities; to the end, that in so doing, they might take revenge on those that slew their Lord and Master. (This did he under a colour to found how the Samaritans were affected towards him.) When the Governours and Tutors had received these Letters, they were afraid, and made account that they could prevail nothing against him, who had prevailed already against two mighty Kings. For which cause they wrote back unto him; acknowledging him for their Sovereign; and offering themselves in all duty, to be under his subjection. Whereupon Jehu sent back unto them again, commanding them, that (to express their obedience) they should fend him the heads of Achabs Children, divided from their shoulders. Which command of his they failed not to execute, but presently packed up the heads in panniers, and sent them unto him to Jezrael. As soon as they were brought thither, tydings thereof were carryed to Jehu, as he sat at Supper with his Friends, who commanded that they should be laid in two heaps, at the City Gates, on either side thereof. Which done, he issued out as soon as it was day, to see them; and beholding them, he began to tell those, that accompanied him, that he had voluntarily armed himself against his Master, and slew him: but as touching those whom they saw there, he had no ways layd hands on them. His only intent was, that all men should know, that all that which hapned unto Achabs Race, was done by the Ordinance of God, and that his house was destroyed according as Elias had foretold. And after he had slain and dispatched both these and all those that were found to be of Achabs Race amongst the Israelites, he went unto Samaria: and meeting by the way with Ochozias household Servants (who was King of Jerusalem) he asked them, Whither they went? Who answered him, That they went to salute Joram and their King Ochozias, (for they knew not as yet that they were both of them slain.) Hereupon Jehu commanded his Servants to lay hands on them, and put them to the Sword, notwithstanding, they were forty two in number. After them, he met with a Vertuous Man called Jonadab, (who in times past had been his ancient Friend) who embracing him, praised his forwardness, in that he had performed all things according to the Will of God, in abolishing Achabs house. Jehu caused him to come up to him, into his Chariot, and accompany him to Samaria, telling him, That he should see that he would spare no wicked man, Nor would punish all the false Prophets, and tellers of lies, and abusers of the people, who had made them forsake the true service of God, and adore strange gods: because that which is most acceptable to a good man is to behold the punishment of the wicked. Jonadab perwaded by these words, mounted up into his Chariot, and went with him to Samaria; and after Jehu had fought out Achabs kindred, he put them to death; and intending that no one of his false Prophets and Priests should escape his hands, he assembled them together by a subtle policy. For gathering the People together, he protested that he would have twice as many gods as Achab had: willing, that all the Priests that belonged unto them, should present themselves, for that he intended to celebrate most magnificent Sacrifices to Achabs gods; protesting that whatsoever Priest should be absent, he should lose his head. Now this god whom Achab honoured, was called Baal. Having in this sort assigned a day wherein he would offer Sacrifice, he sent thorow all the County of Israel, charging all Baals Priests to repair unto him; and commanding that each of them should should have their Vestments given them. As soon as they were apparelled, he resorted to his Lodging, accompanied with his Friend Jonadab, and commanded that a search should be made amongst them, to espy whether any one of a contrary quality, or condition were mixed with them; for that he intended that no stranger should be amongst the Priests. When therefore he understood that none but the Priests were in that assembly, even at such time as they began to offer Sacrifice, he caused them to be inclosed by four-score Souldiers (whom he esteemed to be most trusty) commanding them to kill the false Prophets, and to punish them according to the custom of their Fore-fathers, which had already too long been neglected; dreadfully threatening all those, who should any ways omit to root out the Name and Memory of these Wretches out of the world. They therefore slew all those Priests, and guarded the Kings Palace; and in so doing, cleared B Samarita of foreign gods. This Baal was the god of the Tyrians (for whom Achab built a Temple in Samarita, intending thereby to content Ithobaal the King of the Tyrians and Sidonians) to whom he assigned Priests, and honoured him with all sorts of Sacrifice. After this Idol was extirminated, Jehu suffered the Israelites to adore golden Calves. When this Execution was performed in punishing the wicked, God (to whom this Action of his was acceptable) told Jehu, by his Prophet, that his Children should enjoy the Kingdom of Israel to the fourth Generation. This was Jehu's fate.

Athalia, Achab's Daughter, hearing News of the death of her Brother Joram, and her Son Ochozias, together with the utter ruine of all the Royal Posterity, bethought her self to extinguish David's Memory, and in such sort to root it out, that no one of that Line should remain alive to enjoy the Kingdom hereafter: which when she had concluded in her heart, she began to put in execution. Yet notwithstanding, one of Ochozias Sons escaped her bloody hands, by this means. Ochozias had a Sister by his Fathers side, whose Name was Josabetha, who was married to Joiada the High-Priest; who entering into the Kings Palace, and finding Joas at that time but one year of age, hidden with his Nurse among the dead, she took both him and his Nurse, and locked them up in a closet within the Temple, where Joiada her Husband and she did secretly preserve them for the space of five years, during which time Athalia reigned in Jerusalem over the two Tribes.

About the seventh year, Joiada conferred with five Centurions, and perswaded them to oppose themselves with mutual consent against Athalia's proceedings, and to secure the Kingdom for little Joas. Whereupon giving and receiving promises of secrecy the one unto the other, they confidently addressed themselves to execute their intended purposes, after this manner. They whom the High-Priest had chosen to execute this fact, went thorow all the Country, and gathered the Priests and Levites together, with all the Governors of the Tribes, and afterwards returned and brought them to Jerusalem E to the High-Priest, who made them take an Oath, that they would keep secret that which he should inform them of, as a thing that required secrecy, and men of courage and resolution to perform the same. As soon as he had assured them by Oath, he brought forth the little Child whom he had till that time preserved, and said unto them: Behold your King, who is of that Race, which (as you know) was chosen by God to reign over you for ever: I therefore think it fit that the third part of your Guard shall keep him within the Temple, and that the fourth make their watch round about the same. Another Company shall have the Guard of the great Gate that leadeth to the Palace: as for the rest of the People, let them remain disarmed within the Temple, and suffer no armed men to enter thereinto, except the Priest only. He appointed also another Company F of Priests and Levites to be about the King, with Javelins and drawn Swords, charging them that whosoever durst be so bold to enter the Temple armed, they should presently put him to the sword, and laying all fear aside, to attend the safety and guard of the Kings Person. They being obedient to that which the High-Priest had commanded them in effect expressed their readiness: whereupon Joiada opening the Arsenal, (which in times past was prepared by David) distributed amongst the Centurions, Levites and Priests, all the javelins, quivers, and all other sort of Arms that were therein, and disposed all them that were armed, round about the People, joynd hand in hand to hinder any one from entering in amongst them that were not of that faction. Afterwards bringing out the Infant Joas into the midst of the Company, they set the Royal Crown on his head; and Joiada, after he had anointed him with Oyl, proclaimed him King: whereupon all the people rejoiced, and clapping their hands, cried out, God save the King.

Athalia

H Athalia hearing this Noise and Applause, beyond all hope, was greatly troubled, and with those Soldiers which she had about her, the hastily issued out of the Palace; and coming to the Temple, the Priests admitted her: as for the rest of the Men of War that followed her, they that by the High Priest's Ordinance begirt the Temple, would not suffer them to enter with her. Now when Athalia saw the Child standing before the Tabernacle with the Royal Crown on his head, she rent her Garments; and storming through Despair, she cried out, and commanded that the Traitor should be slain, that had thus betrayed her, and sought to dispossess her of her Kingdom. But Joiada called the Centurions, and commanded them to carry Athalia out to the Brook Cedron, and there to kill her; (because he would not permit that the Temple should be defiled with her cursed Blood.) Moreover, he charged them, that if any one should attempt to rescue her, they should kill them likewise. Hereupon (for they were appointed to execute this his Command) took her, and led her without the Gates of the King's Mules; and there slew her. After that Athalia was in this manner executed, Joiada assembled the people, V. 17. The King and the Men of War in the Temple, binding them all by an Oath, to yield the King their faithful Service, and to procure the prosperity of the Kingdom. Secondly, He made the King swear in like manner, that he would maintain the Service of God, and in no manner disannul Moses's Laws. That done, they ran unto Baal's Temple (which Athalia and her Husband Joram had built to the Dishonour of God; and their Forefathers, and for the Honour of Achab), and levelled it with the ground; and put to death their High K Priest called Mathan. The Charge and Guard of the Temple, Joiada committed to the Priests and Levites, according to the other establishment by David, with commandment twice a day to offer their ordinary Burnt-offerings, and to make Perfumes, according to the Law. He appointed also certain of the Levites to be Porters to guard the Temple, to the intent that no unclean Thing should enter the same unespied. And after he had ordained these things, with the Centurions and Governors, and with all the People, he took Joas and led him out of the Temple, and attended him to the Palace; and having placed him on the Royal Throne, all the People cried; God save the King; and banquetted and feasted for divers days. Thus after the death of Athalia, the City was at quiet. Joas was seven Years old at such time as he was made King, his Mother L was call'd Sabia, and was of the Town Berfabe. He carefully observed the Laws; and highly affected the Service of God all his Life-time: and when he grew to Man's estate, he married two Wives which the High Priest gave him, by whom he had Sons and Daughters. This is all that I have thought good to declare as concerning Joas, both how he escaped Athalia's treasons, and obtained the Kingdom.

CHAP. VIII.

Azael King of Damascus, levieth an Army, and first of all assaulteth the Israelites; and after marcheth forward against Jerusalem.

M Ut Azael King of Syria making War against the Israelites, and against their King Jehu, destroyed the Country on the other side of Jordan, and all the Eastern tract inhabited by the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites: Furthermore, he burnt and spoiled Galaad and Bathanea, violating and outraging all those he met withal. For Jehu went not out against him to resist him, but (being become a Contemner of God, and his Laws) he died after he had reigned seven and twenty Years over the Israelites: he was buried in Samarita, and left behind him Joas his Son to succeed him in his Kingdom. But Joas King of Jerusalem was desirous to Repair the Temple; for which cause, calling unto him Joiada the High Priest, he commanded him to send thorow all the Country the Levites and Priests, and to levy upon every one of their Heads half a Sicle of Silver, for the Building and Reparation of the Temple, which was fallen to decay in Joram, Athalia, and her Successors times. But the High Priest would not obey him herein, knowing well no Man would willingly disburse Mony. But in the three and twentieth Year of his Reign, the King sent both for Joiada, and the Levites also, and expostulated with them for disobeying his Commandment, enjoining them from that time forth to provide for the Building of the Temple. Whereupon the High Priest used present dispatch in levying the Mony, wherewith the People were well pleased: He therefore made a Chest of Wood closed on every side (except that on the upper Lid thereof, there was a little Cranny left open,) which he placed near unto the Altar, commanding that every one should offer according to his Devotion, and put in his Offering thorow the Cranny into the Coffer, to be employed in the Repairing of the Temple; whereunto all the People shewed themselves affectionate: so that they gathered together a great quantity of Gold and Silver, with great Zeal; and when the Coffer was filled it was emptied, and the account

thereof taken and summ'd up by the Secretary and High Priest in the King's presence, and afterwards was brought together into one place assigned for it, which order was observed every Day. And when it was supposed that there was sufficient Money gathered, the High Priest Joadab, and King Joas hired Masons and Carpenters, and prepared great Beams of excellent Timber.

After that the Temple was repair'd, they employ'd the remainder of Gold and Silver (which was of no small quantity) to make Cups, Pots, and Vessels, and other Utensils; and every day offered they Sacrifice of great value upon the Altar; and this Custom was continu'd so long as Joadab lived: But after his decease (which hapned in the hundred and thirtieth Year of his Age, after he had lived a just and upright Life, and was interred in the Sepulchre of David, in Jerusalem, because he had established the Kingdom in Davids Posterity:) K. Joas had no more care to serve God, and with him the rest of the Governors of the People were corrupted, so that they broke the Laws and Ordinances of their Forefathers. For which cause God being provoked by this Change, and incens'd against the King and the rest, sent his Prophets unto them, to protest against them, and exhortate with them for their Offences, and to withdraw them from their Iniquity. But they pursued Sin the more vehemently; so that neither the Punishments by which they, who had offended God before-times, had been plagu'd, with all their Posterities; neither all the Advertisements given them by the Prophets, could induce them to amend; or to forsake those Sins wherein they were engag'd: but, that which is worst, K. Joas stoned Zachary, Joadab's Son, and put him to death in the Temple, forgetting himself most ungratefully of the Benefits he had receiv'd from his Father. And the occasion was, for that Zachary having received a Charge from God to prophesie, came into the midst of the People, and counsel'd both them and him to follow Justice, foretelling them, that they should be grievously punished, except they did believe. This Zachary did at his death call God to witness to judge of those Calamities he endured, suffering a violent Death for the good Counsel which he had given them, and the Benefits which his Father had in times past done unto Joas. But many days passed not, before the King suffered due Punishment for these Misdemeanors: For Azael, King of the Syrians, invaded his Country, and after he had first of all ruin'd Girza, he march'd forward with an intent to besiege him at last in Jerusalem. Joas desperate of all Succours, emptied all the Treasures of the Temple, and those of the Kings, and took away the Presents that were hung up in the Temple, and sent them to the Syrians, raising the Siege by this means, lest he should be drawn into hazard to lose all. The Syrians, pacified with so great Riches, and abundant Treasure, suffer'd not his Army to pass to Jerusalem. After this, Joas was seized with a grievous Sickness, and (to the intent that the Death of Zachary, the Son of Joadab might not escape unrevenged,) his Friends conspired against him, and he died by their hands. He was entomb'd in Jerusalem, but not in the Sepulchre of his Ancestors, because he had fallen from God: He lived seven and forty Years.

C H A P. IX.

Amasias, King of Jerusalem, made War against the Idumeans and Amalechites, and obtained the Victory.

Amasias his Son succeeded him in the Kingdom. But in the 23rd Year of Joas's reign Joachas, the Son of Jehoi, took possession of the Kingdom of Israel in Samaria, and reign'd for the space of seventeen Years: but he followed not his Father's steps, but rather believing himself impiously, according as his Predecessors in the Kingdom, and Contemners of God had done: For which cause the King of Syria subdued him, and cut off a great part of his Dominions, and took his greatest Cities from him, and defeated his Armies; so that at length he had but ten thousand Footmen, and five hundred Horsemen. All which hapned to the Israelites according to the Prophecy of Elizeus, which he foretold unto Azael, at such time as he prophesied unto him, that he should reign over the Syrians, and then of Damascus, after that he had murdered his Master. Joachas being in this Extremity, had his recourse to God in Prayer and Supplication, beseeching him that it might please him to deliver him from the hands of Azael, and not suffer him to be under Subjection and Thralldom unto him.

God (that regardeth the Penitent as if they had been innocent, and that gently chastish those whom he might utterly exterminate, if he so pleased) gave him Assurance against the War and Danger, so that the Country (having obtained Peace) recovered her former State and Prosperity. When Joachas was dead, his Son succeeded him in the Government, and began to reign over the Israelites in Samaria in the 37th Year of Joas King of Juda. (For this King of Israel was called Joas, as well as he that reigned in Jerusalem.)

H. Jerusalem: he governed the Kingdom sixteen Years. He was a good Man, and was not like unto Joachas his Father. About this time Elizeus the Prophet was very old, and fell sick; the King of Israel came to visit him, and finding him in the Extremity, and past hope of Recovery, he began to weep and lament, calling him his Father, and his Armour; because that during his Life, he had never occasion to use the Sword against the Enemy; but that by means of his Predictions he had always the upper hand of them without fighting: that now he departed this Life, and left him dijsant to the Mercy of the Syrians, and other his Enemies; so that he was not secure of Liberty nor Life, but that he rather wished to die with him than live in those Dangers.

Elizeus being mov'd with these Complaints, comforted the King that lamented in this fort, and commanding him to draw his Bow that he had brought with him (for the King had bent the same,) Elizeus said unto him, Draw; and he shot three Arrows; and gave over at the fourth: Ob, said Elizeus, if thou hadst shot more Arrows, thou hadst utterly ruin'd the Kingdom of the Syrians; and since thou hast contented thyself with shooting thrice only, thou shalt overthrow the Syrians in three Battels, which thou shalt fight against them, and shalt recover the Country they have taken from thy Father. After the King understood these things, he departed, (and not long after the Prophet died) who was renown'd for his Justice, and beloved of God, who shew'd miraculous and incredible Works by his Prophecies; and such as the Hebrews ought to mirror in perpetual remembrance, and was buried magnificently, according as it behov'd a Man who was so highly favoured by God.

It chanced about that time, that certain Thieves having cast the Body of a Man that was murdered by life, upon the Body of the Prophet where he lay buried, the dead Body returned to life: Which made it appear, that God had given him a Power of working Miracles not only in his Life-time, but also after his Death. After the Death of Azael King of Syria, Adad his Son obtained the Kingdom, against whom Joas King of Israel made War, and having overcome him three times, he recovered all that Country, and those Cities and Towns, that Azael his Father had conquered before him. (All which came to pass according as Elizeus had prophesied.) After that Joas was dead, the Kingdom fell to Jeroboam his Son.

C H A P. X.

Amasias making War against Joas King of Israel, it overcome.

THE tenth Year of the Reign of Joas King of Israel, Amasias reigned over the Tribe of Juda, in Jerusalem; his Mother was called Judab, and was a Citizen of Jerusalem. He was very careful to maintain Justice, (notwithstanding he was very young;) and having taken upon him the Government of the Kingdom, he resolv'd with himself, that he ought first of all to revenge the Death of his Father Joas, who was traitorously slain by his Friends: he therefore laid hands on them, and put them Mall to the Sword, (yet extended he not his Displeasure to their Children, but conform'd his Actions according to the Laws of Moses, which saith, that it is not lawful to punish their Children for their Fathers Offences.) He afterwards levied an Army of the Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, and chose such as were in the flower of their Years, and about twenty Years of Age; the number of which amounted to three hundred thousand Men, whom he divided into Centuries. He sent also to the King of Israel, and hired an hundred thousand of his arm'd Men for an hundred Talents of Silver, because he intended to make War upon the Amalechites, Idumeans, and Gabelites. Now while he made this Preparation, and was in a Readiness to undertake this Exploit, a certain Prophet counsel'd him to dismiss the Israelites that he had with him, because they were wicked Men, signifying unto him, from God, That if he were followed by them in that War, he should be overcome: and on the other side, That he should have the upper hand over his Enemies if he fought with a few Men, according to God's Direction. Hereupon the King was mov'd (because he had already paid the Israelites their Wages) but the Prophet ceased not to exhort him to do that which was pleasing in God's sight, who would give him Silver in abundance. Hereupon he dismissed them, telling them, that he freely gave them their Pay; and he with the Forces of his own Kingdom march'd out against those Nations, and fought with them, and overcame them, and slew ten thousand of them, and took no less number of Prisoners, (whom he afterwards caused to be led to a high Rock that bounded upon Arabia, and from thence cast them down headlong;) and from all these Nations he recover'd a great Booty, and brought home much Riches.

Whilst Amasias stood upon these terms, the Israelites (that had taken Wages of him, and were cashier'd by him,) conceived a displeasure against him, supposing themselves to

to be injured by him, as if he had dismissed them for want of Courage. For which cause they invaded his Country, and spoiled it as far as Bethsamer, and carried away a great quantity of Cattel, and slew three thousand Men. But the Victory and Success made Amasias proud, so that he began to forget God, who was the Author thereof, and gave Honour to those Gods which he brought from the Country of the Amalechites. Whereupon a Prophet came unto him and said, That he wondred that he should esteem them for Gods, who had so little availed them who honoured them, and had delivered them into his hands, so that divers of them were put to Death, and divers led away Prisoners, which they themselves had brought unto Jerusalem, according to the Custom of War. These words moved the King unto displeasure, so that he commanded the Prophet to keep silence, threatening him to punish him, if he enteredmed with his Affairs any more. Who answered him, That he would no farther urge him, yet withal he fore-propheied unto him, That God would not suffer this his Innovation to rest unpunished. Anon after Amasias (not able to keep a Moderation amidst his Affluence and Prosperity, but waxing more insolent against Almighty God, by whom he possessed the Blessings he enjoyed,) in the height of his Pride wrote to Joas King of Israel, commanding him to yield him Homage according as in times past the Israelites were subject to David and Solomon; threatening him, that if he refused to do him Service, he would enforce him to decide the Controversy by Arms; to whom the Israelite replied thus: King Joas to King Amasias: There was in the Mountain of Libanus a Cypress-tree of great height, to whom a little Thistle wrote, demanding of him his Daughter in Marriage, for his Son. But during this Treaty, there came a certain wild Beast that trod down the Thistle. Let this Example admonish and dissuade thee from attempting of too mighty Matters, neither grow proud of thy last Victory against the Amalechites, lest thro' thy Presumption, thou expose both thy Wife and Fortune to the uncertain hazard of War. When Amasias had perused this Answer of his, he was more enraged: (God also as it seemed pricked him forward, to the intent to chastise those iniquities that were committed by him.) When therefore he had drawn his Army into the field, and both the Armies were upon the point to joyn Battel, a sudden fear and discouragement seized him (such as God in his displeasure is accustomed to inflict) which made Amasias's Army turn their Backs: so that (by the apprehension they had conceived) they were scattered before they came to handy strokes; and Amasias being left alone, was taken prisoner. Joas threatened that except he persuaded the inhabitants of Jerusalem to open their gates, and to receive both him and his Army into the City, he would put him to Death. For which cause Amasias (constrained by necessity and fear of Death,) wrought so far that his enemies were received into Jerusalem, who made a breach of three hundred Cubits in their wall; thorow which Amasias was led captive into Jerusalem. In this manner Joas was made Master of the City, who afterwards carried away the Treasures of the Temple, and took away the Gold and Silver that Amasias had in his Palace: and having in this sort ransomed him from captivity, he returned back again into Samaria. This hapned in the fourteenth year of the reign of Amasias, who afterwards fled into the City of Lachis to avoid the conspiracy of his domestick friends, by whom notwithstanding he was surpris'd, and slain: his Body was Royally intomb'd in Jerusalem. Thus died Amasias, for introducing innovations in contempt of God, he lived fifty four years, and reigned twenty and nine: and his Son Ozias succeeded him in the Kingdom.

C H A P. XI.

How Ozias overcame the Neighbouring Nations.

BUT in the fifteenth year of the reign of Amasias, Jeroboam, Joas Son, began to reign over the Israelites in Samaria, and enjoyed the Kingdom for the space of forty years. This King dishonoured God, and offended him grievously by worshipping of Idols, and divers absurd and strange actions, by which he heaped many miseries on the Israelites heads. To him there came a certain prophet called Jonas, who prophesied, unto him, that he should make War against the Syrians, and that he should overcome them, and enlarge his Kingdom to the Northward, as far as the City of Amath; and to the Southward as far as the Lake Asphaltites (for these in times past were the limits of the Country of Canaan, according as Jehoa had set the bounds thereof.) Jeroboam, encouraged by his Prophecy, led forth his Army against the Syrians, and spoiled all their Country (according to the Prophecy of Jonas.) And since I have promised to give an exact History in writing of all those things that hapned in our Nation, I methinks it will not be amiss to declare that which I have found written of this Prophet in our Hebrew Chronicles. This man being commanded by God to repair unto the Kingdom

dom of Ninive, and proclaimed that which should happen to the City of Ninive (namely, that the Government thereof should be abolished:) through fear which he conceived repaired not thither, but fled from Gods presence into a City called Tippa, where finding a Ship he entred the same, and sailed towards Tharsis in Cilicia. But their arole so vehement a tempest upon the Sea, that the Vessel was ready to be drowned, and both the Mariners, Master and Owners of the Ship, made their Vow of Thanksgiving unto God, if they might escape from this Tempest: but Jonas hid himself and covered his face, taking no notice of the rest. When therefore the turbulent waves, raised by violent winds, increased more and more; the Mariners and Passengers began to imagine amongst themselves, that some one of them in the Bark had caused that Tempest: Whereupon they agreed amongst themselves to cast Lots, to know which of them was the occasion of their danger. Which done, the Lot fell upon Jonas: Who being demanded whence he was, and for what business he travelled? Answered them, that he was an Hebrew by Nation, and a Prophet of the most High God; and counselled them, that if they would be secured from that danger, they should cast him into the Sea, because it was he only that was the cause of that Tempest. Notwithstanding this Confession of his, they durst not perform that which he desired, supposing that it would be an act of great impiety, in that sort, to thrust a Stranger into that manifest Perdition, whose life had been committed to their trust. But since the Storm more and more increased and grew so vehement, that they wanted very little of being Shipwreckt; and being belideth that, incited by Jonas himself, and likewise by the fear they conceived, to lose their lives, they cast him into the Sea; whereupon suddenly the Storm ceased. It was likewise said, that being swallowed up by a great Fish for the space of three days and three nights, he was at the last vomited out, and cast by the same Fish on Shore of the Euxine Sea alive, and without any maim in any of his members. There besought he God, that he would pardon him the sin which he had committed: And afterwards he went to the City of Ninive, where going up to a place from whence he might be heard; he published, with a loud voice, unto them, that they should lose the Empire of Asia: Which after he had pronounced, he returned back again. This Recital have I made according as I have found it Registered in Writing.

King Jeroboam having passed all his life time in Prosperity, and Reigned for the space of forty years departed this life, and was intomb'd in Samaria, and Zachary his Son succeeded him in this Kingdom. At the same time, Ozias the Son of Amasias Reigned in Jerusalem over the two Tribes, after that Jeroboam had already Reigned fourteen Years; his Mother was called Abia, and was of the City of Jerusalem. He was a man of good nature, and such an one as loved justice, of a noble Courage, and very Laborious in providing for all occasions: He made War against the Philistines, and after that he had overcome them in Battle; he took Ita, and Amala, two of their strong Forts, and razed them. This Exploit being past, he set upon the Arabians that bordered upon Egypt, and after that (having built a City upon the Red-Sea) he planted a Garrison therein. He afterwards discomfited the Ammonites, constraining them to pay him tribute, and subdued all as far as the marches of Egypt. After that he began to provide for the City of Jerusalem: for he built it anew, and repaired the Walls thereof, that had been beaten down, or decayed either by continuance of time, or by negligence of those Kings who were his Predecessors: He repaired those also which the King of Israel had beaten down, at such time as having taken Amasias Prisoner, he rode in Triumph into the City. Besides this, he erected a number of Towers, each of them one hundred and fifty Cubits high. These inclosed he with walls to set Garisons therein, and in divers barren places he caused divers Fountain-heads to be made: For he had an infinite multitude of beasts of carriage and other cattel, in that the Country was fit for Pasture. He took pleasure also in Tillage, for which cause he was often busied about his Land, in Sowing and Planting the same. He had about him a chosen Army, to the number of three hundred and seventy Thousand Fighting Men, whose Generals, Conductors, and Captains, were Valiant and Invincible Men, and were in number two Thousand.

He taught his Soldiers to march in Square Battle (in manner of the Macedonian Phalanx) Arming each of them with Swords, Targets and Corselets of Brass, with Arrows and Darts. He made also great Preparation of divers Engines to batter Cities, and to shoot Stones and Darts, besides divers Hooks, and other such like Instruments. But whilst he was intent on these studies and preparations, he grew Insolent and Proud, and being puffed up with Arrogance, he contemned that which endureth for ever (that is Obedience towards God, and the observation of his Commandments.) For which cause he was overthrown by his prosperity, and fell into his Fathers sins, through the happiness and greatness of his Estate, wherein he could not moderately contain himself. So that upon upon a certain solemn Feast-day, wherein all the People were assembled together, he assumed himself in the High-priests Vestments, and entered into the Temple, to offer sacrifice unto God upon the golden Altar; notwithstanding the High-priest Azarias (accompanied with fourscore Priests) forbade him, telling him, That it was not lawful for him to sacrifice, in that it was only allowed in those that were of the posterity of the High-priest Aaron.

For the General Manasseh, being at that time in the City of Tharfis, and understanding of that which had happened to Zachary, departed thence with all his Force, and came to Samaris, and in a Battle which he fought, he slew Selum: And afterwards obtaining the Crown, he went from thence towards the City of Tapsa, the Inhabitants whereof locked and barred their Gates against him, and would not receive him: in revenge whereof, he spoyled all the Countrey round about, and took the City by force, and (being highly incensed against the Taphians for their Insolence) he put them all to the Sword, not sparing their little Children (which was an incredible and barbarous Cruelty.) Manasseh reigned in the manner for the space of ten years, continuing a most cruel and unbridled Tyranny over this People. Afterwards being assailed by Phul King of the Syrians, he went not out against him, neither praclised to resist him, but procured his Peace for the Sum of 1000 Talents of Silver, which by way of composition he paid unto him. The people furnished Manasseh with this Sum, by way of contribution, paying fifty Drachms a piece.

But Teglabassifer King of Affryra, led forth his Army against the Isrealites; and spoyled all the Country of Galassa, and that beyond Jordan and Galilee, Ciddida and Afor also, and made all the Inhabitants thereof Prisoners, and translated the Kingdom to himself. He made War upon the Ammonites; and overcoming them in Battle, he made all their Nations Tributary, and constrained them to pay him yearly 100 Talents, and 10000 Cores of Wheat, and as many of Barley: and his kingdom in such flor' encreased, as he was redoubted abroad, and happy at home. about the same time there lived a certain Prophet called N^{um}, who prophesied the overthrow of the Assyrians, and of the City of Ninive; and spake to this effect: All the people thereof shall be ravaged, and his Country, and shall say the one unto the other, Zay and Abba, take gold and silver, and there shall be Hinnah that will receive it. CHAPTER. XII.

I Rabin King of Damascus, maketh War against Jerusalem: Achaz sendeth for the King of Assyria to assist him.

AFTER that Jothan had lived one and forty years, and reigned sixteen, he dyed, and was buried in the Sepulchre of the Kings; after him, the Kingdom fell to Achaz his Son, who was a Contemner of God and a Transgressor of the Ordinances of his Forefathers, and conformed himself to the Customs of the Kings of Israel; for he erected Altars in the City of Jerusalem, and sacrificed unto Idols; offering up his own Son unto them (after the manner of the Canaanites) and committed divers such like Offences. During these impious Idolatries of his, Rezin King of Syria and Damascus, and Bechazai King of Israel, made War against him (for these two were Confederates;) leading therefore both their Armies against Jerusalem, they besieged it a long time, yet without any success; by reason the Walls were very strong. But the King of Syria having seized the City of Elath, near unto the Red Sea, and slain all the Inhabitants thereof, plamped Syrians therein; putting all the Garrison likewise to the Sword, and all the Jews round about, and carried away with him a great booty unto Damascus, and afterwards returned home with his Army. The King of Jerusalem understanding that the Syrians were retired, and supposing himself to be sufficient to fight against the King of Israel, led forth his Forces against him, and was overcome in battle (because that God was incensed against him for his impieties, which were without number.) In that year the Israelites slew about Sixscore Thousand Men; amongst whom was Zacharias the Son of Achiz, whom the General of the Army of the Israelites called Amias, slew, with Ericam the Governor of the whole Realm, and took Elean the General of the Tribe of Judah Prisoner also. They led away likewise a great number of Women and Children, with a great booty, and afterwards returned to Samarita. At that time there was a certain Prophet living in Samarita, whose name was Obel, who coming out to meet the Army, cried with a loud Voice unto the People, That the Victory which they had obtained, was not through their own Valor, but by reason of the wrath of God conceived against Achaz King of Juda. He further reproved them, for that not contenting themselves with the good success of that Victory, they had so far presumed, as to make them of Juda and Benjamin Prisoners, who were of their own alliance: he therefore counselled them to send them back unto their houses, without any injury offered unto them, threatening them, that if they omitted it, they might be assured that God would punish them.

CHAPTER XIII

The King of Assyria taketh Damascus by force, killeth their King, translateth the People into Media, and planteth New Colonies in Damascus.

0 When King Achaz had received this Overthrow, by the Israelites, he sent unto Thiglathapalazar, King of Assyria, requiring him to assist him in the War, which he intended against the Israelites, Syrians, and them of Damascus, promising to give him great Sums of Money, and at that present also he sent him very large Presents. Who, after he had considered on the Embassy, came forth with his Army to assist Achaz: and spoiling Syria, and taking Damascus, he slew Rezes their King also, and transported them of Damascus into the higher Media, and sent certain People of Assyria into Damascus. He wrought much mischief likewise in the Country of Israel, and lead away a great number of Prisoners from thence. After that the Syrians had been subdued and weakened after this manner, Achaz took all the gold and silver that was in the Kings treasury, and in the Temple of God, and carryed it unto Damascus, and gave it to the King of Assyria, according to the promise which he had made him; and after much rejoicing, he returned back again to Jerusalem.

This King was so fencelss and ignorant of his own profit, that although he was vanquished in War by the Syrians, yet ceased he not to adore their gods, but persisted to honour them, as if he expected the Victory by their means. And although he were overcome the second time, yet he continued to worship the Assyrian gods; choosing rather to reverence any, than the true God, whom his Fore-fathers worshipped: yea, so far grew he in contempt, and neglect of all true piety, that at length he shut up the Temple-gates, and prohibited the ordinary Sacrifices, having before that, taken all the precious Presents out of the same. After he had in this fort committed these outrages against God, he dyed, when he was 36 years old, and after he had reigned 16 years, and left his Son Ezechias, to succeed him in the Kingdom. At that very time dyed Phaceias King of the Israelites, by means of a certain Conspiracy, which Oseas his intended friend wrought against him: who held the Kingdom for the space of nine years, shewing himself to be wicked, and a contemner of God. Against him Salmanaſar King of Assyria raised a War, and overcame him; because God was not favourable unto him, neither assistant to his enterprises: he was therefore subdued, and constrained to pay a certain Tribute imposed upon him.

The fourth year of the Reign of Oseas, Ezechias the Son of Achaz, and Abia a Citizen of Jerusalem, reigned over the two Tribes. He was a man of a virtuous disposition, and one that loved justice and piety; for as soon as he came unto the Kingdom, he resolved with himself first of all, that there was nothing more necessary and advantageous, than the establishment of the service of God. Wherefore he had assembled the People, the Priests, and the Levites, he began to discourse with them in these or such like words: There is no one of you but knoweth, that for my Fathers Offences, and for your irreverence and disregard to the service of God, ye are fallen into many calamities, because through your extreme madness, you have suffered your selves to be persuaded to adore those, whom he esteemed to be no gods. Since therefore you have learnt (to your own misery) how pernicious a thing impiety is, I exhort you, that you purifie both your selves, your Priests and your Levites, from your former pollutions, that yet at length you may assemble together, and open the Temple, and cleanse the same with ordinary Sacrifices, to the end it may be restored to the ancient honour which heretofore it enjoyed: for by this means God will be favourable unto us, when his wrath shall be appeased that was kindled against us. As soon as the King had spoken after this manner, the Priests opened the Temple, and after they had gathered the sacred Vessels, and call all the uncleanly out of it, they offered Sacrifices upon the Altar, according to the Custom. Afterwards the King sent to all the Provinces under his Dominion, and gathered together the People of Jerusalem, to celebrate the Feast of Unleavened Bread (which had been intermitted a long time, through the impiety of the Kings Predecessors.) He sent also unto the Israelites, exhorting them to forsake the Customs which of a long time they had wickedly observed, and to return to the true and ancient manner of serving God, certifying them, that he would permit them to repair to Jerusalem, to celebrate the Feast of Unleavened Bread, promising them that he himself would solemnize the same with them also: protesting that he did this, not in respect of his own profit, but through the desire he had to promote their felicity, who should be happy, if they obeyed this his Counsel.

When Ezechias's Ambassadors came unto the Israelites, and had delivered unto them the Message that they had in Charge; so far were they from complying with them, that they mocked them, and esteemed them to be mad, and spit upon those Prophets that exhorted them to piety, and foretold them the evils they should suffer, if they served not the true God: and finally they laid hold on them, and put them to the Sword. And not contenting themselves with this presumption, they attempted yet far worse things, and never gave over, until that God (for a punishment of their impiety) subjected them to their Enemies, as shall appear hereafter: But divers of the Tribes of Manasses, Zabulon, and Issachar, (respecting the good Counsels of the Prophets) submitted themselves to the service of God, and repaired all together to Jerusalem, to King Ezechias, to honour God: As soon as they were arrived there, Ezechias went up into the Temple, accompanied with the Governors and all the People; and offered there seven Bulls, seven Rams,

Hand as many Goats: and after that he and all the Governors had laid their hands upon the heads of the Sacrifice, they deliver'd them to the Priest, according as it is appointed to them, and they sacrificed, and made Burnt-offerings of them. The Levites also (assisting round about with Instruments of Musick) sing Hymns and Songs unto God, according as they had been taught by the Ordinance of David: The other Priests had Trumpets, which they used in Confort to the Tune of their Hymns. Which done, the King and all the People cast themselves prostrate upon the Ground, and adored God; and afterwards sacrificed 7 Oxen, an 100 Sheep, and 200 Lambs. The King likewise bestow'd 600 Oxen, and 3000 Sheep upon the People, to feast withal. And when the Priests had joyfully perform'd all things (according to the Custom contain'd in the Law) the King fate down and eat with the People, and gave Thanks unto God. And when the Feast of Unleaven'd Bread was come, they eat the Passover, and during the seven other Days, they offer'd up their other Sacrifices. The King gave, in way of Gratuity, unto the People (besides that which had been offer'd) 2000 Oxen, and 7000 Sheep. The Governors did the like, and gave the People a 1000 Bulls, and 1400 Sheep. And thus was the Feast solemniz'd, which had not been so magnificently and devoutly celebrated since Solomon's time. When the Solemnity of this Feast was past, they journeyed, and went thorow the Country, and purifi'd it: They purged the King likewise of all Idols, and the King ordain'd that the Daily Sacrifices should be made according to the Law, upon his Charge. He enacted also, That the People should pay the Tithes to the Priests and Levites, with the First-fruits; to the intent they might wholly intend Piety, and never esrange themselves from the Service of God. By which means it came to pass, that the People brought all kind of Fruit to the Priests and Levites: which the King put up in certain Store-houses, which he had built, to be distributed to every one of them, their Wives and Children; and by this means they returned again to their former Purity in Religion. After the King had disposed all things in this sort, he made War upon the Philistines, and overcame them, and seiz'd all their Cities (between Gaza and Gath.) About this time the King of Assyria sent unto him, and threatened him, That if he would not pay those Tributes which his Father before him had paid unto him, he would destroy all his Country. Ezechias set on fire by his Threats, assuring himself in that Piety and Zeal he bore towards God, and in the Prophet Ezy, by whom he was exactly instructed touching all those things that were to succeed.

Salmanaſar slayeth the King of Israel, and leadeth the Israelites captive into the Country of Media.

When Tydings was brought to Salmanaſar, King of Assyria, that the King of Israel had privily sent unto Soan, King of Egypt, to request his Assistance against the Syrians, he was fore displeased, and drew forth his Army against Samaria, in the seventh Year of the Reign of Oseas. But the King of Israel withstood his entrance into the City, by which means he was besieged therein for three Years space, and finally Samaria was taken by force, in the ninth Year of Oseas, and the seventh of Ezechias's Reign; at which time all the Kingdom of Israel was destroy'd, and all the People transported into the Countries of Media and Persia; and amongst the rest, King Oseas was taken Prisoner. The King of Assyria caus'd certain Nations of a Country called Chur, so sitled from a River of that name, to remove their Habitation, and to dwell in Samaria, and inhabit the Country of Israel. As for the ten Tribes of Israel, they were transported out of their Country 947 Years, since their Predecessors (departing out of Egypt) possessed the Country of Canaan, 800 Years after the Government of Joshua, and 240 Years, seven Months, and seven Days, since they revolted from Roboam, David's Nephew, to give the Kingdom to Jeroboam. This was the end of the Israelites, who transgressed the Laws, and disobeyed the Prophets, who foretold them of that Calamity which should happen unto them, except they repented them of their Impieties. The Sedition that they rais'd against Roboam, in taking his Servant for their King, was the Original of their Mischiefs; for Jeroboam committing Impiety against God, and they imitating his Wickedness, caus'd God to be displeas'd with them, so that he punish'd them according as they deser'd. But the King of Assyria ravaged and spoiled all Syria and Phoenicia with his Army, and his Name is found written in the Chronicles of the Tyrants; for he made War against the Tyrants, at such time as Eulaleus reigned in Tyre, whereof Menander maketh mention, who wrote the History of Tyre, which hath been translated into the Greek Tongue. The King Ezechias foretold the service of the King of Assyria.

Eluleus (saith he) reigned thirty six Years, and pursued the Chutheans that were revolted A. from him by Sea, and made them subject. Against whom the King of Assyria sent forth his Army, and invaded all Phoenicia, and afterwards having made a Peace with them, he returned back again into the Cities of Sydon, Acne, and Old Tyre, and divers other Cities revolted from the Tyrians, and submitted themselves to the King of Assyria.

For this Cause, and for that they of Tyre did not obey him, he drew his Army forth one more against them; and he was furnished by the Phoenicians with 60 Ships, and 800 Rowers. The Tyrians charging their Ships with twelve of their Vessels, overbore the Navy of the Assyrians, and took about 500 Men Prisoners: which Act of theirs wonderfully increased their Honour. But the King of Assyria returning back again, planted a Garrison upon the River, set a Guard upon the Fountain heads, to the intent the Tyrians might draw no Water; which Act of his (continuing for the space of five Years) they were enforced to find and dig for new Springs to sustain themselves.

These things are written in the Registers of the Tyrians themselves, as also the Exploits of the King of Assyria against them. But these Chutheans from the Region of Chut, which is in Persia, (where there is a River of that name) for that they were of several Nations, they brought with them each of them the God whom they honour'd in their Nation, to the number of five Gods, whom they served after the manner of their Country. Whereupon the true God was displeas'd, and provok'd against them, for a Plague fell amongst them, that consumed them in such sort, that they could find no Remedy, until they were told that they ought to Adore the God of the Hebrews, and that therein consisted their Safety: They therefore sent unto the King of Assyria, requiring him to send them Priests from amongst the Israelites, whom he had led away Prisoners in War. By whose assistance they learnt the Law, and the Manner of God's Service, and began very diligently to observe both; by which means the Plague ceased. And now even unto this day continue they in the same Religion, and are called by the Hebrews, Chutheans, and Samaritans by the Greeks. These, as often as they find the Jews in Prosperity, call them their Cousins, (according to the variety and changes of Time,) but if they perceive their Fortunes to be on the declining hand, then abjure they Consanguinity, and renounce their Relation to them, and say, That they were planted in the Country, and drawn thither from a foreign Nation. But in time and place D convenient, we will speak of them more largely.

Sennacherib King of Assyria, besiegeth Ezechias in Jerusalem.

IN the Fourteenth year of the Reign of Ezechias King of the two Tribes, Sennacherib, King of Assyria, drew forth a huge Army against him, and surprized all the Cities of Judea and Benjamin by strong hand. To him Ezechias sent Ambassadors, promising him obedience, and such a Tribute as it should please him to impose. When Sennacherib had heard the Ambassadors, he resolved on Peace, and accepted Ezechias offer, promising that he would depart, as soon as he should have received Three hundred Talents of silver, and Thirty Talents of gold; swearing unto the Ambassadors, That upon these conditions he would depart away, without committing any outrage. Ezechias giving credit to these words of his, emptied the Treasuries, and sent the prefixed sum to Sennacherib, hoping to be delivered from his enemy, and the hazard wherein his Country stood. But the Assyrians having received the money, set light by their promises, so that Sennacherib went in person to make War against the Egyptians and Ethiopians, and left Rapsaces his General in Judea with a great power, accompanied with two of his chief Minions and Courtiers, with commission to spoil Jerusalem: The names of these two were Tharata and Anacheris. As soon as they were encamped near unto the Walls, they sent unto Ezechias, and commanded him to come and speak with them: But he through fear which he had conceived, went not unto them, but sent three of his most familiar friends, Eliacim the Superintendent of his Realm, Sobna, and Joachas, that had the commission of his Registers.

These three presented themselves before the Chieftains of the Assyrian Army, whom when Rapsaces beheld, he commanded them to return unto their Master, and to tell him, That the great King Sennacherib was desirous to know upon what hope he might expect his Summons, and refuseth to admit his Army into the City? It is perhaps, because he hopeth the Egyptians will have the upper hand of the Kings Army? If that be his hope, doublet's he is deceived, seeming himself to be like unto a man that slayeth himself upon a broken reed; by which he is not only not supported, but in his fall hath his hand pierced therewith. He likewise wished him to conceive, that this his expedition was not without the will of God, who, as in times past, hath given them the victory over the Israelites, so now also is pleased to humble Ezechias, and to make both him and his Subjects sloop under the Assyrian government. Whilst Rapsaces spake thus in the Hebrew language, (wherein he was very skilful) Eliacim (fearing lest the multitude should be strucken with fear upon the hearing of these words) besought him to speak in the Syriack Tongue. But he sufficiently instructed what it was that he feared, answered him with a louder voice in the Hebrew Tongue, and told them, They ought to give ear unto the Kings commandment, and to yield themselves to his mercy, because it concerned their their security. I am not ignorant (said he) that both you and your King do flatter the people with vain hopes, and fraudulently allure them to bear Arms against us. But if your Valour be ought at all, and you suppose that you can raise the siege from your walls, let us have some specimen of your courage, and send out 2000 Horse, to encounter the like number, which shall be drawn out of our Army: But alas! it is not to be expected, since you are not able to raise so great a Force. Why therefore delay you? Why yield you not to those that are too strong for you, and are able, even in spite of your resistance, to ransack your City? Whereas you know that a willing submission is always secure: Contrariwise, whereas duty is enforced, there wanteth no peril of calamity.

When both the Ambassadors and the People had heard what the Assyrian had spoken, they reported the same to Ezechias, who incontinently cast his Royal garments off, and clothed himself in sackcloth, discovering his trouble and sorrow in his countenance; and casting himself prostrate upon the earth, after the manner of their Countrey, he besought God to be assistant unto him, since all other hope was vain. He sent also certain of his friends, and some Priests, unto the Prophet Esay, requiring him to pray unto God, That since Sacrifice was offered unto him for publick security, it might please him to frustrate the enemies hopes, and to have pity and compassion on his people. When the Prophet had performed what was required, he received an answer from God, by which he assured the King, and all that were about him, retelling them, that the enemies should be overcome without stroke stricken, and should retire with shame, and not with that advantage which they promis'd to themselves at present, because God had already determined how they should be overthrown. He foretold also, that Senacherib himself (the King of Assyria) should fail of his enterprise in Egypt, and that upon his return to his own Court, he should be slain. At that very time the Assyrian wrote Letters to Ezechias, in which he called him fool and mad-man, to think that he could secure himself from being his slave, yea, his insupportable, who had conquered divers and far greater Nations: threatening him with utter ruin at such time as he should surprize the City, if he opened not the gates of Jerusalem willingly, to entertain his Army. When Ezechias had read these Letters, he set light by them, by reason of the confidence he had in God: and having opened them, he spread them in the Temple. And whilst he renewed his prayers unto God for the salvation of the City and his Subjects, Esay the Prophet told him, That his prayer was heard: that hereafter likewise they should manure their lands in peace and security, and should enjoy their possessions without fear. Not long after, the King of Assyria having but cold success in his expedition against Egypt, turned back again without doing any thing, for this cause that ensued. He had lost much time in the siege of Pelusium: and at such time as he had already raised certain Bulwarks as high as the Wall, so that he wanted nothing but to give the assault; News was brought him that Targisēs, King of Ethiopia, brought an Army to rescue the Egyptians, with an intent to take his way throw the Desert, and suddenly to charge the Assyrian Army. Senacherib troubled with these tydings, speedily departed thence with his Army. But Herodotus saith, That he made War with Vulcanus Priests (for so he stileth this King of Egypt, because he was a Priest of that E) false God) and moreover addeth, That besieging Pelusium, for this cause he gave over the siege: The King of Egypt called to his God for assistance, by whose power the Arabians suffered much misery. But in this also he erreth, in that he setteth down the Arabian for the Assyrian.

There came one night so great a number of Rats into the Army, that they gnawed to pieces all their Bow-strings, and made the rest of their Arms unserviceable: Whence it came to pass, that the King being disarmed, withdrew his siege from Pelusium. But Berofus, a Writer amongst the Chaldees, maketh mention of Senacherib, and how he reigned among the Assyrians, and troubled both Asia and Egypt with War, and declareth the manner in these words: But Senacherib returning from the Egyptian War came before Jerusalem, and received the Army that was there, at the hands of the Governor Rablake, and God caused a pestilent sickness to fall upon his Army, which was so violent, that the first night of the siege, there died an hundred thousand and five thousand men, with the Governors and Chieftains. With which loss he was so affrighted, and troubled, that fearing to lose his Army, he fled with those that remained, and retired himself into his Kingdom to the City called Nineve, where after he had lived for a time, he was traiterously slain by Adramelech and Selenar his two elder sons; and being dead, was carried into his own Temple called Arulche, and his children were driven out of the Kingdom for committing the Murder, and retired themselves into Armenia, and Asserodochus his youngest son succeeded Senacherib. Such was the end of the Assyrian Army that came before Jerusalem.

C H A P. II.

Ezechias having for a time remained in peace, dieth: And leaveth his son Manasses to succeed him.

King Ezechias (being in this sort beyond all hope delivered from his fears), offered thanksgiving and sacrifices unto God, with all the People: Acknowledging that there was no other cause that had slain part of his enemies, and put the rest to mortal fear, nor delivered Jerusalem from thralldom, but only Gods succour and assistance. And whilst he altogether intended and was occupied about the service of God, he fell sick of a grievous disease, so as the Physicians despaired of his health, and his friends expected nothing but his death. But that which occasioned the greatest trouble, was, that he had no children, and saw that he was now to depart the world, and to leave his house without a successor, and his Kingdom desolate. In this affliction he besought God, That it would please him to lengthen his life a little time, until he had children to succeed him; and that he would vouchsafe that his soul might not be taken from him, before he were the father of a son. Hereupon God taking compassion of him, (and the rather, because he was not grieved for that the pleasures of his Kingdom were taken from him; but for that he sought for a lawful heir to succeed him) he sent the Prophet Esay unto him, to assure him, that after three days he should be recovered of his sickness; and that after he had lived, some fifteen years more, he should depart out of this life, and leave a lawful heir behind him. When the Prophet (according as he was commanded) had brought these tydings to the King, he doubted both the unexpected messenger, and the mightiness of his disease: For which cause, he required some prodigious sign at Esaias's hands, to the intent that he might certainly believe, that he was sent as a messenger from God unto him: for the truth of those things which either exceed our hope, or reason, are wont to be confirmed by these means. Whereupon Esay asked him what sign he required, and it should be given him. He answered, that he desired to see the shadow of the Sun go back ten degrees upon his Quadrant. On this occasion the Prophet besought God, that it would please him to confirm the King by this miracle: Who seeing that which he desired, was suddenly delivered from his sickness, and went up into the Temple to worship and praise God. At that time it hapned, that the Monarchy of the Assyrians was destroyed by the Medes, (whereof I will speak in another place.) Not long after, Balad King of Babylon sent an Ambassador to Ezechias with Presents, calling him his ally and friend: Who receiving his messengers, he feasted them, and shewed them his treasures, his arsenal, and all other magnificence that he had of gold and precious stones: and after he had given them Presents for Balad, he dismissed them. Whereupon the Prophet Esay came unto him, asking him from whence those Ambassadors came? To whom Ezechias answered, That they were of Babylon, and came unto him from their King; telling the Prophet how he had shewed them all that which he had, to the end that having seen and observed his riches and power, they might afterwards certify the King thereof. Whereunto the Prophet replied, saying, Know thou, that within a little time thy riches shall be transported into Babylon, and thy children shall be made Eunuchs, and (being no more men) shall be slaves unto the King of Babylon. All which God gave him to understand before it hapned. Ezechias was troubled to hear these tydings, saying, That he desired that his people might not fall into those miseries: But since it was impossible to change the Decree of God, he required that he might have peace during his life-time. Of this Balad King of Babylon, Berofus maketh mention. This Prophet truly divine and admirable for the verity of his Prophecies, is accounted to have spoken nothing that was untrue, but to have left in writing all that which he Prophesied: The truth whereof hath afterwards, in effect, appeared to posterity. Neither did he alone perform thus much; but besides him, twelve others have done the like: and all that which is hapned unto us, either good or evil, hath fallen out truly according to their Prophecies. But hereafter we will speak of every one of them. Now when Ezechias had lived his prefixed time, (according as we have before related) and governed his kingdom in peace, he died when he was 54 years old, and in the 29 year of his Reign.

the Israelites, who were destroyed, because of their heinous sins committed against God. He was so impudent, as he spared not to pollute the very Temple of God, the City, and the whole Countrey: and being no longer to be restrain'd by any fear of the just vengeance of God; he barbarously put to death many good and virtuous Men, and spared not the very Prophets; so that Jerusalem was overwhelmed with blood. For which cause God being provoked unto wrath by his heinous offences, sent divers Prophets, the one after the other, both to the King and the people, by whom he threatened to inflict the same calamities upon them; which (for contempt of Religion) the Israelites their Brethren had a little before suffered. But they not giving heed to their Predictions, (whose admonitions had they respected, they might have prevented their eminent evils) at length experimented the truth thereof. For whereas they persevered in their accustomed and dissolute manners, God stirred up the King of Chaldea and Babylon against them; who sending their Armies into Judea, and spoiling the whole Region, at length surprized and led away Manasse Prisoner, and made him liable to what punishment it should please them to inflict. Then this miserable Prince (taught by his own experience) acknowledged his sin, and humbly besought God to have compassion on him.

His prayer was heard; and after some space of time, the Babylonian sending him home, restored him to his former government. As soon as he was returned back to Jerusalem, he made it appear, by the change of his life, that his repentance was sincere, and endeavoured nothing more, than to abolish the memory of his former actions, and employed his whole care to establish the service of God. He purged the Temple also, and cleansed the City; and from that time forward, he addicted himself wholly to think how he might give God thanks, for that he had thus delivered him from ruin, and how he might pay all the remnant of his life in his favour. He taught the People likewise to do the like, telling them what miseries they had endured within a few years, because they had demeaned themselves impiously. He repaired the Altar also, and according to Moses Precept, offered thereon solemn Sacrifices: And after that he had provided those things that concerned the service of God, he took care likewise for the security of the City of Jerusalem, and repaired the old and ruined walls, and built some anew, for the enlarging of the City; he erected high Towers likewise, furnishing the same with munition, and victual sufficient for a City of defence. And so much was he changed during the rest of his life, that he was held most happy; and after that he began to serve God, he invited many to the imitation of his virtues. After he had lived 67 years, he died in the 5th year of his Reign, and was buried in his garden. His Kingdom came into the hands of his son Amon, the son of Emassea, of the City of Jabath; who imitating the Impieties to which his father addicted himself in his youth, was slain in his own house, by a conspiracy plotted by his own household-servants, after he had lived 24 years, and reigned two. After his death, the people slew his murderers, and he was buried with his Father, and the Kingdom was given to his son Josias, who was eight years old.

C H A P. IV.

The History of Josias.

THE Mother of Josias King of Judea, was of the City of Bosceeb, and was called Jeda: This Prince was by nature so excellently disposed to all virtue, that during the whole course of his life, he proposed to himself no other example but that of his Predecessor King David. When he grew to be twelve years old, he gave a manifest proof of his piety and justice: For he drew the people to a conformable course of life, and to the detestation and abolishing of Idols, that were no gods, and to the service of the onely and true God of their forefathers. And considering the actions of his Predecessors, he began to rectify them in that wherein they were deficient, with no less circumspection, than if he had been an old man; and that which he found to be advicably done by them, he did promote and imitate. And besides this wisdom, which was innate to him, he made use also of the advice and counsel of the Elders: For following the laws, (both in respect of publick policy, as also in religion) he walked uprightly, in that by observing them, he could not err. He made a particular inquiry both in Jerusalem, and the Countrey round about, for those places where they had set up the worship of false gods, and overthrew their Altars; and all those gifts that had been offered to them by his Predecessors, were defaced: and in this manner caused he the People to return to the service of God, and to forsake the honour they did unto Idols. He offered likewise the ordinary sacrifices and burnt-offerings upon the altar, and established Judges and Magistrates to determine publick debates, and to do each man right; charging them to have no less respect of equity, than they had of their own lives. He sent also thorough all the Countrey, commanding that all those that would be Contributors, either in gold or silver, silver, towards the reparation of the Temple, should bring in their benevolence, according to their abilities. And when all the money was gathered together, he appointed Superintendents, both over the Temple, as also over the charges that were defrayed in the reparation thereof: Namely, Amasias, who was Governour of the City, and Saphan the Secretary, and Joaza, who was over the Registers, with the High-Priest Elcia: who with all expedition and diligence provided workmen, and all that which was requisite for the building, and began the work. This sudden and speedy reparation of the Temple, gave a manifest testimony of the Kings piety: who, when he had attained to the 18th year of his age, sent Elcia the High-Priest, and caused him to melt down the remainder of the money that was given towards the building of the Temple, and to make vessels, cups and ewers for the service of the Altar. He commanded also, that all the Gold and Silver that was in the Treasury, should be brought forth, and employed after the like manner, in cups and other vessels. Now whilst the High-Priest search'd the Treasury, he found the sacred Books of Moses in the Temple, which he brought and deliver'd to the Scribe Saphan; who, after he had perused the same, presented them unto the King, giving him to understand, that all that which he had commanded, was accomplished: Besides that, he read the Books unto him, which when the King heard, he rent his cloaths, and called Elcia the High-Priest unto him, and the Scribe Saphan, with certain other of his inward friends and sent them unto the Prophetess Olda, the wife of Sallum, a man in high dignity, and famous for his Nobility, commanding them, That when they came unto her, they should endeavour to appease Gods wrath, and labour to recover his favour, because it was to be feared, that by reason their Ancestors had transgressed the Laws of Moses, they should be in danger to be dispossessed of their Countrey, and abandoned by all men, should as length of time perish miserably.

When the Prophetess had heard the Kings commandment, she willed those that were sent unto her, to return unto the King, and to certify him from her, That God had given sentence against them, which might not be revoked by any prayers whatsoever; namely, that since they had transgressed the Law of Moses, the people should perish, and should be cast out of their Countrey, and deprived of all their goods, because they had not repented of the violation of his most holy Laws; notwithstanding the Prophets had exhorted them to repentance, and had foretold the punishment of their impieties, which should happen unto them, so the end that they might believe that God is God, and that he fails not in any thing that he hath foretold by his Prophets. Furthermore she said, That he forbore as yet to send these afflictions upon them for Josias sake, who was a virtuous man, but that after his decease, God would pour out his wrath upon the people. This Prophecy of the Woman they signifi'd unto the King, who sent into all parts, and assembled the people in Jerusalem, commanding the Priests and Levites, and generally all men, without distinction of age or person, to be present in that Convention. Now when they were assembled, he first of all caused the sacred books to be read, and afterwards standing aloft upon his Throne, he caused all the people to swear and promise, that they should serve God, and keep Moses Laws. Whereupon all of them did willingly approve of whatsoever he said (promising to do that whereunto they were exhorted.) And therewithal offering up Sacrifices unto God, they besought him to shew himself favourable and merciful towards them. The King likewise commanded the High-Priest, that if there were any vessels in the Temple which were made by his Predecessors, in honour of Idols, and strange gods, he should cast them out; and after that a great number were found therein, all of them were gather'd together and burnt, and the ashes afterwards were scatter'd abroad. And as touching the Priests (that appertained to Idols that were not of the Race of Aaron) he put them to death. When these things were thus executed in Jerusalem, he came afterwards to the plain Countrey, and all that which N Jeroboam had erected there in honour of Idols, he utterly defaced it, and the bones of the false Prophets were burnt upon the Altar that Jeroboam had built. This had the Prophet foretold that came to Jeroboam at such time as he offered Sacrifice, and told him in the presence of all the people, all that which should happen: Namely, That one of Dauids posterity called Josias, should do these things: which Prophecy took effect 361 years after. After this, King Josias applied himself to the Israelites, (who had avoided the captivity and servitude of the Assyrians) and persuaded them to forsake their Impieties, and the services they had performed to strange gods, and to honour the sovereign and true God of their fathers, and to cleave unto him. He made a search also thorough every house, borough and city, fearing lest as yet there should be an Idol hidden. He likewise sought out the Chariots that were made by his Ancestors, in honour of the Sun, and all that which was adored, whatsoever it were, and utterly abolished the same. After he had in this sort purged the Countrey, he assembled all the people in Jerusalem, where he celebrated the Feast of unleavened bread, which we call Easter. Towards the performance formance whereof, he gave the people young kids and lambs, to the number of 30000, A and 3000 Bullocks, for burnt-offerings; and the chief among the Levites, distributed amongst the other Levites 500 Lambs, and 500 Bullocks. Having therefore such an abundance of Beasts, they sacrificed according to the Law of Moses, (the Priests taking charge thereof, and confirming the rest of the people by their example.) Neither was there ever such a solemnity kept by the Hebrews, since the time of Samuel the Prophet; because all things were done according to the Laws, and the ancient Customs, which were observed in the time of their Fathers. After this, Josias lived in peace, riches, honour, and estimation amongst all men: and thus ended his life.

Divers exploits of Necho.

Necho, King of Egypt, having gathered great forces, conducted his Army towards the River Euphrates, to war against the Medes and Babylonians, who had destroyed the Empire of Assyria: For Necho affected the government of all Asia. Now when he drew near unto the City of Mende, (which was under Josias subjection) King Josias denied him passage, and would not suffer his Army to march thorow his Country. For which cause Necho sent an Herald unto him, to let him understand, That it was not against him that he made War, but that he bent his course towards Euphrates: For which cause he wished him in no fort to hinder his intended journey, lest thereby he should be constrained to make war upon him. But Josias regarded not this demand of his, but resolved himself to hinder his passage thorow his Country: And I am persuaded that his evil Genius put him upon making this resistance, to the end that he might have some occasion to do something against Necho. For whilst he set in order his Army, and rode from one Band to another, being mounted upon his Chariot, he was stricken with an arrow that was shot by a certain Egyptian, which put a stop to his proceedings: For feeling himself oppressed with pain, by reason of his wound, he commanded his Army to retire, and returned himself to Jerusalem, where he dyed of his wound, and was buried with his Fathers with great Magnificence, after he had lived 39 years, and Reigned 31. For him D the people mourned with great heaviness, lamenting for many days. The Prophet Jeremy also made an Elegy upon him in verse, which is as yet extant even in these days. This Prophet foretold in writing those evils which should afterwards happen unto the City, and the Captivity werewith we are entangled at this present, and the surprisal of Babylon. Neither hath he alone foretold the same, but the Prophet Ezekiel hath likewise done the like, who first left two Books written of the same Argument. These two Prophets were of the race of the Priests. But Jeremy kept in Jerusalem, from the 14th year of the Reign of Josias, until the destruction of the City and Temple, as in time and place convenient we will declare, setting down those occurrences that happened to this Prophet. After the death of Josias (hitherto mentioned) his son Joaz succeeded him in the Kingdom, at such time as he was 23 years old, he reigned in Jerusalem, and his mothers name was Amstala: He was a man full of impiety, and of a malignant and perverse nature. The King of Egypt returning from the War, sent unto Joaz, commanding him to meet him in Samath a City of Syria, where he was no sooner arrived, but he kept him Prisoner, committing the Kingdom to Eliachim his brother, (on the Fathers side) who was his elder brother likewise. He changed his name likewise, and call'd him Joachim: he impos'd a Tribute also on Judea, of 100 Talents of Silver, and a Talent of Gold, which Joachim paid; and as touching Joaz, he led him into Egypt, where he finished his days, after he had been King three months, and ten days. Now Joachims mother was called Zbada, of the City of Alunna. He was a wicked person, and of a malignant nature, F having neither piety towards God, nor respect towards Men.

Nabuchodonosors Army cometh into Syria.

IN the fourth year of the Reign of Joachim, a certain man called Nabuchodonosor, possessed the Kingdom of Babylon, who at that time went out with a great Army against Carchabeta, (a City situate near unto Euphrates) resolving with himself to fight against Necho King of Egypt, under whose power all Syria was subject. Necho understanding G of the Babylonians intent, and how great his Army was, made very little account thereof, but with a huge Army advanced towards Euphrates, with an intent to repulse Nabuchodonosor, Hchodonosor. But he was overcome in battel, and lost divers thousands of his men. Whereupon, the Babylonian (passing Euphrates) seized all Syria, as far as Pelusium, (Judea only excepted.) The fourth year that Nabuchodonosor reigned over these Conquered Countries, and in the eighth year of the Reign of Joachim over the Hebrews, the Babylonian led forth his Army against the Jews with a mighty power, threatening them to use all hostility, except Joachim would pay him Tribute. Joachim fearing his threats, bought his peace with silver, and payed for three years space the Tributes that were imposed on him. But in the third year (understanding that the Egyptian was up in Arms against the Babylonians) he denied the payment of the Tribute, notwithstanding he was frustrated of his hope, for the Egyptians were not so hardy as to make War. All which the Prophet Jeremy daily foretold him signifying unto him, That he built his hope in vain upon the Egyptians; and that it would fall out, that the City should be overthrown by the King of Babylon, and Joachim himself should be delivered Prisoner into his hands. But because there was no means for them to escape this justice, all that which he said, was nothing available. For notwithstanding the People and Governors heard thereof yet made they no reckoning of the same, but were displeased with those counsels which he proposed unto them, accusing Jeremy, as if he took pleasure to utter and publish ominous and adverse Presages against the King; they likewise called him in question before the Kings Council, and requir'd that he might be condemn'd. Whereupon some of them gave sentence against him: But others took a more discreet course, and persuaded them to cause the Prophet to depart out of the Kings house, forbidding his Adversaries to do him any mischief: Since that he had not only foretold the future calamities of the City, but that many before him had done the like, as Micheas, and divers others; and yet that no one of them had suffer'd any evil by the Kings of their time, but that contrariwise Micheas had been honour'd as a Prophet sent from God. By these words they appeald the People, and deliver'd Jeremy from the death intended against him. This Man wrote all his Prophecies, and read them to the People in their Fasts, when they were assembled in the Temple in the ninth month of the fifth year of the Reign of Joachim, which book he had composed touching that which should happen unto the City, the Temple, and the People. When the Governors heard the same, they took the book from him, and commanded L that both he and his Secretary Baruch should withdraw themselves out of the sight of men: And they took the book, and presented it unto the King; who, in the presence of his freinds, commanded his Secretary to read the same: and after he had heard the contents thereof, he waxeth wroth, and renting it in pieces, cast it into the fire, intending that it should never be seen. He sent out likewise a strict Commission to seek out Jeremy, and his Secretary Baruch, and to lead them out to be punished. But they were already fled, that they might prevent his indignation.

M Nabuchodonosor putteth Joachim to death, and establisheth Joachim in the Kingdom.

NOT long after this, he went out to meet the King of Babylon, who was marched out to make War against him: and being incredulous and careless of the Prophets Predictions he opened the gates unto him, supposing that he intended him no evil. But when the Babylonians were entered into the City, the King observed not his promises, but put all such to death as were in the flower and strength of their years, and spared none of the Inhabitants of Jerusalem, with them also he slew their King Joachim, and caused his body to be cast from the top of the walls, and vouchsafed him no Sepulchre, establishing Joachim his son King of the Country, and of the City. Moreover, he took 3000 of King of Judea. The most honourable Citizens of Jerusalem Prisoners, and led them to Babylon with him, amongst whom was the Prophet Ezekiel, at that time very young in years. This was the end of King Joachim; who lived 36. years, and reigned 11. Joachim that succeeded him in the Kingdom, was the son of Nest of Jerusalem, and reigned three months and ten days.

C H A P. VIII.

Nabuchodonosor changeth his purpose, and besiegeth Joachin, and receiveth him upon composition.

AS soon as the Babylonian had bestowed the Kingdom of Judea on Joachin, he was seized with a sudden fear, which made him suspect lest Joachin remembering himself of the injuries he had done unto him by the murder of his father, might draw the Country into rebellion, and revolt against him. For which cause he sent out certain Forces, and besieged Joachin in Jerusalem: who being a man of good nature, and of an upright heart, was loth to forsake the City in that danger without a Governour, considering that it was for his cause that the Common-weal was in that hazard. For which cause, taking his wife, and his nearest akin with him, he delivered them into the hands of the Captains that were sent against him, receiving an oath from them, that neither they nor the City should receive any harm. But this promise continued not a year: For the King of Babylon observed it not, but commanded his Captains to imprison all the youth and artificers that were in the City, and to bring them bound unto him. The number of them was 10832 persons, besides Joachin, his Mother, and his near Allies, whom they took Prisoners.

C H A P. IX.

Sedechias is made King over Jerusalem, by the Babylonians.

IN stead of Joachin, he appointed Sedechias his Uncle King of Jerusalem, whom he bound by an oath that he should govern the Country without any innovation, and that he should hold no intelligence with the Egyptians. This Sedechias was 21 years old at such time as he came unto the Kingdom, and was Joachin's brother by the Mothers side: He was a contemner of all laws, and perverter of Ordinances. For the young men that were about him, were without the fear of God, and all the people under his dominions, committed whatsoever outrages were best liking unto them. For this cause the Prophet Jeremey came unto him, protesting oftentimes against him, and denouncing, That if he would not forsake his impieties, and additt himself to that which was just, (but gave ear unto his Governours, amongst which there were many wicked men, and to those false Prophets that misled him, trusting that the Babylonians should not make War against his City, but that the Egyptians should levy an Army, and overcome them) that then he should suffer much misery. For (said he) they have no truth in their sayings, and they will always mislead you by false reports. Whilst Sedechias gave ear to these discourses of the Prophet, he was persuaded, and acknowledg'd all that to be true which he had spoken, and very profitable both for him, and his people; but anon after, his friends corrupted him, and diverted him according to their own opinions. Ezekiel also at the same time had prophesied in Babylon concerning all those calamities which were to fall upon the Temple, and sent notice to Jerusalem of that which he had received from God. Notwithstanding Sedechias gave no credit to his Prophesies, by reason that all the Prophets were accustomed to accord in all things the one with the other, as touching the surprisal of the City, and the imprisonment of Sedechias. But Ezekiel differed in this, that he said that Sedechias should not see Babylon; notwithstanding that Jeremey had prophesied, that the King of Babylon should lead him away Prisoner in bonds: Because therefore these two accorded not in all their sayings, he concluded that the matter wherein they agreed, was of no consequence. Notwithstanding all things hapned unto him according as the Prophets had pronounced; as we will declare hereafter. After that he had continued his alliance and friendship with the King of Babylon for the space of eight years, he break the league that was between them, and confederated with the Egyptians (under hope that they should overcome the Babylonians) Which when the King of Babylon understood, he led forth his Army against him, and destroy'd his Country to the uttermost; So that after he had taken his Cities of defence, he brought his Army before Jerusalem, and besieged it. The Egyptian perceiving the state wherein his Ally Sedechias was, levied an huge Army, and came into Judea, with an intent to raise the siege. Whereupon the Babylonian withdrew his Army from Jerusalem, to encounter with the Egyptian, and fought with him, and overcame him in Batel, and pressed on him with such courage, that he put him to flight and drove him out of Syria. As soon as the Babylonian was dilogged from Jerusalem, the false Prophets deceived Sedechias, telling him, That the Babylonian should never more return to make War either nor against him, or his Nation, and that he should never any more depart from his House in Babylon; and that they who had been led away Captives, should return home again: laden with shofa Vessels of the Temple which the King of Babylon had taken from them.

But the Prophet Jeremey presenting himself before the King, prophesied the contrary to these impostors, assuring both him and the People, That no Profit could befall them by means of the Egyptians, for that the Babylonians should overcome them, and should return and encamp before Jerusalem, and besiege the same, and destroy the People by Famine, and lead them away Prisoners: that were remaining, and carry away all their Substance; and that after they were seized of their Temple, they should finally burn the same: As for the City, they should raze it; and (said he) they shall keep us captive for the space of 70 Years: And from this Servitude the Persians and Medes shall deliver us, at such time as they have gotten the Empire out of the hands of the Babylonians; then shall they send us back again into our Country, and we shall build our Temple anew, and shall blissh the City of Jerusalem.

Divers Men gave credit to these Words of Jeremey; but the Governours, and such as concerned God, intreated him very cruelly, as if he had been a Man beside himself. And whereas he had an intent to visit his Native Country Anathoth, some 20 Furlongs from Jerusalem, one of the Magistrates encountering him in his Journey, and laying hold on him, retained him, loading him with this Slander, That he stole away to submit himself to the Babylonians. But Jeremey answer'd, That he was falsly accused, and that he repaired only to the place where he was born. This Prince giving him no credit, arrested him and brought him before the Judgment-seat, where he sustained all sorts of Outrages and Torments, and was shut up in Prison to be punish'd, and remain there for a time, suffering the extremity of Wrong and Injury. The ninth Year of the Reign of Sedechias, and on the tenth Day of the ninth Month, the King of Babylon came and encamped the second time before Jerusalem, and intrenched himself round about the same, for the space of eighteen Months, and laid siege thereto, using his utmost endeavour to make himself Master of the Place: And they that were besieged therein, were afflicted with two of the greatest Calamities, Famine and a most grievous Pestilence. At this time the Prophet Jeremey being in Prison, held not his peace, but cried with a loud voice, and preached and exhorted the People, willing them to entertain the Babylonians, and open their Gates unto them; because that in so doing, they might secure themselves with their Families, whereas otherwise they were assured of Destruction.

He foretold them also, That if any one remained in the City, he should most assuredly either perish by Famine, or the Enemies Fury; but if so be they submitted themselves to the Enemies Mercy, they should escape from Death. But those Governours that heard him speak after this sort, gave him no credit, in that they were not as yet pressed with the Danger; for which cause they came unto the King, and after a despiteful manner, told him all that which had been spoken, accusing Jeremey, and reproving him for a mad Man; urging this, That he had abated their Courage, and by his woful Preditions, had weakened the hearts of the People, which were otherwise ready to fight for him and their Country, by reason that he flying unto the Enemy, menac'd them with the surprisal and utter ruine of their City.

The King, in regard of the natural Humanity and Justice that was in him, was not any ways hereby provok'd against Jeremey; yet to the intent that he might not seem utterly to oppose the Governours, he deliver'd the Prophet into their hands, to deal with him howsoever they pleased: Who, having obtained this liberty from the King, entred the Prison on the sudden, and laying hold on Jeremey, they let him down into a Pit full of Mud, to the intent he might die in that place, and be strangled by the Filth; in effect, he was set therein up to the neck: But one of the King's Servants (an Ethiopian by Nation) certifi'd the King of the Prophet's Affliction, assuring him, That his Friends and Governours did not justly, so to thrust and bury the Prophet in the Mud, and cursedly to conspire against him, siring him with Bonds and Tortures worse than Death. Whereupon the King hearing this, was sorry that he had deliver'd the Prophet to the Governours, and commanded the Ethiopian to take 30 Men of his Court with him, (with Cords, and such other things necessary, as might concern the safety of the Prophet) charging him with all Expedition to deliver him from that Captivity. Hereupon the Ethiopian furnish'd with Men and necessary Means, drew the Prophet out of the Mud, and dismiss'd him without any Guard. That done, the King sent for him in private, demanding of him, If he had any Message to deliver him from God; praying him to let him understand whatsoever he knew as touching the success of the Siege. The Prophet's answer was, That altho' he should tell him, yet it would not be believed; and that if he should exhort him, he would not give ear, or listen unto him. O But, (said he) O King, thy Friends have condemn'd me to Death, as if I had been a most wicked Malefactor: But where are they now at this present that have deceived thee, and born thee in hand, saying, That the Babylonian would not come and besiege thee? Now will I take heed A the year of the how I tell thee the Truth, for fear lest thou condemn me to Death.

Hereupon the King swore unto him, That he should not die, neither that he would deliver him into the hands of the Governors. For which cause, Jeremy grounding himself upon the Faith which he had plighted unto him, counselled the King to yield up the City to the Babylonians, because that God had willed him to signify unto the King, That if he would save his Life, and avoid the imminent Danger, and save his City from utter Ruine, and preserve the Temple from Burning, he should submit; or otherwise that none but he should be reputed to be the cause of all those Evils that should happen unto the City and Citizens, and of this Calamity that should confound both him and all his Family. When the King heard this, he told him, That he would do according as he had counselled him, and perform whatsoever B
he thought necessary to be done: but that he feared that his Subjects, who were already gone over to the King of Babylon, would do him ill Offices with that King, and that by their means he might be accused, and deliver'd unto Death. But the Prophet encouraged him, telling him, That his fear was in vain; assuring him, that he should suffer no Evil, if so be he yielded up the City; and that neither his Wife, nor Children, nor the sacred Temple should suffer any Mischief.

Upon these words the King dismiss'd Jeremy, charging him to communicate the Counsel that was held between them to no one of the Citizens, no not to the Princes, if he should ask of him wherefore the King had sent for him; advising him to answer, if so be they were inquisitive, That he resorted to the King, to request him that he might be no more imprisoned: all which the Prophet performed; but they pressed him very much, to know for what cause the King had sent for him.

C H A P. X.

Jerusalem is taken, and the People carried into Babylon by Nebuchodonosor.

Mean while the Babylonian continued his violent Siege against the City of Jerusalem, and having raised Towers upon certain Bulwarks, he drave away by this means all those that appeared near unto the Walls; he raised also (round about the City) divers Platforms, that equalled the Walls in height. Mean while the City was as valiantly and courageously defended by the Inhabitants; for neither Pestilence nor Famine plucked down their Spirits: And although that within the City they were tormented with these Scourges, yet were not their Resolutions broken, nor did the Enemies Inventions astonish them, nor their Engines affright them; so that all the Battel betwixt the Babylonians and Jews, seem'd to be a Tryal both of Valour and Art, whilst these do as-surely hope to surprize the City, and the other thought their Safety consisteth herein, if they ceased not by new Inventions to frustrate their Enemies Endeavours. And in this State continu'd they both for the space of eighteen Months, until they were consumed by Famine, and by the Darts that were shot against them by those that shot from the Towers. At length the City was taken by the Princes of Babylon, (in the eleventh Year of the Reign of Zedechias, the ninth Day of the fourth Month (who were put in truit by Nabuchodonosor to manage the Siege; for he himself made his abode in the City of Reblata. Now if any Man be desirous to know the Names of them that had command at such time as Jerusalem was surpriz'd, these they be, Nergelar, Are- manus, Emerar, Nabisar, and Echarampsor. The City being taken about Midnight, the Princes of the Enemies Army entred into the Temple; which when Zedechias understood, he took his Wives and his Children, with the Princes and his Friends, and fled thorow a great Valley by the Defart: which when the Babylonians understood by certain Jews that were revolted, and had submitted themselves unto them, they arose early in the Morning to pursue them, and overtook and surprized them near unto Fricho:
 Whereupon those Princes and Friends of Zedechias that had taken their flight with him, seeing the Enemies near unto them, forsook him, and scattering themselves here and there, endeavour'd each of them to save himself. When therefore the Enemies had apprehended him, and attended by a few Followers only, and accompanied by his Children and Wives, they brought him unto the King's Presence, who no sooner beheld him, but he called him wicked and perfidious, and upbraided him for breach of his Promise, and contempt of Majesty. Furthermore, he reproached him for his Ingratitude, in that having received the Royalty from his hands (which he had taken from Joachim, to bestow on him) he had, notwithstanding, employed all his Forces against his Benefactor.

But

H But (said he) that great God that hateth thy Treachery, hath delivered thee into my hands.
 And when he had spoken these words, he caused Zedechias's Friends and Children to be slain before his eyes, with all his other Prisoners: afterwards commanding his eyes to be plucked out, he led him to Babylon. All which happened unto him, according as the Prophets, Jeremy and Ezekiel had foretold him; namely, that he should be surprized and brought before the King of Babylon, and should speak with him face to face, and should see him with his eyes (for so had Jeremy prophesied) but being made blind and conducted to Babylon, he should not see the City of Babylon (according as Ezekiel had foretold.) All which may sufficiently expresse to those that know not the Nature of God, how divers and admirable his Judgments be, in disposing all things in good Order, and pre-signifying those things that are to come, even as in this place there appeareth a most signal Example of Humane Error and Incredulity, by which it was not lawful for them to avoid their future Calamity, nor shun their unalterable Destiny.
 Thus was the Race of the Kings extinguished that descended from David, who were in Number, One and twenty, that reigned after him. All of them together governed five hundred and fourteen Years, six Months, and ten days; adding therunto the twenty Years of the first King Saul, who was of another Tribe. After this, the Babylonian sent Nabuzaradan, i. e.
 the Chief of his Army, unto Jerusalem, to spoil the Temple, giving him in charge, to burn both it and the King's Palace, and to raze and level the City with the ground; and afterwards to transport the People unto Babylon: Nabuzaradan arrived there the eleventh Year of the Reign of Zedechias, and spoiled the Temple, and carried away the Vessels that were consecrated to God's service, both those of old, as also those of Silvers; he took likewise the great Laver that was given by Solomon; the Columns and Pillars of Brass, with their Chape's likewise, and the Tables and Candlesticks of Gold: and after he had born away all things, he burned the Temple the first Day of the fifth Month, of the eleventh Year of Zedechias's Reign, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor's. He burned also the King's Royal Palace, and razed the City. This Temple was burned 470 Years six Months and ten Days after the Foundation thereof; and in the Year 1062, six Months and ten Days after the Departure of the People out of Egypt; and 1050 Years six Months and ten Days after the Deluge; from the Creation of Adam, until the Ruin of the Temple, there were three thousand five hundred and thirteen Years, six Months and ten Days. Thus have we set down the number of the Years, and expressed in what time every thing hath been performed. The General for the King of Babylon having destroyed the City, and transported the People, took Prisoner the High Priest Sereas, and his Colleague the Priest Saphan, with the Governours and Keepers of the Temple, which were three; the Eunuch also which had the charge over the rest, and seven of Zedechias's Friends, and his Secretary, besides sixty other Governors:
 all which (together with the Vessels which he had pillaged,) he sent to Reblata, a City of Syria, unto the King of Babylon; who commanded in that place, that the High Priest and Governours should be beheaded: as for the rest of the Prisoners, and Zedechias
 the King, he carried them with him to Babylon; he sent also in Bonds, with the rest, Josadach, the Son of Sereas the High Priest, whom he had put to Death in Rebla- tha (as we have before related.) And since we have reckoned up the Race of the Kings that swayed the Scepter of Judea, and given an account how long they Reigned, it will not be unnecessary to recite the names of the High Priests, and to report who they have been that have administrated the Priesthood under the Kings: Sadoc was the first High Priest of the Temple, built by Solomon. After him his Son Achimias succeeded in that Honour; and after Achimias, Azaras, after whom succeeded Joram, and after Joram, Josheua, after Josheua, Axioram, who had for his Successor Phideas; to Phideas succeeded Sudeas, to Sudeas, Julus, to Julus, Jotham, to Jotham, Urias, to Urias, Nerias, to Nerias, Odeas,

 he kept him until he died, and after his Death, he honoured him with a Royal Tomb.
 He likewise offered the Vessels that he had taken out of the Temple of Jerusalem unto his Gods, and caused the People to inhabit the Country of Babylon, delivering the High Priest from his Bonds. The General Nabuzaradan that led the People away captive, left the poorer Sort in the Country of Judea; and those also that voluntarily yielded themselves unto him, over whom he appointed Godolias, the Son of Aicam, Governour, (a Man that was both Upright and Noble) commanding them to Till the Land, and to pay their assigned Tribute to the King. He delivered the Prophet Jeremy also out of Prison, persuading him to repair with him to the King of Babylon; telling him, that he had received express commandment from the King, to furnish him with all things necessary for that Journey: but if he were not contented to repair to Babylon, he should de-

the King thereof. But the Prophet would not follow him, or sojourn in any other place, A desiring rather to live amidst the Ruins of his Country, and among the precious Reliques of his poor Nation.

When the General Nabuzaradan understood his Resolution, he gave charge to the Governor Godolias (whom he left in Judea) to have care of him, and to furnish him with all that which he wanted; and after he had gratified him with Presents, he departed. In mean while, Jeremy dwelt in the City of Masphath; he desired Nabuzaradan, that he would send him his Disciple Baruch (the Son of Neria, a Man of a Noble Family, and excellently learned in that Country Language.) Now when those, that during the Siege of Jerusalem, were retired out of the City, understood the Retreat of the Babylonians, they assembled together from all parts, and came to Masphath to Godolias, under the conduct of John the Son of Caveas, and Jezanias and Sareas, and others: And besides these, a certain Man called Ismael, of the Bloud Royal, a wicked and fraudulent Man, who during the Siege of the City, had retired himself to Barthal, King of the Ammonites, and had sojourn'd with him during all the Troubles. When they were come together, Godolias advis'd them to remain in that Country, without any fear of the Babylonians, promising that in manuring their Land, they should incur no Inconvenience: all which he confirm'd unto them by an Oath; adding further, That if any Disturbance were offered to any Man he would readily assist him. He gave each one this Advice likewise, To inhabit any City that they liked best; promising them to fend them thither, with such things as appertain'd to them, to build them Houses, and furnish their Habitations, promising that when time served, he would make Provision of Corn, Wine and Oil for their Maintenance during the Winter: and when he had thus advis'd them, he gave them leave to depart, and inhabit the Country. Now when the Rumor was spread amongst the People of Judea, that Godolias had thus courteously entertained those that were Fugitives; and how he had permitted them to Inhabit and Till the Country (provided that they paid their Tribute to the Babylonians) divers of them repaired to him, and inhabited the Country. And John and the other Governors being with him, and assured of his Clemency, began intirely to love him: Wherefore they told him, That Barthal King of the Ammonites, had sent Ismael to murder him by some Treachery, that by that means he might have the Dominion over the Israelites that remained, in that he was of the Bloud Royal; persuading him, that the only means to escape this Treason, was, to permit them to kill Ismael in secret: assuring him on the contrary, that they feared, that if Ismael should happen to kill him, their whole Nation that remained, was like to fall to utter Ruin. But Godolias replied, That it was not probable that Ismael, who had received nothing but Kindness from his hands, should make any attempt upon his Life; and that having never been guilty of any unworthy Action in the time of his Necessity, he should now make himself guilty of so great a Villany against his Benefactor, whom he ought, even with the hazard of his own Life, to secure from the Attempts of others: Yea, said he, although those things were true, which you inform me of, yet had I rather dye, than murder a Man that had committed his Life to my Trust. For which cause, John and the rest (seeing their Persuasions were in vain) departed from him. Some thirty days after, Ismael (accompanied with ten Men) came to Masphath to Godolias, who received them with Presents and magnificent Entertainment; so that to exprels to Ismael and his Companions, how heartily they were welcome, Godolias drunk to hard, that he was somewhat overcome with Wine. Now when Ismael perceived him over-loaden with Drink and Sleep, he stept unto him with his ten Associates, and cut both his throat, and theirs who kept him company at the Banquet; after which Murder, he iftied out by night, and slew all the Jews that were left in the City, and those Babylonian Soldiers also that were left in Garrison in that place. The next day there came four score Men of the Country to Godolias with Presents, being utterly ignorant of that which had happened: Ismael knowing them, called them unto him, as if he intended to bring them to Godolias; and as soon as they were entred, he locked the Court-Gates, and slew them, and afterwards cast their Bodies into a deep Ditch, to the intent they might not be discovered. Of this number there were some that escaped, who be sought him that they might not be put to Death, before they had delivered certain Moveables, Garments and Corn that they had hidden in the Field: which when Ismael understood, he spared them; but he kept them Prisoners that were in Masphath, with their Wives and Children, in the number of whom were the Daughters of Zedechias, whom Nabuzaradan had left with Godolias. This done, he retired back again to the King of the Ammonites. John, and the Governors of his Company, hearing what was done by Ismael in Masphath, and above all of the murder of Godolias, they were wonderfully irraged: So that each of them assembling his Forces, issued forth to pursue Ismael.

H Ismael, whom they overtook near unto a Fountain in Hebron. The Prisoners that were with Ismael, seeing John and his Confederates, took courage, supposing that it was some succors that came to help them, and forsook him that led them, and began to joy with John's followers: And thus fled Ismael with his eight Men; to the King of the Ammonites, John gathering together all those whom he had rescued from Ismael's hands, both Eunuchs: Women, and Children, retired into a certain place called Mendesa, where he sojourn'd all that day, resolving from thence to depart into Egypt, fearing lest the Babylonians should put him to death, if they should remain in Judea, for that they would be displaced with the death of Godolias, whom they had placed in the Government.

In this perplexity and distress, they addressed themselves to the Prophet Jeremy, beseeching him to enquire of God, and to certify them, what it beloveth them to do in this their doubtful Estate, binding themselves by an Oath, to do that which Jeremy should command them. Hereupon the Prophet promised that he would ask Counsel of God for them: And some ten days after God appeared unto him, and willed him to certify John, the Governors, and the rest of the People, that if they inhabited Judea, he would assist them, and take care of them, and secure them so, as the Babylonians (whom they feared) should do them no harm: But if they departed into Egypt, he would abandon them, and deliver them over to the like misery, as their brethren had endured in times past. Whilst the Prophet thus warned them from God, they would not believe him, in that he commanded them to remain in that place, but they imagined, that under a false pretext of Gods command, he had counselled them thereto, but that in effect, he spoke in favor of his Disciple Baruch, persuading them to stay there, to the end they might be consumed by the Babylonians: Contemning therefore the counsel which God gave them by the Prophet; both John and the rest of the multitude went into Egypt, and led with them both Baruch and Jeremy. Whither they were no sooner come, but God told the Prophet that the Babylonians should lead his Army into Egypt; for which cause he willed him to foretell the people, that Egypt should be destroyed, and that they should partly be slain in that place, and partly led captive to Babylon. Which came in like manner to pass: For in the fifth year after the destruction of Jerusalem (which was the three and twentieth year of the Reign of Nabuchodonosor) Nabuchodonosor in his own person led his Army into Calestria, and having conquered the fame, he made War upon the Ammonites and Moabites. And after he had brought these Nations under his obedience, he went and fought against the King of Egypt, and overcame him: And after he had slain their King that Governed at that time, and planted another in his place, he afterwards took the Jews that he found in that Country, and carried them prisoners into Babylon. By this means we have learned, that the estate of the Hebrews, hath been translated twice to the other side of Euphrates. For the people of the ten Tribes, during the Reign of Oseas, were carried away captive by Sulmanazar, King of the Assyrians, after he had taken Samarit; and the two Tribes by Nabuchodonosor, King of the Babylonians and Chaldees; upon the taking in of Jerusalem. True it is, that Sulmanazar, after he had displaced the Israelites, planted the Cuthians in their place, who before-time inhabited the innermost of the Countreys of Persia and Media, and were called Samaritans, according to the name of the place which they inhabited; but the Babylonians having led the Two Tribes prisoners, hath not planted any other people in their places.

For this cause, Judea, Jerusalem, and the Temple, remained desert for the space of seventy years: and all the time that passed between the Captivity of the Israelites, until the destruction of the two Tribes, was an hundred and thirty years, six months and ten days; but Nabuchodonosor chose the noblest young men among the Jews (and such as were allied to King Zedechias, and esteemed likewise for the good disposition, and fair proportion of their Bodies and Faces) and committed them to Masters to be instructed, commanding that every one of them should be gelded, according as they were accustomed to deal with young Children of other Nations, whom he subdued by force. He allowed them Victuals from his own Table, and they were taught and instructed in the Discipline of the Countrey, and in the Chaldee Tongue. These were very apt to learn Wisdom: And for that cause he commanded that they should be trained up in the exercise thereof. Of these were four of Zedechias kindred, fair in Body, and virtuous in their Nature, who were called Danias, Misael, and Azarias, whose names the Babylonians changed, and appointed that they should be called by other names: Danias being distinct and different from their own: Danias was called Belshazzar; Azarias was called Misael, Misael, and Azarias; Abednego. These did the King esteem very highly for their excellent nature, and for the great affection that they had to attain unto Learning and Wisdom; wherein they profited greatly, and were for that cause highly esteemed by him; and whereas Danias and his kinsman thought good to live austerely, and to abstain abstain from those Meats that came from the Kings Table, and in general from all things that had life, they went to Askenas's the Eunuch (who had the care and charge over them) beseeching him to convert those Meats to his own use, which were sent from the Kings Table, and allow them Herbs and Dares, and such things as had no life; because they intended to hold that course of life, and to forsake all others. Askenas told them, that he was ready to condescend unto their demands; but that he feared, lest being called for by the King, they should be found to be lean in Body, and discoloured in Face, (for without doubt, following that Diet, they must needs lose their Beauty and Complexion) which might bring him in damage of his Head. They perceiving that Askenas intended nought else but his security, persuaded him to allow them but ten days of approbation, under condition, that if by that regiment of Diet, their habitude of body should not be any ways altered, they might continue that course of life, which they had intended from that day forwards: But if they should be found lean and weak, and less proportionable than they that fed upon the Kings allowance, that then they should return to their accustomed Diet. Now it fell so out, that not only their Bodies were better in growth, but they seemed rather better fed, and of a taller stature than the rest: So that they that lived upon the Kings allowance, seem'd lean and ill-favour'd, whereas Daniel and his Companions made him, as if they had been nourished with Dainties, and brought up in abundance. From that time forward, Askenas took all that which was allowed the four young Men from the Kings Table, and kept it to himself, giving them instead thereof, the Diet that they chose and delighted in. They having their Spirits more pure and subtil to comprehend their Masters Instructions, and their Bodies more strong to endure labour (for their Spirits were not charged with diversity of Meats, nor their Bodies effeminated for the same cause) attained the more readily to all that Doctrine that was taught them by the Hebrews and Chaldees: Daniel especially having profited in Wisdom, studied the Interpretation of Dreams, and God appeared unto him. Two years after the Egyptian War, King Nabuchodonosor dreamed a wonderful dream, the explication whereof, God gave unto him in his sleep, but he forgot the same when he arose out of his Bed. And for that cause sent he for his Chaldees and Divines, telling them that he had dreamed a dream, but that he had forgot the same, commanding them to declare unto him what the dream was, and the signification thereof also. Whereunto they answered, that it was impossible for men to find out the secret thereof; notwithstanding they promised him, that if he would declare his Vision unto them, they would cause him to understand the signification thereof. Hereupon Nabuchodonosor threatened them with death, except they represented his dream unto him; and they protesting that they could not fulfil his request, he commanded them all to be slain. But Daniel hearing how the King had condemned all the Sages to death, and knowing that both he and his Companions were concerned in that danger; addressed himself to Ariochus, the Captain of the Kings Guard, requiring him to inform him, for what cause the King had adjudged the Chaldees and Sages to be put to death; and having told what had happened, as touching the dream, and how the King forgetting the same, had charged them to inform him therein; and how they had answered, that it was impossible for them to perform the same, and how thereby they had provoked the King to displeasure: He besought Ariochus to go unto the King, and to procure one nights reprieve on the behalf of the Egyptians and Chaldees, in that he hoped during that night to beseech God, and intreat from him both for the dream and the signification thereof. Hereupon Ariochus told the King what Daniel had requested, and he thereupon respited the execution of the Magicians for that night, until he might see what would become of Daniel's promise: Who retiring himself with his Companions into his chamber, besought God all the night long to manifest unto him the dream, and deliver the Magicians and Chaldees from the Kings wrath, with whom, both he and the rest of his Companions were like to dye, except he might know what the King had dreamt the night past; and what was the Interpretation thereof. Whereupon God (having compassion of the danger wherein they were, and taking pleasure in Daniel's Wisdom) signified unto him both the dream; and the signification thereof, to the intent the King might be resolved of the meaning thereof.

Daniel having received the truth from God, arose very joyfully, and certified his Brethren (who had already lost all hope of life, and thought on nothing but death) and gave them courage and hope. Having therefore rendered thanks unto God, for that he had had Compassion of their younger years, as soon as it was day, he went unto Ariochus, requesting him that he might be brought to the Kings presence, assuring him, that he would open unto him the dream which he had seen the night past. New when Daniel was brought unto the Kings presence, he besought him that he would excuse him to be

He, more wise than the other Chaldeans and Magicians, in that, whereas none of them could expound his Dream, he did attempt to express the same, for that came not to pass, by reason of his experience, or for that he was more industrious than they were; but (said he) God before Christ's birth had compassion on us that were in danger of death; and at such time as I requested him to grant me, and my Countrymen life, he hath certified me both of your Dream, and the signification thereof. I was not so much aggrieved, for that in our innocence we were adjudged to death by thee; as concerned for thy reputation and renown, which was hazarded by condemning so many, and so innocent, and just men to death: Whereas that which you have required of them, savoureth nothing of humane wit, but as the only work of God: Wherefore therefore thou thoughtst in thy self, who it was that should command the whole World after thy self, at such times as thou wert asleep, God intending to let thee know all those that should govern after thee, presented thee with this Dream. It seemed unto thee, that thou sawest a great Statue, whereof the Head was of Gold, the Shoulders and Arms of Silver, the Belly and Thighs of Brass, and the Legs and Feet of Iron. Thou beheldest after that, a great Stone, (that it was drawn from a Mountain) that fell upon the Statue, and beat down, and burst the same, and left no whole piece thereof; so that the Gold, Silver, Iron and Brass, were powdered as small as dust: Whereupon a violent wind seemed to blow, which by the fury and force thereof, was born away, and scattered into divers Countries: On the other side the Stone grew so mighty, that it seemed to fill the whole Earth. This was that Vision that appeared unto you, the signification whereof is expressed after this manner. The Head of Gold signifieth your self, (and those Kings of Babylon that have been before you.) The two Hands and Shoulders signify, that your Empire shall be restored by two Kings, the one part by the King of the East, clothed in Brass, whose force shall be abated by another power resembling that of Iron, and he shall have the power over the whole Earth, by reason of the nature of Iron, which is more strong than Gold, Silver, or Brass; he told the King also what the Stone signified. But for mine own part, I thought it not expedient to express in this place: Because the only design, and intent of my Writings, is to register such things as are past, and not such matters as are to come. But if any man be so curious as to enquire into these things; and to understand such matters as are hidden, let him read the Book of Daniel, which he shall find amidst the Sacred Scriptures. When King Nabuchodonosor had heard those things, and remembered himself of his Dream, he was astonished at Daniel's wisdom, and calling himself prostrate on the Earth, after the manner of those that adore God, he embraced Daniel, giving direction that Sacrifice should be offered unto him, as if he were God. Moreover, he called him by the name of God, and committed the administration of his whole Kingdom, to him and his Companions, who, by reason of the Conspiracies of their Malig-nours and detractors, happened to fall into most imminent and dreadful danger, upon the occasion that ensueth. The King built a Golden Image, sixty Cubits high, and six in bigness, and erected it in a great Plain near unto Babylon: And being ready to dedicate the same, he assembled all the Governours and Princes of his Countreys, commanding them first of all, that as soon as they should hear the Trumpet found, they should prostrate themselves on the Earth to adore the Statue; threatening that whosoever should do the contrary, he should be cast into a burning Furnace: Whereas therefore all of them adored the Statue upon the sound of the Trumpet; Daniel and his Companions utterly refused to perform that duty; alledging for their justification, that they would not transgress the Laws of their Country; For which cause, being apprehended, they were instantly cast into the Furnace of Fire, (and protected therein by Gods Providence) escaped death beyond all mens expectation. For the fire touched them not, neither could it burn, during their abode in the Furnace. For God defended their Bodies, that they could not be consumed by fire: Which miracle made them in great estimation with the King, for that he saw that they were virtuous, and beloved of God: And for that cause they were highly honoured by him. Not long after this the King saw another Vision in his sleep, which signified unto him, that being cast from his Empire, he should converse with Savage Beasts, and that having lived in that estate in the Desert, for the space of seven years, he should recover his Kingdom again. Having had this Dream, he assembled the Magicians once more, demanding their answer, and the signification thereof. But it was impossible for any one of them, either to find out, or declare the meaning of his Dream unto the King: Only Daniel discovered the same, and the effect was answerable to his prediction. For the King passed the fore-said time in the Desert, so that no man durst intermeddle with the affairs of Estate during seven years. But after he had called upon God, that he would please him to restore him to his Kingdom, he repossessed the same again. Let no man in this place accuse me for reporting these particularities, according into Media, and kept him near unto him, doing him much honour, for he was of the number of three Governours whom he constituted over three hundred and threescore Provinces; for so had Darius commanded it. Now Daniel being thus honoured and beloved by Darius, and trusted by him in all things, for that God was with him, was much hated;

as they usually are, who have the greatest interest in Princes favours. Whereas therefore they that were jealous of the good esteem which he had with Darius, sought occasion to calumniate and backbite him; he warily cut off all opportunity thereof, for he would neither be bribed with Silver, nor corrupted with Presents, supposing it to be an act of much dishonesty to receive gifts after a man had done any courtesies. He therefore gave his maligners no manner of ground to detract from his reputation. But they still persisted in their malice, and all other attempts failing, they thought upon one at last, by which they imagined they might destroy him; For they perceiving that Daniel did thrice every day make his Prayers unto God, they supposed they had found a just pretext to work his ruine. Whereupon they came unto Darius, certifying him, that the Princes and Governours had concluded together, to this effect: That for 30 days space, an intermission should be granted to the People; during which time, it was neither lawful for them to demand any thing neither of himself, or of any Man or God, whatsoever; and if any man should attempt any thing against this common decree, it was ordered, that he should be cast into the Lions Den. But the King not perceiving the drift of their malice, nor how they sought by this device to enrap Daniel, told them, that he liked of the decree, and promised to confirm the same, and made a publick Edict; wherein the Princes resolutions were ratified. Now whilst all men endeavoured through fear, carefully and diligently to oblige this Edict; Daniel set light thereby, and according to his accom-moded manner, standing in all mens sight, he worshipped his God, and prayed unto him, Whereupon the Princes (having got that occasion which they long expected) came readily unto the King, and accused Daniel, for that he only amongst the rest, had presumed to infringe their Decree: Urging moreover, that he did it not for his Religions sake, but in contempt of the Kings Edict. And because they feared, lest Darius, by reason of the great affection he bare unto Daniel, should be ready to pardon him (notwithstanding he had transgressed their Edict), they pressed him earnestly, to inflict the punishment which was threatened by the Law, and to cast him into the Lions Den, according to the form of the Edict. Darius hoping, that God would deliver Daniel, and that no harm should befall him by the jaws of wild Beasts, exhorted him patiently to endure that Trial. Now as soon as he was cast into the Den, the King Sealed up the Stone that closed the mouth thereof, and departed; spending all that night without repast or repose, so much was he concerned in Daniels behalf. And when the day was come, as soon as he arose, he came unto the Den, and finding the Seal unbroken, wherewith he had marked the Stone, he opened the same, and called unto Daniel with a loud voice, asking him if he were in safety? He hearing the King speak, answered, that he had received no hurt. Whereupon Darius commanded that they should draw him out of the Lions Den. His adversaries perceiving that Daniel had escaped without harm (because that God had taken care of him) were not that he should escape: And thereupon told the King, that the Lions did neither touch nor approach Daniel, because they had been fed and gorged before. For which cause the King displeased with their injurious malice, commanded a quantity of flesh to be cast unto the Lions; and when they were glotted, he commanded that Daniels enemies should be cast among them, to the intent he might know whether the Lions would touch them or no, when they were gorged. At which time Daniel saw very manifestly, that God had by his power protected Daniel from Death. For as soon as the Nobles were cast into the Den, the Lions spared not one of them, but tore them all in pieces, as if they had been hungry and without meat. I suppose that these Lions having been a little before glutted with meat, did not stay close men to satisfy their hunger, but rather judge that their crimes provoked the rage and fury of the Beasts: For when God pleaseth, he maketh even unreasonable creatures to execute his vengeance against wicked men. Daniels adversaries being thus destroyed, Darius gave notice hereof to all the Subjects of his Provinces, praising That God whom Daniel had adored; saying that he was the only true God, who had all power: He honoured Daniel likewise with especial regard, esteeming him amongst the chiefest of his Familiars. He therefore being thus renowned (because he was beloved by God) built in Babatane in the Countrey of the Medes, a magnificent Castle, and a marvellous Monument, that remaineth even unto this day, which seemeth to show that it look thereon, that it is but newly built, and made but that very day, which they behold the same, the Beauty thereof seemeth so lively and perfect, as that continuance of time doth in no sort deface it. For it hath with Buildings as with Men, they wax old, and are inflected by years, and lose their Beauty. At this day, all the Kings of Media, Persia,

of Persia and Parthia, are entombed in this Castle, and the charge thereof is committed to a Priest, who is a Jew: And this custom continueth even until this day. Neither is that to be buried in silence, which is worthy especial admiration in this man: For all felicity that could be expected by a famous Prophet, attended him; and during his whole life-time, he was both most highly honoured by Kings, and revered by the common sort: And after his death, his memory is immortal. For all the Books which he left in writing, are read against us even at this present; and we have been persuaded by the reading thereof, that Daniel had conference with God. For he hath not only Prophecied of things to come (as other Prophets have done) but also hath determined the time wherein those things should happen. And whereas other Prophets, were accustomed to foretell adversities, and for that occasion were disliked both by Princes and their People; Daniel foretold them always good successes, so that he hath drawn unto him the good will of all men, by reason of those pleasing Predictions that he pronounced; and by the issues thereof, he hath obtained a Testimony of Truth, and a reputation, to have had in time, a Spirit that was truly Divine, and hath left us certain Writings, by which he hath manifestly declared the immutability and exact certainty of his Prophecies.

It is said, that being at Susa, the Metropolitan City of Persia, at such time as he walked abroad, attended by his Familiars, that there happened an Earthquake, with a great noise: So that he was left alone, and all his Companions fled from him. And that thereupon, being fore troubled, he fell upon his Face, and both his Hands: At which time some one touched him, and commanded him to stand up, and to see that which should happen to his Country-Men after divers Ages. Being therefore raised upright, there was a great Ram shewed unto him, that had divers Horns, the last whereof was the greatest of all. Afterwards he looked towards the West, and perceived a Goat carried thow the Air, that butted at the Ram, and having encountered him twice, had beaten and trampled him under his Feet. Thirdly, he saw a Goat, in whose forehead there grew one great Horn only: Which being broken, four others brake out instead thereof, bending each of them towards the four Winds of the World. He hath Written also, that from them, there shall arise another little one also, which as God
I (who presented the Vision to him) told him being grown to perfection, should War against the whole Nation of the Jews, and take the City by force, and confound the Estate of the Temple, and hinder the Sacrifices, for one thousand two hundred ninety and six days.

Daniel writeth that he saw these things in the field of Susa, and hath declared that God himself told him what that Vision signified; which was, that the Ram signified the Kingdoms of the Persians, and the Medes: His Horns signified the Kings that were to Reign in those Kingdoms; and that the last Horn signified the last King, who should surpass all the rest in Riches and Glory. That the Goat signified that there should come a certain King among the Greeks, who should fight against several times with the Persian, and should overcome him in War; and afterwards possess the whole Government: And that by the great Horn that grew in the forehead of the Goat, the first King was represented; and how that after he was taken away, four others should spring out of it. And whereas every one of these turned themselves towards the four corners of the World, it was a sign, that after the death of the first, he should have four successors, that should part the Kingdom between them, who never should be his Allies or Children; yet such notwithstanding, as should command the World for many years: That from them, there should arise a certain King, that should oppose himself against the Hebrew Nation; and their Laws, and should overthrow their Policy, spoil their Temple, and be a let that for three years space, the Sacrifice should not be Solemnized. Now so hath it happened, N that our Nation hath been so handled under Antiochus the famous, as Daniel had foreseen, and hath written divers years before, all that which should happen.

At the same time Daniel wrote concerning the Empire of the Romans, how it should destroy our Nation: And hath left all these things in writing, according as God declared them unto him; so that they who read and consider those things that have happened, admire Daniel for the Honour God dignified him with, and find thereby, that the Epicurians are mistaken, who exclude all Divine Providence from intermeddling with the concerns of humane life, and affirm, that God Governeth not the affairs of the World; or that the World is Ruled by a Happy and Incorruptible Essence, which causeth all things to continue in their Being: But say, that the World is managed by itself, by casualty, without any Conductor, or such a one that hath care thereof. For if it were so, and that it were destitute of a Sovereign Governour (as we see Ships destitute of their Pilots to be drowned by the Winds; and Chariots that have no Drivers vers to conduct them to beat one against another) even so should it perish, and ruinate it self by such an irregular motion. By these things therefore that Daniel hath foretold, I judge, that they are far estranged from the Truth, that affirm, that God hath no care of humane affairs; for if we see that all things happen casual, then happen they not according to his Prophecy. But I have written hereof, according as I have found and read: And if any one will think otherwise, let him continue his opinion as long as he pleaseth.

to return into

THE first year of the Reign of Cyrus (which was the 70 after that our Nation was translated from Judea to Babylon) God had compassion on the Captivity and Calamity of his afflicted People: And accomplish'd that which he had foretold by the Prophet Jeremy, before the destruction of the City, viz. That after they had served Nabuchodonosor and his Posterity for 70 years, he would again restore them to their Native Country, where they should build a Temple and enjoy their former felicity.

For he awakened the Spirit of Cyrus, and put it into his heart to write Letters throughout all Asia, to this effect: Thus saith King Cyrus, since Almighty God had made me King of the whole World, I am persuaded that it is he whom the Jewish Nation do adore: For he hath declared my name by his Prophets, before I was born, and hath said, that I should build his Temple in Jerusalem, which is in the Country of Judea. Now Cyrus knew these things by reading of a Book of Prophecies, written by Esay, two hundred and ten years before his time. For (he saith) that God did secretly reveal these things unto him, speaking to this effect; I will that Cyrus, whom I have declared King over many Nations, shall send my people back into their Country of Judea, and shall build my Temple. These things did Esay foretell one hundred and forty years before the ruine of the Temple. Cyrus in reading these things (being ravished in admiration of the Majesty of God) was carried on with a great affection and zeal, to finish that which was written. He therefore called for all the Men of greatest account among the Jews that were in Babylon, and told them that he gave them Licence to return into their Country, and to repair the City of Jerusalem, and to rebuild the Temple of God; promising them that he himself would assist them. And to that effect he wrote unto his Governours, and Princes, of those Countries that confined upon Judea: Charging them to contribute both Gold and Silver towards the building of the Temple, and to furnish them with Cattel for the Sacrifices. After that Cyrus had certified the Israelites of this intent, the Princes of the two Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, with all the Levites and Priests, the Priests departed thence, and repaired to Jerusalem: Nevertheless, divers of the Jews remained in Babylon, because they were loth to abandon those Possessions they had gotten. Those unto whom Cyrus had directed his Letters, afforded them their Assistance, and furnished them with all things necessary to build the Temple, some of them with Gold, others with Silver; and the rest with a certain number of Oxen and Horses. Thus payed they their Vows unto God, and offered Sacrifices according to the ancient Custom, as if they had but now first begun to build the City; and this were the third time of practising those Ceremonies, which our Fathers had observed. Cyrus sent them back also those Vessels which were consecrated to God, (which King Nabuchodonosor had sent unto Babylon, after he had spoyled the Temple) and delivered them to Mithridates his Treasurer, commanding him to commit them to Abassar's hands, who should have the custody thereof, until the Temple were built; to the end, that at such time as it should be compleat, he might deliver them to the Priests and Princes of the People, to be restored again to the Service of the Temple. He sent Letters also to the Governours of Syria to this effect: Cyrus the King, to Sine and Sarabafne, health: I have permitted those Jews that inhabit my Country, to return into their native Country, and to re-edify their City, and erect the Temple of God in Jerusalem, in the same place where it stood before. I have also sent my Treasurer Mithridates, and Zerobabel, the Prince of the Jews, with express Charge and Authority, to lay the Foundation of the same, and to build it sixty Cubits in height, and as many in breadth, making three fises of heaven Stone, and another of such Timber as the Country affordeth; the Altar likewise, whereupon they may offer Sacrifice unto God: And my pleasure is, that the charge of all these things be defrayed out of my Coffers. I have also sent back those Vessels which Nabuchodonosor took out of the Temple, and have delivered them to the Treasurer Mithridates, and to Zerobabel the Prince of the Jews, to be conveyed to Jerusalem, and restored to the Temple of God; the number whereof I have here under subscribed: Fifty Lavers of Gold, and four hundred of Silver; fifty Pots of Gold, and four hundred of Silver; fifty Golden Sieves, and five hundred of Silver; thirty Ewers of Gold, and three hundred of Silver; thirty great Vials of Gold, and two thousand four hundred of Silver: and besides all these, one thousand other great Vessels. We grant also unto them the same Revenues which their Predecessors have enjoyed; and we do allow them 25000 Drachmes, for the purchasing of Cattel, Wine, and Oil; and we give them 2500 Measures of Wheat, to make fine Flour, which we appoint to be taken out of the Country of Samaria; and the Priests shall offer up the Sacrifices in Jerusalem, according to the Ordinance of Moses: and during their Sacrifice, they shall make Prayers unto God, for the Preservation of the King and his House, to the end, that the Empire of the Persians may be still Permanent. And my Will is, That they that disobey and oppose these Commands, shall be hanged on a Gibbet; and that their Goods shall be confiscate. These were the Contents of his Letters. Now the Number of those that returned from the Captivity into Jerusalem, was, Forty two thousand four hundred sixty two.

CHAP. II.

The Jews begin to build the Temple at Jerusalem; but after the Death of Cyrus, the Samaritans, and other Neighbouring Nations writ to King Cambyces, his Son, to cause him to put a stop to the Work.

WHilst according to the King's Order, the Jews laid the Foundation of the Temple, and were very busie about the building thereof, the Nations that bordered upon them, and especially the Chaldeans, (whom Salmanazar, King of Assyria, sent from Persia and Media, to inhabit in Samaria, at such time as he carried away the People of the ten Tribes;) incited the Princes and Governours, to hinder the Jews from repairing their City, and re-edifying the Temple. These Men, corrupted with Silver, fold their Negligence and Delay to the Chaldeans, which they used in those Buildings: For Cyrus intending his other Wars, was ignorant hereof, and having conducted his Army against the Massages, he ended his days in that Expedition. When as therefore Cambyces his Son, had obtain'd the Kingdom, they of Syria and Phoenicia, the Ammonites, Moabites, and Samaritans, wrote their Letters to Cambyces in these terms: O King, thy servants, Rathymus the Chancellor, Semelus the Scribe, and those Men that are Counsellors in Syria and Phoenicia, have thought themselves oblig'd to advertise thee, That those Jews that were led captive into Babylon, are returned back into this Country, and are about building their City which was destroyed, by reason of their Rebellion; and that they do repair the Walls of the same, and re-edify their Temple likewise. Know therefore, That if these things be permitted to be finished, that they will no more endure to be thy Subjects and Tribes.

Tributaries, but will oppose themselves against their Kings, holding it more fit to command, A than to obey. We have therefore thought good, before the Work be too far advanced, to give your Majesty notice, that you may search the Records of your Forefathers, wherein you shall always find, that the Jews have been Rebels, and Enemies to their Kings, and that the City hath been for this cause laid desolate unto this present. We have thought good to signify thus much to your Majesty, which perhaps is unknown unto you, because, that if this City be once more re-inhabited, and inclosed with a Wall, they will thereby obstruct your Passage into Cælo-rydia and Phœnicia.

Cambyfes forbiddeth the Jews to proceed in Rebuilding the Temple.

V. 17, ad 22. Cambyfes's Answer, wherein he inhibiteth the Jews from Building the City or Temple.

Hædi & Rufinus, cap. 9. Darius the Son of Hystaspes made Emperor of the Persians. Ezra 5. v. 5. ad hæm.

When Cambyfes had read this Letter, (being by nature, wicked and malicious) he grew jealous and displeased at the Contents thereof, and wrote back again after this manner: The King Cambyfes to Rathymus the Chancellor, and to Belsen and Semelius, Scribes, and to all his other Counsellors and Inhabitants of Samaria and Phœnicia, Health: Having read your Letters, I have commanded the Records of mine Ancestors to be examined; and I find that the City of Jerusalem hath been always an Enemy to their Kings, and that the Inhabitants thereof always raised Sedition and Wars: I have likewise found, that their Kings have been Mighty, and that they have exacted from Syria and Phœnicia continual Tributes. For this cause I have ordained, That the Jews shall not be permitted to Rebuild their City, for fear, lest the Boldness of that People being thereby encouraged, they should, according to their former Custom, practise a new Rebellion. After the receipt of these Letters, Rathymus, and the Scribe Semelius, and those of their Faction, took Horse, and rode speedily to Jerusalem, leading with them a great number of People, and prohibiting the Jews from the Building their City or Temple. Thus was this Work interrupted, until the second Year of the Reign of Darius King of Persia, for the space of nine Years: For Cambyfes reigned six Years, during which time he subdued Egypt, and upon his return from thence, he dyed in Damascus. And after the Death of Cambyfes, the Magi that held the Empire of the Persians, for the space of one Year, being taken away, D the Chief of the seven Principal Families of Persia, made Darius (the Son of Hystaspes) King.

C H A P. IV.

Darius gives leave to Zerobabel, a Prince of the Jews, to Rebuild the Temple; a great number return to Jerusalem under his Conduct, and apply themselves to the Work. The Samaritans and others write to Darius to forbid them; but he acts contrary to their Desires.

Darius voweth to send the sacred Vessels to Jerusalem. Zerobabel.

Darius propounds three Questions to three of his Guards.

Darius, during the time that he lived a private Life, made a Vow unto God, That if he obtained the Kingdom, he would send back unto the Temple of Jerusalem, all those Vessels which were as yet remaining in Babylon. It fell out that about the same time that he was made King, Zerobabel, who was appointed Governor over the captive Jews, came unto him from Jerusalem: And being the King's ancient Friend; he, with two others, had three of the Principal Offices of the King's House conferred upon them, and were placed the nearest about his Person. The first Year of the Reign of Darius, he entertained all his Courtiers with great Pomp and Magnificence, both those of his Household, and those also that were his Governours and Princes of Media and Persia, and the Commanders in India, confining upon Ethiopia, with all the Chieftains of his Army, in one hundred twenty and seven Provinces. Now after they had feasted, and were full of Wine, they departed each of them unto their Lodgings, to be- take themselves to rest: but King Darius being laid in his Bed, reposed very little all the night long, but passed the time without sleep: Whereupon, seeing he could not compose himself to rest, he began to discourse with these three great Officers, promising unto him that should most truly and aptly answer those Questions that he should demand, to grant him License, by way of Reward, to wear a Purple Garment, and to drink in a Golden Cup, to lie on a Golden Bed, and to ride in a Chariot, whose Horses should be harnessed with Gold, and to wear the Tiara or Linnen Wreath, and a Golden Chain about his Neck, and fit in the next Place to the King; and should likewise be called his Kinsman, in regard of his Widow. After he had made these large Promises, he demanded of the first, Whether Wine were the strongest? Of the second, Whether

Whether the King were stronger? of the third, Whether Women, or Truth were the strongest of the three? As soon as he had deliver'd them these questions to deliberate upon, he laid him down to rest. Upon the morrow he sent for the Princes, Chieftains, and Governours of Persia and Media, and afterwards sitting aloft in that Throne from whence he was accustomed to determine controversies between the Subjects, he commanded those three young men, in the presence of that Princely Assembly, publicly to resolve those questions which he had propounded.

Whereupon the first of them began after this manner to express the force of Wine: Noble Princes, when I consider the force of Wine, I find nothing that can surpass it: For Wine disturberth the judgment, and maketh the Princes understanding like to that of a Child, who hath need of one that should always direct him: It giveth the Slave that freedom in Discourse, which his thralldom had deprived him of: It equalleth the poor man to the rich: It changeth and transformeth the Soul, assuageth the miserable mans Grief, and maketh the Prisoners forget their bonds, and think themselves very rich; so that they think not on mean things, but talk of Triumphs, and such things as appertain unto the most wealthy: It causeth them to lose all apprehension both of Princes and Kings, and taketh from them the remembrance of their Friends and Familiars: It armeth them against their greatest Friends, and maketh them suppose their nearest Relations to be Strangers: And when the Wine, concolled by night and sleep, hath forsaken them, they rise, and know not what they have committed in their drunkenness.

When the first of them had spoken thus in favor of Wine, he that had undertaken to shew, that nothing was equal to the power of Kings, began after this manner: Kings (saith he) have Dominion over men, who govern the Earth, and at their pleasure can command the Sea to serve them: Kings have Power and Dominion over those men who master and command the most untamed and mightiest Creatures; it therefore appeareth that their Force and Puissance exceedeth that of all these. If they command their Subjects to wage War, and to expose themselves to danger, they are obedient; and if they send them out against their Enemies, they willingly obey them, by reason of their Force: By their command they level Mountains, beat down Walls, and raze Towers. And if they command their Subjects to kill or be killed, they resist not, for fear lest they should seem to transgress the Kings commandment. When they have obtained the victory, all the Glory and Profit of the War redoundeth unto the King. They likewise that bear no Arms, but intend the Tillage of the Earth, after they have born all the toil, they reap and gather the fruits, to the end they may pay the King his Tribute: And if he will or command anything, it must be performed without any delay. Furthermore, when the King is addicted to any pleasures, or intendeth to enjoy his rest, during the time that he sleepeth, he is guarded by those that watch, who are, as it were, tyed unto him, through the fear and awe they have of him: For not one of them dare forsake him when he sleepeth, nor depart from him, to follow their own affairs, but intend these services only which he thinketh necessary, which is the guard of his Person. Who therefore will not esteem the Kings Force to be greater than any others, since so many people obey him in whatsoever he commandeth.

After he had spoken to this effect, Zerobabel, who was the third, began to speak of the Mpower of Women and Truth, after this manner: True it is, that Wine hath much force, and no less true, that all men obey the King; yet far more mighty is the power of a Woman. For by a Woman the King was bred, and brought into this World; and those men that plant the Vineyards where Wines do grow, are born and nourished by Women; and generally there is not any thing which we enjoy not by their means. For they weave us Garments; they have the care and custody of our houses; neither is it possible for us to be favored from Women. Tea, they that possess much Gold, and abundance of Silver, and other things of great and inestimable Price, only upon the sight of a fair Woman, forsake all these things, and will follow after the beauty which they behold, and for the possession thereof, content themselves to lose all things. We forsake likewise our Father and Mother, and the Country that hath bred us, and forget our Friends N for our Wives sake; yea, we will willingly content our selves to dye with them. Tet is there a greater and further Demonstration of the most mighty power of a Woman: For whatsoever we Travel for, all the Pains that we endure both by Land and Sea, to the intent we may reap some Fruits of our Labours, do we not carry all this to give unto our Wives, as unto those who were our Mistresses? I have seen the King likewise, who is so great a Lord, endure a Stroke on the Ear, by Apame the Daughter of Rhapaces his Concubine, and patiently suffer her to take the Diadem from his head, and set it on her own, when she laughed, he laughed; and when she was displeased, he was displeased: And according as her passion changed, so he complied, and humbly submitted his affection to her pleasures, according as he saw her passionate or pleased.

But whilst the Princes, in way of admiration, beheld one another, he began to discourse of Truth, saying: I have already declared what the force of Women is; yet notwithstanding both the King and they are more feeble than Truth. For whereas the Earth is huge and vast, the heavens likewise of an immeasurable height, and the Sun of unspeakable Celerity; and whereas whereas the Will of God both Governeth and Moveth these things (because God is just and true) A it therefore followeth, that Truth is the most mighty of all things; against which, injustice may be no ways prevail. Furthermore, all other things, notwithstanding they seem to be of value, yet are they mortal, and of little continuance: But Truth is immortal, and everlasting. Moreover, of all those things which we receive thereby, are neither mortal, nor subject to the injuries of time, fortune, or alteration, but continue equal, and separated from all stain of injustice. When Zorobabel had spoken after this manner, he made an end of his Discourse: Whereupon, all the Verity had an immutable force, and an undeterminable continuance. Whereupon the King commanded him to ask what he would, as touching that which he had promised to give, because he intended to grant it him, as to the wisest, and best learned amongst the rest. V. 22. Glad tidings brought to the Jews.

The Jews depart from Babylon to Jerusalem.

Ezra 3. 4. The Jews that went out of Babylon.

When the King had spoken thus, Zorobabel called to remembrance the vow that the King had made, if so be at any time he obtain'd the Kingdom: Namely, That he would build Jerusalem, and the Temple of God, and restore those Vessels likewise, which were taken away by Nabuchodonosor, and carried into Babylon. For this (said he) O King, is my request, which you permitted me to ask; and you promised me to grant, at that time when I was judged Wife and well Learned by you. The King was well-pleased at his words, and rising from his Throne, he kissed him. He wrote also to his Governors and Princes, that they should send away Zorobabel, and those of his Company, to build the Temple. Moreover he sent Letters to them of Syria and Phœnicia, commanding them to cut down the Cedars of Libanus, and to send them to Jerusalem, towards the building of the City; publishing a Law, that all Jews should be made free, if they would resort unto Judea; fulfilling a Law, that all Jews should be made free, if they would resort unto Judea; for the necessitating all Commissaries and Princes, to impose any charge upon the Jews, for the necessities of the Kingdom; and commanding that all the Country which they should inhabit, should be exempt from Tribute: Appointing the Idumeans, Samaritans, and Calasbitians, to restore those lands unto the Jews which they unlawfully withheld, which their Ancestors had heretofore possessed. And besides that; to deliver them by way of contribution Fifty Talents of Silver towards the building of the Temple, permitting them to offer their ordinary Sacrifices. He likewise commanded, that all the Necessaries and Vestments which either the High-Priest, or the other Priests used in the service of God, should be furnished at his charge. He appointed also that the Levites should have Instruments of Musick deliver'd unto them, to praise God withal; and that certain portions of Land should be allotted for them that had the Guard of the City, and the Temple. Moreover, he allow'd them a certain Sum of Money every year for their ordinary maintenance. After this, he sent back all those Vessels which Cyrus heretofore had resolv'd to restore unto Jerusalem.

When Zorobabel had obtained these things above-named at the Kings hands, he went out of the Palace, and lifting up his eyes unto Heaven, he began to give God thanks, That he had enabled him to appear more discreet than others before the King, and for the good success which he had given him in Darius's presence. For (said he) O Lord, if thou hadst not been favourable unto me, I had not obtained it. After he had in this manner given thanks to the present, and prayed God to shew himself always favourable hereafter; he repaired to Babylon, and told his Countrymen what encouragement he had receiv'd from the King; who hearing thereof, gave God thanks also, who had restor'd them once more to the Possession of their native Country: And they fell to feasting and banqueting for the seven days space, for the restoring unto their Country, as if they had Solemniz'd the feasts of their Birth-days. Hereupon the Heads of the several Families made choice of those, that (with their Wives and Children) should return unto Jerusalem, who, by the assistance of Darius's Convoy, perform'd that journey with great joy, playing on their Plateries, Flutes and Cymbals, and were after this manner conducted on their way, by those Jews that remained in Babylon. Thus went they forward, being a certain and determinate number of every Family. I have not thought it necessary to repeat these Families by name, lest I should perplex the Relation, and the Readers should be interrupted thereby. Notwithstanding, the whole number of those that went, and were about 12 years old of the Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, were four Millions, Six Hundred and Eight Thousand. There were likewise Four Thousand and Seventy Levites: And of their Wives and Children together, Forty Thousand, Seven Hundred, Forty and Two. Besides these, there were of Singers of the Tribe of Levi, one Hundred, Twenty and Eight; of Porters, One Hundred and Ten; and of those that attended on the Sanctuary, Three Hundred Twenty and Two. There were certain others likewise, that pretended that they were of the Race of the Israelites, but could give no Testimony of their descent, the number of whom was Six Hundred Fifty and Two. Of the number of the Priests, they that had expouled

Expouled wives; (whose genealogy could not be derived, and who were not found also in the genealogies of the Priests and Levites) they were about five hundred, twenty and five. The multitude of servants that followed or attended on them, were seven thousand, three hundred thirty and seven. There were also two hundred, forty and five Singers of men and women; four hundred, thirty and five Camels; and five hundred, twenty and five other beasts for their carriage. The conductor of this above-named multitude, was Zorobabel, the Son of Salathiel, descended of Davids Line, and of the Tribe of Juda; and Jeshu the son of Josedech the High-Priest; besides which, were Mordochai and Serabhai; who were chosen by the people to be their Governors, who contributed 100 pounds of gold; and five hundred of silver. Thus the Priests and Levites, and part of all the people of the Jews, which were then in Babylon, were conducted to dwell in Jerusalem: the other part of them following a little after, returned every one into his own Country.

The seventh month after their departure out of Babylon, the High-Priest Jeshu, and the Governor Zorobabel, sent Messengers thorow all the Country, and assembled the people from all quarters of the Region, who, with all alacrity and expedition, repair'd to Jerusalem. There erected they an Altar in the same place, where heretofore it was built, to the end they might offer Sacrifice thereon, according to Moses Law; but hereby they gave offence to their neighbouring Nations, who, in general, were incensed against them. They celebrated also at that time the Feast of Tabernacles, according as the Law-maker had ordain'd: Afterwards they offered Oblations, and continual Sacrifices, observing their Sabbaths, and all Holy Solemnities, and they that had made any vows, perform'd them, and sacrificed from the New Moon until the seventh month. After this, they began to build the Temple, and deliver'd great sums of money to the hewers of stone, and Malors, and gave Strangers their ordinary Diet, who brought them Stone and Timber. For it was an easie matter for the Sidonians, to bring Wood and Timber from Libanus, and binding it up, and gathering it together in Rafter, to ship it, and land it at the Port of Joppa. For Cyrus had heretofore given them that commandment, and now the second time they were enjoyed thereunto by Darius.

The Second Year after their arrival in Jerusalem, the Jews assembled together in the second month; and began to build the Temple, having laid the Foundation thereof on the first day of December. Over this Work, those Levites that were above 20 Years of Age, were Overseers: With them also was Jeshu, and his Sons and Brothers joined, and Azmiel Brother of Juda the Son of Aminadab, and his Sons. And through the diligence that these Overseers of the Temple used, it was sooner finish'd, than it was expected. As soon as the Sanctuary was built, the Priests, Apparell in their accustomed habits; and the Levites, and the Sons of Asaph arose, and with Trumpets praised God, and sung several Hymns and Psalms compos'd by King David. The Priests and Levites, with the Elders of the Tribes, calling to mind how great and magnificent the first Temple was, and beholding that which was built at present, far inferior to the former, and perceiving how much the ancient wealth and dignity of the Temple was abated; they were to sensibly touched with the consideration thereof, that they could not but burst forth into lamentations and tears. But the People were contented with that which they beheld, and without any mention of the former Temple, they troubled not themselves in comparing the one with the other; neither thought they upon the difference betwixt the present, and that which stood in times past: But the Elders Lamented, and the Priests complain'd; that the new erected Temple was far less than the former; yet the noise of the Trumpets drowned their Lamentations, and the joyful Applauses of the People their Mourning.

The Samaritans hearing the noise of the Trumpets, ran out to know the cause thereof, because they were ill-affected toward the Tribe of Juda and Benjamin; and understanding that the Jews which were return'd from Babylon, had re-edified the Temple, they addressed themselves to Zorobabel and Jeshu, and to the chief Governors of the Families requiring them that it might be lawful for them to repair the Temple with them, and to have part in the building thereof. For (said they) we honour God no less than you, we pray unto him, and adore him; we conform our selves to your customs, ever since the time that Salmanazar King of Assyria removed us out of Chuthca and Media thither. To these demands of theirs Zorobabel and Jeshu the High-Priest, and the Governors of the Tribes, answer'd, That it was impossible for them to admit of their assistance in the building of the Temple, because they had received their first commandment from Cyrus to perform it, and afterwards from Darius: Notwithstanding they gave them licence to worship therein, offering them that the Temple should be common to both, if they pleased: Tea, and accessible to all other Nations that would repair thither to adore God. The Chuthceans (for so were the Samaritans call'd) hearing this, were much offended; and persuaded the other Nations of Syria, to require the Princes (who continued their authority since the time of Cyrus, and afterwards ruled in Cambyles time) to hinder the building of the Temple; and to delay the Jews, who were so intent and busy in their work. Whereupon Sisin Governor in Syria and Phœnicia, and Sarabazan, accompanied with others, came unto Jerusalem, and demanded the Chieftains of the Jews, By whose permission they built the temple, and rather seemed to be a Fort than a Temple? and for what cause they fortified their City with gates, and so strong walls? Zorobabel and Jesus the High Priest answer'd, That they were the servants of the living God, and that their Temple had been built by one of their Kings, who was rich, and surpassed all other in virtue, that afterward it had continued long time in venerable estimation; but by reason their fathers had been guilty of impiety against God, Nabuchodonosor, King of Babylon and Chaldaea, having taken the City by force, destroyed the same, and after he had spoiled the City, he burned it, and transported the people captive into Babylon. But after that Cyrus King of Persia had obtained the Kingdom of Babylon, he commanded by his express Letters sealed with his Royal Seal, that they should re-edify the Temple, and ordained that all those Treasures which Nabuchodonosor carried from thence, and of the consecrated vessels, should be deliver'd to Zorobabel and the Treasurer Mithridates, to be convey'd to Jerusalem, and placed again in the Temple, as soon as it should be built. And he commanded also, that it should be presently re-edified, appointing Abassar to repair to Jerusalem, and give order for all that which was requisite; who hastening thither as soon as he had received Cyrus's Letters, did speedily lay the foundations anew. From that time forward, until this present, it hath been hindered by the subtilty and malice of the neighbouring Nations, who have always been our Enemies, so that as yet it remaineth imperfect. If therefore it please you, and you think good, signify what you bear by your letters to Darius, to the end, that examining the Registers of the Kings, he may find that all things have proceeded after the manner which we have related.

When Zorobabel and Jesus had answer'd to this effect, Sisin, and they that accompanied him, thought not good to hinder the building, until such times as they had certified Darius hereof, for which cause they wrote unto him presently. Hereupon the Jews were much discomforted and troubled, fearing lest the King should change his mind, and put a stop to the building of Jerusalem and the Temple. But two Prophets, Aggeus and Zachary, (who were amongst them) began to persuade them, willing them to fear no ill from the Persians, because God had assur'd them, that they should receive no harm; whereupon the people gave credit to the Prophets, and diligently intended their building, without intermission.

When the Samaritans had after this manner written to Darius, and accused the Jews unto him for fortifying their City, and re-edifying their Temple, and inform'd him how it seem'd rather to be a Fort, than some sacred place; and had further alleg'd, that it would be no profit unto him: and moreover, had produced Cambyles letters, by which they were forbidden to build the Temple, he understood that the re-establishment of Jerusalem stood not with the security of his state. But when he had read Sisin's letters, and his associates, he commanded that the Chronicles of the Kings should be search'd, and there was found in Ecbatane, a City of the Medes, in a Tower, a certain Book, in which these things were written.

The first year of the Reign of Cyrus, commandment was given to build the Temple of Jerusalem, and the Altar therein. It was likewise decreed, that the height of the Temple should be sixty cubits, and the breadth as many; three stories of hewed stone, and one story of the wood of that Country: and it was ordained, that the expence of that building should be deducted out of the Kings Revenues. Moreover, he commanded that restitution should be made unto the Inhabitants of Jerusalem, of those vessels that were taken away by Nabuchodonosor, and carried away to Babylon: And the commission to effect all these things, was given to Abassar Governor of Syria and Phœnicia, and his companions, to the end that they might depart from these places, and the Jews might be permitted to build therein. Furthermore, he ordained that the charge of this building should be gathered out of the Tributes of his Countries; and that they should furnish the Jews with Bulls, Weathers, Lambs, Goats, Flower, Oyl, and Wine, and all other things which the Priests should think meet to offer sacrifice, to the intent that they might pray for the preservation of the King of Persia: commanding that they that should transgress or oppose this commandment, should be laid hold on, and hanged on a Gibbet, and that their goods should be confiscate to the Kings use. Moreover, he besought God, that if any man went about to hinder the building of the Temple, that he would execute his vengeance upon that person, and punish him for his wickedness. When Darius had found these things written in his Registries, he wrote back to Sisin and his companions in this form:

King

H King Darius to Sisin and Sarabazan, with their Associates, Health.

Having found amongst the Memorials of Cyrus, the Copy of his Instructions for the building of the Temple, I have sent it you, and my pleasure is, that the contents thereof be executed. Farewell.

Sisin and his Associates being certified of the Kings pleasure, resolved to conform themselves unto it: and taking the care of the sacred building upon them, they assisted the Princes and Magistrates of the Jews, in such sort as the building of the Temple was finished with great diligence, by the instigation of the Prophets Aggeus and Zachary, according to Gods commandment, and by the directions of the Kings Cyrus and Darius; so that it was finish'd within seven years. In the ninth year of the Reign of Darius, and the three and twentieth of the eleventh month, called by us Adar, and by the Macedonians Disfre; the Priests and Levites, and all the rest of the People offer'd sacrifices, and gave thanks for the renovation of their former felicity, after their captivity, and for their new Temple also: sacrificing 100 Bulls, 200 Sheep, 400 Lambs, 12 Goats, according to the Number of the 12 Tribes of Israel, and for the fins of each of them. The Priests and Levites also (according to the Laws of Moses) appointed Porters to every gate. For the Jews had built Galleries round about, and within the Temple.

K Now when the Feast of the unleavened bread (which is the Feast of Easter) drew near, in the first Month called Xanthicus by the Macedonians, and Nisan by the Hebrews, all the People of the Towns round about Jerusalem resorted thither, and celebrated the Feast, purifying themselves, their wives and children, according to the ordinance of their Fore-fathers: And after they had solemniz'd the Feast called Easter, or the Pasover, in the 14th. Moon, they rejoiced for seven days space; sparing no Cost how great soever. They offered burnt-offerings also, and sacrifices of Thanksgiving, acknowledging Gods goodness that had brought them home into their native Country, to live according to the Laws of their Fore-fathers, and had caused them to find favour in the eyes of the King of Persia. Thus dwell they in Jerusalem, sacrificing unto, and serving God, and living under the government of their Nobility. For they set up a kind of Aristocratical Government, and the chief authority remain'd in the High-priests, until the Assmonæans obtained the Kingdom: for before the captivity of Babylon, they were under the Government of Kings, who began from Saul and David's times, about some 532 years, six months, and ten days; and before their Kings, certain Governors, called Judges, reigned: and under this sort of Polity lived they more than 500 years, from the death of Moses and Jehoshua. And this was the state of the Jews after their captivity, during the days of Cyrus and Darius. True it is, that the Samaritans were their mighty and malicious Adversaries, and did them many mischiefs, trusting in their riches, and pretending to be the Persians Kinsmen, because their original proceeded from thence. For they refused to pay that Tribute which the King had commanded them to disburse unto the Jews to make their sacrifices, and the Governors of Syria and Phœnicia lost no opportunity which might promote their design. For which cause, the Jews determined to send Ambassadors unto King Darius, to accuse the Samaritans; and to that intent, Zorobabel, and four others were sent. As soon therefore as the King understood by these Ambassadors, what crimes and accusations they had brought against the Samaritans, he dispatched his Letters, and addressed them to the Governors and Council of Samaria, the tenour of which Letters was to this effect:

N King Darius to Tangara and Sambaba Governors of Samaria, to Sadrach and Babelon, and to their Companions our Servants being in Samaria, Health.

Zorobabel, Ananias, and Mardocheus: Ambassadors in his behalf of the Jews, accuse you C. 7. v. 11, 12. to be disturbers of the building of their Temple; alledging, that you refuse to discharge that which by my decree you ought to furnish them with, for the charge of the Sacrifices. My will is therefore, that upon the receipt of these Letters, you deliver out of the Royal Treasury in Samaria, appointed for the Tributes, all that which shall be necessary for them to perform their sacrifices, upon the requests of the Priests: to the intent they do not any day without sacrifice and prayer unto God for me, and for the Persians. This was the Contents of his Letters.

CHAP. V.

Xerxes succeeds his Father Darius in the Kingdom; he permitteth Eſdras to return with a great number of Jews to Jeruſalem. Eſdras obligeth thoſe that had taken ſtrangers to wife, to ſend them back. His Praise, and his Death. Nehemiah obtains leave to build the Walls of Jeruſalem, and finiſheth that great work.

AFTER Darius death, his Son Xerxes ſucceeded him, not only as Heir in the Government of his Kingdom, but alſo as Succellor unto his Piety and Devotion towards God: for he changed not thoſe inſtitutions of his Father, that concern'd Religious Service, but B with great benevolence favoured all the Jews. During his Reign, Joſaim the Son of Jeſus was High-Prieſt; amongſt them alſo that remained in Babylon, there lived a Prieſt with the Jews in that place called Eſdras, a juſt man, and one of great reputation amongſt the People: and whereas he was very ſkilful in the Laws of Moſes, he was much eſteemed by the King. This man intending (with certain other Jews of Babylon) to return to Jeruſalem, beſought the King that he would vouchſafe to beſtow his Letters of commendations to the Governors of Syria in his behalf. Whereupon the King gave him Letters of Recommendation to the Governors, certifying them of his favour towards Eſdras, and to the Princes in thoſe parts, to this effect:

Xerxes King of Kings, to Eſdras the Prieſt, and Reader of the Divine Law, Health.

It is decreed by me, and ſeven other of my Council, that whoſoever in my Kingdom of the Iſraelites, their Prieſts or Levites, will repair with thee unto Jeruſalem, may freely do it with my Licence, and may ſettle themſelves in Judea, there to ſerve the God of their Fathers; bearing with them thoſe Preſents unto the God of Iſrael, which I and my Friends have vowed to offer unto him. I likewiſe give thee Licence to take with thee all the gold and ſilver which any of thy Nation living here in Babylon will offer up unto God, to buy offerings to be ſacrificed upon the Altar of thy God: and to make whatſoever veſſels of gold or ſilver, which either thou or thy Brethren ſhalt think meet. Thoſe ſacred veſſels alſo which are given thee, thou ſhalt dedicate unto thy God; and if there be ought elſe requiſite in this behalf, that thou ſhalt think fit to provide, the charges ſhalt thou receive out of my Treafury. I have alſo commended thee to the Treafurers of Syria and Phœnicia, and have written to them, that whatſoever Eſdras the Prieſt, and Reader of the Law of God ſhall require, they ſhall preſently deliver it to him. And to the end that God may be favourable to me and my Poſterity, my will is, that an hundred meaſures of wheat be offer'd unto God, according to the Law. I command you alſo that are Magiſtrates, that you exact nothing, neither impoſe any taxations on the Prieſts, Levites, Singing-men, Porters, or Holy Officers. But thou Eſdras (according to the wiſdom given thee from above) ſhalt appoint Judges, who ſhall in Syria and Phœnicia execute juſtice unto the People, according to your Law. Teach thou likewiſe freely all ſuch as are ignorant, ſo that whoſoever violateth either Gods or the Kings Law, he may be fined, or elſe condemned to death, as not ſinning through ignorance, but of conſumacy. Farewell.

When Eſdras had received this Letter, he was well-pleaſed, and gave Thanks unto God, confeſſing that it was he, who was the Author of that favour he had received at the Kings hand: and after he had read this Letter unto the Jews that were at that time reſident in Babylon, he kept the original, but ſent a Copy to all thoſe of his Nation, being in the Country of the Medes: who being inform'd of the Kings zeal to the ſervice of God, and his favour towards Eſdras, were very joyful; and divers amongſt them took their goods, and came unto Babylon, deſiring to return to Jeruſalem: but the reſt of the Iſraelites would not abandon or leave their dwelling. Whereupon it came to paſs, that two Tribes were under the Obedience of the Romans in Aſia and Europe: but the ten Tribes were on the other ſide of Euphrates, even until this day; and it is incredible, how exceedingly they are there multiplied. With Eſdras there departed a great number of Prieſts, Levites, Porters, Singing-men, and ſervants of the Temple. Now after he had aſſembled thoſe of the Captivity, that inhabited on this ſide Euphrates, and ſojourn'd there three days, he commanded them to ſolemnize a Faſt, and to pray unto God for his preſervation, that no evil might happen unto him; and that neither their Enemies, nor any other might do them any violence: For Eſdras had foretold the King, that God would be their Protector, and that therefore he required no Convoy of Horſe-men at G his hand for his ſecurity. After that they had recommended themſelves unto God, they ſet forward on their way, the twelfth day of the firſt Month of the ſeventh year of the Reign

11 Reign of Xerxes, and arrived in Jeruſalem in the fifth month of the ſame year. Whereupon he incontinently preſented unto the Treafurers (who were of the Race of the Prieſts) the ſacred depoſitum wherewith he was intruſted, which conſiſted of 650 Talents of ſilver, and of ſilver veſſels an 100 Talents, of veſſels of gold to the value of 25 Talents, of brazen veſſels (more precious than gold) the weight of 12 Talents. Theſe were the Preſents of the King and his Friends, and of the Iſraelites that dwelt in Babylon.

When Eſdras had deliver'd theſe Preſents into the hands of the Prieſts, he offer'd burnt-offerings unto God, according to the Law, namely, 12 Bulls for the publick conſervation of the People, 72 Rams and Lambs, and 12 Goats for a ſin-offering. And afterward he deliver'd the Kings Letters to his Princes and Governors in Calolyria and Phœnicia: who being conſtrain'd to execute that which was enjoya'd them by the King, honoured the Nation of the Jews, and ſupplied them every way in their neceſſities. We owe unto Eſdras the honour of this Tranſmigration, for he not only layd the deſign of it, but his virtue and piety were undoubtably the cauſe that God gave him ſo good ſucces in the undertaking.

Not long after, there came certain men unto him, complaining that ſome of the People, Prieſts and Levites, had tranſgreſſed againſt their Ordinances, and broken the Laws of the Country, in that they had eſpouſed certain ſtrange Women, and corrupted the purity of the Sacerdotal Race: requiring him, that he would have a regard to Gods Ordinances, for fear left he (being diſpleaſed with them) ſhould caſt them again into that miſery from which he had ſo lately deliver'd them. Eſdras hereupon was ſo much afflicted, that he rent his cloaths, and tore his hair, and pulled his beard, and caſt himſelf upon the ground, becauſe the chief among the People were concerned in that offence. And becauſe he feared left if he ſhould command them to forſake their Wives, and thoſe Children which they had begotten by them, he ſhould not be obey'd, he continued in grief, and lay continually upon the ground. Whereupon, all thoſe reſorted unto him who were not guilty, and wept and lamented with him, becauſe of that which had happen'd. In this affliction of mind, Eſdras (raising himſelf from the earth, and lifting up his hands to Heaven) ſaid, That he was aſham'd to look thereupon, becauſe the offences of the People were ſo heinous; and that they had ſo ſoon loſt the Memory of thoſe Calamities wherewith their Forefathers had been viſited for their ſins. Nevertheleſs, O Lord, (ſaid he) ſince thy mercy is infinite, have pity, I beſeech thee, on the remnant that hath eſcap'd that long captivity, and which thou haſt brought back into their native Country. Spare them, O Lord; and though they have deſerved death, yet let thy mercy appear, in the ſparing of their Lives. Whilſt thus both he and thoſe that came unto him, lamented with him, with their Wives and Children, a certain man called Achonias, one of the principal men of Jeruſalem, came to him, and ſaid, That they had ſinned becauſe they had eſpouſed ſtrange Women; and perſwaded Eſdras to command them all, to baniſh both them and the Children begotten by them; adviſing, that they who obey'd not the Law, might be puniſh'd. Eſdras (perſwaded by theſe words) M made all the Princes of the Prieſts, Levites, and Tribes of Iſrael, ſwear, That they would diſmiſs their Wives and Children, according to the counſel of Achonias. And as ſoon as he had received their Oaths, he departed from the Temple unto John's houſe the Son of Eliſiſh, and there ſpent he all the day, without taſting any meat, by reaſon of the grief which he had conceiv'd. Hereupon an Ediſt was publiſh'd, That all they that were returned from the captivity, ſhould repair within two or three days, to Jeruſalem (under the penalty that they who deſerted, and came not within the prefixed time, ſhould be held as excommunicate; and their goods conſcated to the publick Treafury of the Temple, by the ordinance of the Prieſts.) They of the Tribes of Juda and Benjamin came thither within three days, on the 20 day of the Ninth Month, call'd by the Hebrews, Thebeth; and by the Macedonians, Appellau. N And as ſoon as they were ſeated in the upper part of the Temple in the preſence of the Elders, Eſdras aroſe and reproved them, becauſe they had tranſgreſs'd the Law, in taking Wives who were not of their Nation: For which cauſe he told them, that if they would do that which were agreeable unto God, and profitable for themſelves, they ſhould diſmiſs ſuch Wives. Whereupon, with a loud voice, they all cry'd, That they would do it willingly; but that there was no ſmall number of them, and that it was the winter-ſeaſon, and the matter of that conſequence, as one or two days could not end it: For which cauſe they thought it very needful, that the execution were deferred for a while; and that at the length, ſome of the Princes who were free from that Crime, with certain other choſen Elders of every place, ſhould make inquisition after them that had married Wives contrary to the preſcript of the Law. Which being approv'd by them, about the New Moon of the tenth month, this Inquisition began, which continued until the New Moon of the Month enſuing: and there were many of the Family of Jeſus the High-Prieſt, Priest, and of the Priest, Levites, and Israelites, that (making more account of the observation of the Laws, than of the natural affections to their Wives and Children) did presently put away their Wives, and those Children they had by them, and sacrificed certain Rams for a Peace-offering unto God: whose Names it were needful to reckon up in this place.

When *Esdra*s had in this manner reform'd the abuse committed by such Marriages, he corrected the evil Custom thereof, they solemniz'd the Feast of Tabernacles: where- to when all the People were reformed, they all came together in an open place in the Tem- ple, towards the Gate that looketh Eastward, requiring *Esdra*s, that he would read Moses's Ordinances unto them: which he perform'd; and standing up in the midst of the mul- titude, he read the Law unto them, from the Morning until Noon. By which reading, not only for the present, but for the time to come, they were informed of their duty; and calling to mind that which was past, they were so sorrowful, that the tears fell from their eyes, when they consider'd, that if they had kept the Law, they had not suffer'd any of those evils wherewith they had been afflicted. But *Esdra*s beholding them in that state, advis'd them to repair home, and to weep no more, because that day was a solemn and holy day, wherein they ought not to weep, because it was forbidden. But he command- ed them rather to intend their Feasts and Pleasures, and to make this good use of their re- morse for their former sins, that they might not fall into the like for the time to come. They following *Esdra*s exhortation, began to celebrate the Solemnity, and continued C their feast of Tabernacles eight days. After which time, they returned every one unto his house, praising God in hymns, and thanking *Esdra*s for the Reformation of those un- lawful Marriages which had been contracted with strangers; after he had gotten great ho- nour among the People, he finish'd his days in an happy old Age, and was buried hono- rably in Jerusalem. About the same time also dyed Joaquin the High-Priest, whose Son Eliash succeeded in his place.

After this it came to pass, that a certain man that was one of the captive Jews, and King Xerxes Butler, called Nehemias, walking before the City of Susa, (which was the Metropo- litan City of Persia) heard certain strangers that came from far, upon their entrance into the City, talking with one another in the Hebrew Tongue; whereupon he drew near unto them, and ask'd them, Whence they came? They answer'd, That they came from Judea; which as soon as he knew, he inquir'd after the state of Jerusalem, their Native City, and how the People fared. To whom they answer'd That they were in very bad state, and that their City was now desolate, and that the Nations round about them, afflicted the Jews with many outrages, making in-roads into their Country, and spoiling them daily, so that divers of them were led away Prisoners; yet, some Citizens of Jerusalem: and that the High-way, were found full of dead bodies. Hereupon Nehemias began to weep, (thorow the compassion he had of his distressed Brethren) and looking up towards Heaven, How long (said he) O Lord, wilt thou see our Nation thus afflicted, without taking care of us? Behold, now we are made a prey to all men. Whilst thus he walk'd before the Gate, and lamented bitterly, B word was brought him, that the King was ready to sit down to his meat: whereupon he hasten'd away to give his attendance, according to his office. As soon as Supper was done, the King grew pleasant, and casting his eyes upon Nehemias, (whom he perceived to be heavy and disconsolate) he ask'd him what he ailed? Nehemias (after he had besought God, to give him persuasive words to discourse unto the King) answer'd, O King, how is it possible, but that I should be afflicted, when I hear that the walls of Jerusalem, (which is my Native Country) are levelled with the ground, and the Sepulchres and Monuments of my Predecessors, are desecrated, and the Gates of the City are burned? Do me therefore this grace, that I may go thither and repair it, and finish the rest of the building of the Temple.

The King gave ear to his request, and promis'd him his Letters, alluring him, That he would address them to the Governours, commanding them to do him honour, and to furnish him with all things necessary, to accomplish that which he intended. For which cause, (said he) cease to be afflicted, and give thy attendance cheerfully. Hereupon Nehemias adored God, and thanked the King for the promise he had made him; and therefore by the joy he conceiv'd, he cleared that confusion and sorrow, that before he bore in his countenance. The next day the King called for him, and gave him Letters unto *Sada*s, the Governor of Sy- ria, Phanicia, and Samaria, in which he commanded him to honour Nehemias, and to furnish him with all things necessary for that building which he intended. As soon as he came to Babylon, he took divers of his Countrymen with him, who willingly follow'd him, and went with him unto Jerusalem, in the 25 year of the Reign of Xerxes; and after G he had deliver'd his Letters to *Sada*s, and the other Governours, he assembled the People of Jerusalem, and standing up in the midst of them, he spake unto the whole Congrega- tion

H tion to this effect: Tou men of Jury, there is none of you but know what care God Almighty hath been pleas'd to take of our Forefathers; Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in regard of their piety and love to justice; and he doth still make it evident that he will not abandon us, in that before I have obtained favour of the King and permission (by his assistance) to rebuild the Walls of our City, and finish the rest of the Temple: I therefore pay you (who are assuredly persuaded of the envy and hatred the neighbouring Nations bear unto you) who hearing that we are intent upon our building, will overpress us, and labour by all means possible to hinder us, first to rely upon Gods Providence, who will oppose himself against the hatred which they bear us, and afterwards to intermit neither day nor night in prosecution of the building, but with all care continue the work, in that the opportunity doth require our diligence. After he had spoken to this effect, he gave order that the Governour should take the measure of the Wall, and distribute the task among the people, according to the Burroughs and Towns, and to every mans ability: And after he promis'd to employ both himself, and all his family themselves to the work, and then it was that they first began to give the name of Jews to those of our Nation who returned from the Captivity; and to the Country the name of Judea, because it had been heretofore inhabited by those of the Tribe of Juda.

The Ammonites, Moabites, Samaritans, and all the Inhabitants of Celestia, understanding that the walls were rais'd with such haste and diligence, were much troubled, and re- K solv'd with themselves to lie in ambush, and to hinder them in the prosecution of their work; so that they slew divers Jews, and fought the means likewise to murder Nehemias himself: And having hired certain strangers with money to commit the fact, they lay in wait for him. They endeavour'd also to terrify the Jews with vain reports, and by spreading certain rumors, that divers Nations intended to make War against them: by which re- ports (being much troubled) they desist'd for a time from the prosecution of their building. Yet none of these things could weaken Nehemias's diligence or resolution, but that (keep- ing a guard round about him) he diligently prosecuted his design, setting light by all oc- currences: so great was his affection to accomplish the work. And therefore he carefully flood upon his guard, not that he fear'd death, but because he was perswaded, that his L fellow-Citizens would abate of their courage and resolution, if he continued not with them, to animate them to the prosecution of to holy an enterprise. He commanded like- wise, that the Workmen while they wrought, should have their Arms, near them, so that both Masters and Labourers carried their Swords.

Moreover, he gave order that they should have their Targets by them; and he placed certain Trumpeters, some 500 foot distant the one from the other, charging them, that as soon as they discover'd the Enemy from any part, they should incontinently found the alarm, and give notice unto the people to arm themselves, and prepare for the fight, for fear they should be surprized, and found unprovided. He himself also walked the round, M the City by night, with an indefatigable courage, and without either eating or sleeping, but only for necessity sake; and this labour endured he for the space of two years, and three months: for the Wall of Jerusalem was built again in that time, in the 28 year of the Reign of Xerxes; and in the ninth month. After the City was fortified, Nehemias and the people offer'd Sacrifices unto God, and spent eight days in feasting. When the rumor was spread abroad that this building was finished, the Inhabitants of Syria were fore displeased. But Nehemias perceiving that the City was weakly manned, besought the Priests and Levites to forsake their dwellings without the City, and to come and dwell within, and to that intent he built them houses upon his own charge. He ordained likewise, that they that intended their Husbandry, should bring the Tenths of their fruits unto Jerusalem, to the intent that the Priests and Levites by enjoying their continual maintenance, might omit no time in the service of God: wherein he was readily obey'd. By this means, the City of Jerusalem was very well peopled. After that Nehemias had honourably accomplish'd divers other worthy actions deserving praise, he died in a good old age. He was a man so good, so just, and highly affectionate towards his Country; and one to whom they are so much obliged for the benefits which they have receiv'd, that his memory will remain for ever among the Jews.

C H A P. VI.

Artaxerxes Succeeds his Father Xerxes in the Kingdom of Persia, he Repudiates Queen Vasthi his Wife, and Espouseth Esther the Niece of Mardocheus: Haman persuades Artaxerxes to banish all the Jews, and to apprehend Mardocheus; but he is hanged, and Mardocheus established in his place.

After the death of Xerxes, the Kingdom fell to Cyrus his Son, who by the Grecians was call'd Artaxerxes. Under his Government all the Race of the Jews, both Men, Women and Children, were in danger to be utterly exterminated: The cause whereof, I B will hereafter declare. But first, of all I must speak somewhat of the King, by whose means (as it is said,) our Nation was preserv'd. After that Artaxerxes had taken the Kingdom upon him, and established Governours over 127 Provinces, from India as far as Ethiopia; in the third Year of his Reign, he entertain'd and feasted all his Friends with great Magnificence, the Nations of Persia likewise with their Governours for 180 days. He feasted after this, for the space of seven days, the Ambassadors of all Nations in the City of Susa, after this manner: There were several Pavilions Erected, whole Pillars were of Gold and Silver, cover'd with Linen and Scarlet Vails, which were of that extent, that divers thousands of Men might take their refection therein. All the entertainment was serv'd up in vessels of Gold, enriched with precious Stones, very glorious to behold. The King likewise commanded his Servants, (that attended the Feast) that they should enforce no Man to drink, by filling continually, according to the manner of the Persians, but to permit every one of the Guests to drink according to his discretion. He sent also throughout all the Countrey, commanding a Cessation from all Labour, and that every one should make Holy Day for many days, and think of nothing but rejoicing, and wishing him an happy Reign. The Queen Vasthi also made a Banquet unto her Women in the Royal Palace. Now whereas the King was desirous to the what she surpassed all other Women in Beauty, he sent unto her, commanding her to come to the Banquet in more Royal manner than the rest of her Attendants: But she, too curiously tied to the observation of the Law of the Persians, (which forbiddeth Women to be seen by Strangers) went not unto the King; and notwithstanding he sent his Eunuchs divers times unto her, yet persister'd in her refusal to come unto him. Whereupon the King (moved with displeasure) gave over his Banquet, and arising, he call'd unto him his seven Counsellors, to whom (according to the custom of the Persians) it belonged to expound the Laws; and accus'd his Wife, telling them how much he had been slighted by her, since having sent for her divers times to accompany him at his Banquet, she had refused to obey him: He therefore commanded them to declare their opinion, what punishment appertain'd to her. One amongst them, call'd Mithras, answer'd, That the injury was not only offer'd unto him, but to all the Persians, who should likewise be all in danger of being after that manner despised by their Wives; for that none of them would acknowledge duty towards their Husbands, taking their example from the Queens disobedience, which she shew'd towards him, who was the Governour over all. Whereupon he concluded; That she that had thus dishonour'd him, should be severely punished: Which done, he thought fit that the Ordinance of the Kings, might be published thorow all Nations; that Queen Vasthi should be separated from his bed, and another Woman chosen in her place. This determination, confirmed by the consent of the rest of the Magi, very much afflicted the King, because on the one side he was unwilling to act contrary to the Laws of his Countrey, and on the other, he knew not how to put away his Queen, for whom he had so great a passion, by reason of her Beauty. Which when his Friends perceived, they counsel'd him to forget the memory and love of a Woman so unprofitable, and to send and seek out thorow all his Countries for the fairest Woman amongst them, whom he might choose and take to Wife, that by the Society of another Woman, the great affection which he bare unto Vasthi, might be extinguish'd. The King approving of this Counsel, sent out certain Messengers and Deputies, commanding them to bring unto him the fairest Virgins that were to be found in his Kingdom: When therefore they had assembled a great number of them, they found in Babylon a Young Orphan (without either Father or Mother) who was brought up under her Uncle (whose name was Mardocheus) of the Tribe of Benjamin, and one of the greatest men among the Jews. The Beauty and Modesty of this Virgin were so extraordinary, that she rais'd the admiration of all that beheld her. She therefore was delivered in charge unto one of the Eunuchs, who carefully attended her with all diligence, turning her with Odors and Precious Perfumes, according to the custom of noble women;

H women; and after this manner were 400 Virgins entertain'd for the space of six months. Now when he that was put in trust with this Commission, thought these Virgins to be sufficiently prepar'd, and that they were fit to come to the Princes bed, he sent every day one unto the King to keep him company: Who after some embraces, sent her presently back again unto the Eunuch. But when Esther came into his presence, he lov'd his affection more on her, than all the rest; and being surpris'd with her Beauty, he took her for his lawful Wife: And the Nuptials were Solemnly Celebrated in the seventh Year of his Reign, and in the 12 Month, call'd by us Adar, that is February. And he sent Messengers thorow all his Kingdoms, to proclaim a Feast in Honour of his Marriage: He himself also Feasted the Persians, and Medes, and the Princes of the Nations, for a whole Month. At such time as Esther entred into the Royal Palace, he let a Diadem upon her head, and so lived with her, that he never question'd her either of her Birth, or Nation. Her Uncle came from Babylon to Susa, (the chief City of Persia) where every day he walked before the Palace-gate, enquiring how Esther did: For that he lov'd her as dearly as if she had been his own Daughter. Now the King had made a Law, That no man should approach his presence, upon pain of death, except he were called, during the time that he was on his Throne; and round about his Seat there stood certain Officers with their Arms, ready to punish those who being uncalled should attempt to approach the Throne. The King himself sat aloft, and holding in his hand a Golden Scepter, whensoever he intended to save the life of any one that approached his Throne uncalled, he stretch'd forth the same, and touch'd him therewith: Who being thus touch'd, by that means escap'd death. And as touching these things, we have sufficiently spoken in this place.

Not long after this, when as Bagathous and Theodestes, two of the Kings Eunuchs, had conspir'd against him: Barnabas, who was of the Hebrew Nation, and one of their Servants, being acquainted with their Treason, discover'd it to the Queens Uncle Mardocheus, who, by her means, inform'd the King of their Conspiracy. Who finding out the truth by their Examination, he commanded them to be executed on the Gibbet; he for that time gave no recompence to Mardocheus for saving his life, but only commanded his Name to be Registred in his Records, permitting him to have access to his Palace, as if he had been one of his Domesticks. Now as often as Haman (the Son of Amadath an Amalechite) came unto the Palace to visit the King, all those that were either Persians or Strangers, (according to the Kings especial direction) did him honour: But Mardocheus shew'd him no honour (because the Laws of the Jews forbade it.) Which when Haman had observ'd, he demanded whence he was? And understanding that he was a Jew, he was much displeas'd, saying in himself, That the Persians who were of a freer condition, call themselves prostrate before him, and he that was but a Slave, disdain'd to do the like. Intending therefore to revenge himself on Mardocheus, he thought it not sufficient to procure his punishment at the Kings hands, but resolv'd wholly to exterminate his Race (for he was by Nature an Enemy to the Jews, by reason that the Amalechites, from whom he descend'd, had heretofore been conquer'd by them.) Whereupon he address'd himself unto the King, and accus'd them, saying, That there was a certain cursed Nation spread thorow his whole Kingdom, insociable, and abhorring the customs of other men, who us'd divers Laws and Ceremonies, contrary to those of all other Nations, and destructive of the Fundamentals of his Kingdom; so that the greatest favour he could do to his Subjects, would be utterly to exterminate them. And lest your Majesties Tribute should be any ways impaired by these means, I promise you of mine own Revenues forty Thousand Talents of Silver, desiring rather willingly to forgoe so much money, than that your Kingdom should be purged of such a cursed Race of men. When Haman had made this his Request, the King answer'd, That he forgave him money, and that he permitted him to deal with that Nation as he thought fit. When Haman had obtain'd his desire, he presently sent forth an Edict thorow all Nations, in the Kings Name, to this Effect.

The Great King Artaxerxes, unto his Governours of an Hundred and Seven and Twenty Provinces, extending from India as far as Ethiopia, health.

Having obtained the Empire over so many Nations, and extended my Dominion over the World, according to mine own pleasure, and being so little inclined to treat any of our Subjects with rigor, that we rather take great pleasure in affording them some signal marks of our Favour and goodness, causing them to enjoy an happy peace, it remains that we seek after those means that may render this happiness perpetual to them. Being therefore admonish'd by my Friend Haman, (who for his Wisdom and Justice is more Honour'd than all other by me; and for his improved Fidelity, hath the Second Place in Authority under me) that there is a certain race of men

The lamentation of the Jews, upon the hearing of this Edict.
 Ester 4. 1, 2.
 65.

This Edict being spread thorow all places of the Countrey, and publish'd in every City, B all men prepar'd themselves against the prefixed day, utterly to Exterminate the Jews, and no less diligence was there used in Susa the Metropolitan City. Mean-while, the King and Haman Feasted, and made good Cheer, whilst the City hung in suspense, being troubled with the expectation of the Event of that which should follow. But Mardocheus having intelligence hereof, rent his Garments, put on Sackcloth, and cast ashes on his head, walking thorow the City, and crying, That their Nation had not committed any crime deserving death:
 And using these, or such like speeches, he came unto the Kings Palace, and stood before the Gate, because it was unlawful for him to enter thereinto in that habit: The like also did the Jews that were in the Cities, where those Edicts had been publish'd against them, weeping and lamenting their miseries. But when the News hereof was brought unto the Queen, that Mardocheus stood before the Palace Gate in a deplorable condition, she was much troubled, and sent certain of her Servants unto him to command him to change his Attire, but they could not persuade him to put off his Sackcloth, for the cause of his sorrow still remaining, he could not think of laying aside the marks of it. She therefore called unto her Eunuch Achabneus, and sent him unto Mardocheus, to know what accident had befallen him, that made him put on his mourning habit, and to assist himself after that manner, and not at her intreaty to lay aside those marks of his sorrow. Hereupon Mardocheus told the Eunuch of the Edict made against the Jews, and sent by the King unto all his Provinces; the offer of the money that Haman likewise had tender'd to the King, whereby he had bought the utter ruine of his Nation at the Kings hands; moreover, he gave him the Copy of that which had been proclaim'd in Susa, to be deliver'd unto Esther, whom he intreated to beseech the King, and to esteem it no dishonour to become a Suppliant, to save her Nation, and preserve the Jews from that death whereunto at that time they were expos'd, since Haman, the next in honour to the King, had accused the Jews, and incens'd his Majesty against them. When Esther understood this, she sent again unto Mardocheus, giving him to understand, That she was not called for by the King; and that whosoever entered unto him, and was not called, should die, except the King would secure him, by stretching out his Golden Sceptre; for he, unto whom the King was pleas'd to grant that favor, although he were not called unto him, yet suffered he not death, but obtained pardon. When these things were reported by the Eunuch from Esther unto Mardocheus, g he commanded him to tell her, That she ought not so much to tender the particular respect of her life, as the lives of her whole Nation; assuring her, that if at that present she had not care of them, their succor should only proceed from God by some other means than this: But she and her Fathers house should be destroyed by them whom she had condemned. Upon this reply, Esther sent the same Messenger back again unto Mardocheus, commanding him to repair unto Susan, and to call a General Assembly of all the Jews that remained there willing them for three days space to fast and abstain from all kind of meat for her safety, and that both her self and her servants would do the like; promising them, that at that time she would present her self unto the King, notwithstanding his contrary Edict; and that if she must needs die she would willingly suffer it.

Ver. 16. 17.
 Fasting and Praying unto God, for the safety of the People.

Mardocheus observ'd her orders, caused the people to fast, and to pray unto God for her safety; he likewise himself besought him, That it might please him at that present to have compassion on their desolate and distressed Nation, as he had done oftentimes heretofore:
 and that as he had pardoned them at such times as they had offended, so now also at this present he would deliver them from that perdition which was denounced against them. For that they were not in danger to die insomuch for any offence of their own, but because he only had incens'd Haman, in that he would not adore him, or perform that honour unto him, which is only due to God: For which cause, in revenge, he had contrived this mischief against them, who would not transgress the divine ordinances. The People likewise pray'd to the like effect, be-seeing God, That he would have care of their preservation, and preserve the Israelites in G what place soever they were, from the misery at hand, which was before their eyes, and already expell'd by them. Esther also besought God, (according to the manner of her Countrey) calling

H casting her self prostrate on the Earth, cloathed in Sackcloth, and abstaining for three days space from Meat and Drink, and what thing soever else was delectable, beseeching God to have compassion on her, That when she presented her self before the King she might before have words fit to persuade and mollify him, and grace and beauty far more amiable than ever she had, to the end that by those means she might be the better enabled to appease the King, if so be he were displeased with her; and to succour her brethren in extreme danger, whereby the King might turn his anger against the enemies of the Jews, and take compassion of their imminent danger, which, without his prevention, would surely fall upon them. After the had in this sort for three days space fasted and prayed, she cast off her Mourning attire, and changed her Habit, attiring her self as became the Majesty of a Queen, having two of her Servants on whom she leaned, and the third that follow'd her, carried up her Train, which was large, and trailed on the ground: and in this equipage came the unto the King, having her cheeks stained with a modest blush, bringing with her a Majesty mixed with beauty, but her heart was not altogether free from fear. But when she beheld the King sitting aloft on his Throne, glorious in his garments embroider'd with gold, and adorn'd with precious stones, a fear suddenly fell upon her, since he lookt not on her perhaps at first with a favourable countenance; whereupon being astonish'd, her limbs failed her, her colour faded, and she fell betwixt her handmaids arms into a swoon. Hereupon the King (by the will of God) changed his affection, and suddenly leapt from his Throne, and embracing her with both his arms, he raised her up, and kissed her, and spake
 K comfortably unto her, praying her to be of good courage, and not to suspect any misfortune, for that she came unto him without any motion of his: That the ordinance was only made for his Subjects, but that she (who was equal with him) should fear nothing: whereupon he took his Scepter in his hand, and laid it on the Queens neck, whereby he deliver'd her from all fear; so that she recovered her vigour and courage, and spake after this manner:
 O King, I cannot easily express unto you the inconvenience that is suddenly fallen upon me;
 for as soon as I beheld the great and redoubt'd Majesty of your Person, my spirits forsook me, and my heart failed me. Now whilst the spake these words with pain and feebleness, the King was touched with compassion; so as he animated and encourag'd her, and commanded her to expect nothing but good; yea, (said he) if thou demandst the half of L my Kingdom, I will grant it thee. But Esther only requested this at his hands, that only he and his friend Haman would vouchsafe to grace her with their presence at her banquet: which the King readily granted her. Now when they were come unto the Banquet, and in the midst of their cups, the King commanded Esther to ask what she would, and he would grant it her, assuring her, That he would refuse her in nothing; yea, although she demanded the half of his Kingdom. But she deferred to discover her suit until the next day, requiring him once more to repair with Haman unto her Banquet.

Ver. 5.

When the King had promised to visit her again, Haman departed with great joy, for that he alone had the credit to banquet with the King and Esther, and no other had ever obtained the like Honour amongst any Kings of those Dominions. But in his return, M perceiving Mardocheus in the Court, he was moved, because that (notwithstanding he had lookt upon him) he had not done him honour: when therefore he came home unto his house, he called Zorabab his wife, and his friends, and told them what honour not only the King, but the Queen also had done him; and how he only with the King had supped that day with the Queen, and was invited the next day also to banquet with the King: notwithstanding he told them that he was discontented, because he saw Mardocheus the Jew in the Court. Zorabab his wife told him, That he should cause a Gallows to be raised fifty cubits high, and that the next day he should demand licence of the King, that Mar-docheus might be hang'd on the Gibbet. Haman approving of his wives counsel, commanded his servants to prepare the Timber, and erect the Gallows in his Court, to hang N Mardocheus thereon: which they diligently perform'd. But God, who knew what would come to pass, mocked at Haman's cursed hope; for the very same night he deprived the King of sleep, who being not willing to spend the time idly whilst he was awake, but to employ it in something that might be profitable for his Kingdom, he commanded his Secretary to bring him the Chronicles of the Kings his Predecessors, and of those things that were done by himself, and to read them to him. When therefore they were brought and read, he found that a certain man whose name was there set down, had received a great possession for reward of his virtue. He read likewise of another, that had obtained a recompence for his fidelity, and the like; till at last he came to the place, where the Eunuchs Bagothas and Theodester, were noted down for a secret conspiracy O against the person of the King, and how it was discover'd by Mardocheus. Now when the Secretary (having only recited this accident) turned over to another History, the King stayed him, and ask'd, If he found therein written, that he had given any recompence to Mardocheus? He answer'd, That he found nothing set down. Whereupon the King commanded him to give over, and inquired of those to whom that Office appertain'd, what hour of the night it was: and knowing that the morning was already discover'd, he commanded that some one should certify him, which of his friends attended before the Palace. At this time it hapned that Haman was found there, who came thither sooner than he was accustomed, with an intent to beseech the King, that he might put Mardocheus to death.

When the officers had brought the King word that Haman was before the Palace, they were commanded presently to call him in. As soon as he came into the Kings presence, he said unto him, Since I am assured that no Man hath so great an affection for me as thou hast, I prithee give me thy counsel, how I may condignly honour him, as becometh my self; whom I do most affectionately love? Haman thinking the advice he should give, should be given for himself, (because he supposed that he only was beloved by the King more than all others) counselled him that which in his opinion was the best, after this manner: If your Majesty shall think fit to express the favours towards the Man for whom you pretend an extraordinary kindness, cause him to be mounted upon a brave Horse, and let him be apparelled in a Royal habit, and put a chain of Gold about his Neck, and let some one of thy chiefest friends march before him, and proclaim throughout the City, That thus is the man honoured, whom the King loveth. The King with great satisfaction received this counsel which Haman thought he had given in favour of himself, and turning towards him, spake thus unto him: Take one of my Horses, a garment of Purple, and a chain of Gold, and seek out the Jew Mardocheus, and give them unto him, and march thou before him, making proclamation after that manner which you lately proposed: For (said he) thou art my nearest friend, and it is very fit that the execution of this thing be committed to thy trust, which thou hast so faithfully counselled. And this command I to be done, because Mardocheus hath been the preserver of my life. Haman, upon the hearing of these words, beyond all expectation, was no less amazed, than if he had been Thunder-struck; but finding a necessity of giving obedience to a command that was so positive and express, he went out, having with him the Horse, the purple Habit, and the Chain of Gold, and meeting with Mardocheus before the Palace, who was clothed in Sackcloth, he appointed him to lay his mourning Habit aside, and to cloath himself in purple. But he (who was wholly ignorant of that which had hapned, and D supposing that he mock'd him) said, O thou most wicked amongst men, dost thou thus mock at our afflictions? Notwithstanding being afterwards inform'd, that the King had bestowed this honour on him, for saving his Life, and discovering the treachery of those Eunuchs that would have slain him, he put on the purple Robe that the King wore ordinarily, and put the chain about his neck, and afterwards mounting on his Horse, he went round about the City, Haman walking before him, and crying, Thus shall it be done to the Man whom the King shall think fit to honour. Now, after they had gone round the City, Mardocheus gave his attendance on the King, but Haman came not into the presence, so much was he ashamed at that which had hapned; but going home, he told his wife and friends, with tears, all that which had hapned; who told him, That it was no ways possible for him to revenge himself as yet on Mardocheus, because God did visibly afford him his assistance.

Whilst they were thus speaking, Esther's Eunuchs came to hasten Haman to the Banquet, and Sabuchadas, one of the Eunuchs, seeing the Gibbet erected in Haman's Lodging, (whereon he intended to execute Mardocheus) demanded of one of the servants, wherefore it was raised up? And understanding that it was for the Queens Uncle, whom Haman would require at the Kings hands, to the end he might put him to Death, for that time he held his peace. But when the King being seated with Haman at the Banquet, required the Queen to declare what she would require that he might grant her, she began to lament the danger of her People, saying, That she, with her whole Nation, were made a prey to the Sword, and that for that cause she brake out into that discourse: For (said she) I had not troubled your Majesty, nor been so much grieved, if you had commanded that all the Jews should be sold, and led away Captives to extreme misery; for that affliction might have been born: but since the utter destruction of our whole Nation is designed, I could not but in this case have recourse to your Majesty's clemency. The King much surprized with this discourse, demanded who it was that formed that design? whereupon the began publicly to accuse Haman, saying, That he alone was that wretched and envious man, who had contrived their Tragedy. Hereupon the King was much troubled, and arose from the Banquet, and went into the garden: then began Haman to pray, and beseech Esther to forgive him his offence. And whilst he was fallen upon her Bed to beseech her favour, the King entred, and grew the more displeased at that he saw, and said, O thou cursed amongst men, dar'st thou attempt to violate my wife? Haman was wholly confounded with this question, so as Esther 7. 1. Ver. 2. Ver. 3, 4. Ver. 5, 6.

He had not a word to answer him. Hereupon the Eunuch Sabuchadas stepping forth, accused him for that he had found him in his lodging erecting a Gibbet for Mardocheus, assuring the King that one of his household Servants had told him at such time as he was sent to call him to the Banquet; alleging moreover, that the Gibbet was fifty Cubits high. Which when the King understood, he adjudged Haman to no other Death but that which he intended against Mardocheus; and thereupon presently commanded that he should be Hanged upon the same Gibbet, until he were dead. And here we cannot but admire the Providence of God, in considering his Widom and Justice, that he not only punished the wickedness of Haman (as he had deserved) but also caused him to fall into the same snare which he had prepared for another Man. Thus died Haman, who had unjustly abused the Kings Friendship: as for his Goods, they were given unto the Queen.

After this the King called Mardocheus unto him (for already he had notice that he was his Wife's Uncle) and gave him the Ring which he had given unto Haman: the Queen likewise gave him his Goods, and intreated the King to deliver her from those apprehensions into which she had been cast by those Letters which were sent out by that wicked Man Haman in His Majesty's Name, to the Governours of the several Provinces, with instruction to Maffacre the Jews, and extirpate their whole Nation; assuring him that she could not live to behold the death of her Brethren, and the total ruine of her Country. The King made no difficulty in granting her request, assuring her that he would not contradict her Will, permitting her to write in the Kings Name all that she would have done in the behalf of the Jews; promising that when she had done the same, he would Seal it with his own Seal, and give her authority to send it thorow all his Provinces: to the end that they that read those Letters, confirmed by the King's Seal, should not any ways oppose the execution of them. Whereupon he sent for his Secretaries of State, commanding them to write unto the Magistrates of all the Nations touching the Jews, and to the Princes and Governours of one hundred, twenty and seven Provinces, from India as far as Ethiopia. The Contents of which Letters were these.

L Artaxerxes the great King, to the Governours, and those that faithfully Rule under us, Health.

*Many Men being puffed up with Pride, by reason of the many benefits and honors which they receive through the liberality of their Benefactors, do not only exercise their Pride towards their Inferiours, but also are not afraid to wax insolent against those who are the Authors of their benefits, extinguishing as much as in them lieth, all manner of Gratitude amongst Men, and believing that it is in their Power to deceive God himself, and rob him of his Justice: So that when the favour of their Princes hath given them power and authority in the Government of their Affairs, instead of applying themselves to the Benefit of the Publick, they have given place to the hatred they have conceived against some particular Men, and deceived their Princes by false accusations and detractions, and provoked their Wrath against those who have not done amiss: whence it cometh to pass, that they have been sometimes in extreme danger to lose their Life. The proof whereof appeareth not only in ancient Histories (the knowledge whereof we have only obtained by hear-say) but by that likewise which hath been audaciously attempted before our Eyes; so that hereafter we ought not to give credit to detractions and accusations, nor to such things as Men insinuate themselves to persuade: but it becometh every Man to judge according to the truth of that he knoweth, and to punish those which are guilty, and to pardon the Innocent, in considering their acts, and not the words that are spoken. For it is most notorious unto all Men, that Haman the Son of Amacath (an Amalechite by Nation, and by that means a Stranger, and not of the Persian Blood, but entertained by us) hath in all things enjoyed the fruit of our Bounty hitherto; so that he hath been called our Father, honoured by all Men, and obtained amongst all Men, and in all things, the second place after us: yet could he not make a moderate use of his happiness, nor prudently entertain the greatness of his felicity; but hath sought means to deprive Mardocheus of his Life, who preserved mine; seeking by his fraud and malice to practise the ruine of Esther, the companion of our Life and Kingdom; and by this means striving to dispossess me of my most faithful friends, he determined to transfer the Kingdom unto others. Touching my self, in that I know that the Jews, who are by this wretch destinated to die, are no wicked Men, but such as live under a strict and holy discipline, praying God continually that it would please him to continue the Kingdom in us, and our Successors; I absolve them not only from that Penalty, contained in my former Letters sent by Haman (which by these presents I utterly disannul) but my pleasure likewise is, that they be had in all Honour. As for him that practised these things, against them, I* have caused him and all his Race, to be hanged before the Gates of Susan, according to the just A Judgement of God: inflicted on them for their Offences. My Will and Pleasure therefore is,

That the Copy of this Letter be sent through all Countries belonging to us, to the intent that the Jews be suffered to live according to their own Laws, in Peace; and that assistance may be given them, to the end they may revenge themselves of those who have offered them outrage in their adversity. And I command that this be done the thirteenth day of the twelfth Month called Adar, which is the day that God ordained for their preservation (when they were appointed to be slain) which day I wish may be fortunate to those that love us, and a monument of Revenge on those that intended our ruine. My pleasure likewise is, that all Men, Cities and Nations should know, that whosoever shall neglect, through obstinacy, to fulfil the tenor of this my Mandate, he shall be pursued with fire and sword: and let these Copies be set up throughout all our Dominions; and let each Man of the Jews, upon the prefixed day, prepare himself to be revenged on his Enemies.

The Jews re-venge them on their Enemies.

As soon as the Posts had received these Letters, they presently mounted on horseback and rode each of them his appointed way; and Mardocheus being clothed in a Royal habit, and adorned with a Crown of Gold on his head, and a Chain of Gold about his neck, came forth, and the Jews of Susan, seeing him thus honoured by the King, supposed that his good Success was an assurance of their own: And when the King's Letters were published; the Jews lookt upon them as a favourable ray of light which promised their deliverance, and their enemies were in so great fear that divers of other C Nations circumscribed themselves, supposing that in so doing they should be in security.
For the thirteenth day of the twelfth month (by the Hebrews called Adar, and by the Macedonians, Dystre) the Posts that carried the King's letters certified them, that they should exterminate their Enemies on that very day whereon they themselves were in danger to be exterminated. The Governors likewise of the Provinces, the Lords and chief Magistrates, did honour to the Jews: for the fear they had of Mardocheus, and after the King's Letters were published, it came to pass that the Jews slew about five hundred of their Enemies, within the City of Susa; the King declared unto Esther the number of the dead that perished in the City, and suspecting what might happen thorow the whole Country, he asked her if she requested any further matter, promising her that D he would see it executed: she besought him that it might be lawful for the Jews to revenge themselves yet once more the next day upon their Enemies, and to hang Ha-man's ten Sons upon the Gibbet; which the King (being loth to contradict Esther) permitted, so that on the 14 day of the Month Dystre, they slew about three hundred more of their Enemies, without taking the smallest portion of their Goods. Furthermore, the Jews slew in the Country, and in the Cities, about sixty five thousand of their Enemies, whom they dispatched the thirteenth day of the month, and solemnized the day following in Mirth and Feasting. The Jews that were at Susan assembled themselves likewise on the fourteenth day of the month, and banquetted that whole day. Whence it cometh to pass, that all the Jews which are throughout the World, keep and solemnize this day for a festival, and send Presents the one unto the other. Mardocheus also wrote unto the Jews, who lived under the Empire of Artaxerxes, commanding them to observe those days, and to solemnize them; willing them to charge their Successors to do the like, to the end that this Feast might continue for ever. For since on that day they should have been destroyed by Haman, they should do well if after they had eſcaped that danger, and taken revenge on their Enemies, they should observe the same day to give thanks to God: For this cause the Jews keep a solemn Feast on these days, and call it Purim, that is to say, Lots. But Mardocheus was great and powerful with the King, governing the whole Kingdom under him, and had also all the power that could be conferred on him by the Queen; and for this cause the affairs of the Jews had F better success than was hoped, but there was nothing during the whole Reign of Artaxerxes which hapned to be of greater importance than this which we are going to relate.

John the High-Priest kills Jesus his Brother in the Temple, Manasses the Brother of Jaddus
the High-Priest, espouseth the Daughter of Sanaballath Governour of Samaria.

Herod & Rufinus, cap. 7. The revenge taken on John for slaying his Brother.

After the death of Eliashb the High-Priest, Judas his Son succeeded in the Office. And Judas being dead, John his Son obtained the Place, and was the cause that Bagofes, General of Artaxerxes's Army, polluted the Temple, and made the Jews Tributaries to that before they could offer their ordinary and daily Sacrifices, they were compelled to I pay for every Lamb 50 Drachmes, which hapned upon this occasion: John had a Brother called Jesus, whom Bagofes favoured, and promised to give him the High-Priesthood.
One day these two Brethren being in the Temple, they fell out about the Succession, and the Quarrel rose so high, that John slew his Brother Jesus in that holy place. It was a thing very strange, that John being a Priest, should commit such an impiety against his Brother; and yet far more strange, in that so cruel an act, and an offence so impious, hath neither hapned amongst Greeks nor Barbarians. But God left it not unpunished, in that for the same Sin the People lost their Liberty, and the Temple was polluted by the Persians. When Bagofes had intelligence, that John (the High-Priest among the Jews) had slain his Brother Jesus in the Temple, he came thither in all haste, and began to break K forth into bitter threats against the Jews: Have you (said he) been so bold as to commit murder in your Temple? And when he attempted to enter, they hindered him. Whereupon he replied, Am I therefore more polluted than the Body that lieth dead in the Temple. And having spoken thus, he entered thereinto, and for the space of seven years, Bagofes being thus incensed against the Jews, punished them for murdering Jesus. After Jaddus High-Priest, whose Brother Mar-Manasses: Sanaballath sent by the late King Darius to govern Samaria, (for he also was of the Race of the Chutheans, from whom came the Samaritans) knowing that Jerusalem was a famous City, and that the Kings thereof wrought much trouble unto the Inhabitants of Assyria, and Calogyras; he willingly marieth his Daughter Nicasis to this Manasses, with L an intent that this Marriage should be as a pledge of his Good-will to the Nation of the Jews.

C H A P. VIII.

Alexander the Great, King of Macedonia, passeth out of Europe into Asia, destroys the Empire of the Persians; and when it was believed that he would have demolished the City of JERUSALEM, he pardons the Jews, and treats them very favourably.

Alexander made King after Philip his Father King of Macedon.

About this time, Philip King of Macedon died in the City of Aegæa, being trait-terously slain by Pausanias the Son of Cersifer, of the Race of Orestes, and his Son Alexander succeeded him in the Kingdom; who passing over the Hellespont, gave his M battel unto the huge Army of Darius near the River Granic, and there obtain'd a famous Victory. And hereupon also invading the Country of Lydia, (after he had conquer'd Ionia, and over-run Caria) he fell upon the Quarters of Pamphilia, as is declared in another place. But the Elders of Jerusalem were much displeased, that Jaddus's Brother, who was at that time High-Priest, and had married a foreign Woman, should be Companion and Associate with him in the Priesthood, so as they mutinied against him. For they supposed that that Marriage would be but a means to animate those who had a mind to profane Marriages, and prove an inducement to others to communicate in N Marriage with Strangers; calling to mind, that the cause of their Evils and first Captivity was, because some of them had fallen, and offended, by coupling themselves with Women of foreign Nations.

They therefore commanded Manasses either to forsake his Wife, or else never more to approach the Altar. The High-Priest likewise being incensed against his Brother, as well as the People, drave him in like manner from the Sacrifice. For which cause, Manasses (addressing himself to his Father-in-Law Sanaballath) told him, That although he loved his Daughter Nicasis very entirely, yet would he not condescend for her sake to be deprived of the greater Fortunes, real-Priesthood (which was the greatest Dignity that could be among their Nation, and which had need the soever continued in his Race.) Whereupon Sanaballath answer'd and promis'd him, That he reign with Marriage solemnized betwixt his Daughter and him, were continued. He furthermore assured him, That he would build a Temple resembling that in Jerusalem, upon the Mountain of Garizim, which was the highest in all the Country, permitting him to do the same with Darius's consent. Manasse, puffed up by these Promises, remaineth with Sanaballath, and grew in hopes that he should obtain the Priesthood by Darius's means; for Sanaballath was very old. Whereas divers others, both Priests and Common People, among the Israelites, were entangled in such Marriages, there arose no small Commotion in Jerusalem. For all they of this Condition retired themselves to Manasse, whom Sanaballath furnished with Money, and Lands to till, and Houses to inhabit, to favour the Ambition of his Son-in-Law.

Media & Rufinus, cap. 6.

Alexander's Victory against Darius.

At the same time Darius understanding that Alexander having passed the Hellespont, had overcome those Governours, whom he had placed near unto the River Granicus, and that he passed further, spoiling his Country; he gathered together his Horse-men and Foot-men resolving to make head against the Macedonians, before they should gain all Asia: He therefore passed Euphrates, and Mount Taurus in Cilicia, to encounter his Enemies. Sanaballath joyful at Darius's approach, incontinently told Manasse, that he would fulfil his Promise, as soon as Darius should return from the Conquest of his Enemies. For not only he, but also all the Asians persuaded themselves most assuredly, that the Macedonians would not abide the battle against the Persians, by reason of their great multitude; but it fell out altogether contrary to their expectation: For the Persian encountering with the Macedonians, was overcome; and after he had lost the greater part of his Army, and left his Mother, Wife, and Children, Prisoners, he himself fled into Persia. Alexander arriving in Syria, seiz'd on Damascus, took Sidon, and besieged Tyre; and by his Letters sending unto Jaddus the High-Priest of the Jews, he requir'd him to send him some Supplies, and to tell his Army Victuals for their Money; assuring him, That if he desired the Friendship of the Macedonians, he would give him that Tribute which he paid to Darius, and he should have no cause to repent of the choice which he should make. The High-Priest answer'd Alexander's Messenger, That he had sworn unto Darius never to bear Arms against him, during his life-time; against which Oath of his, he could not act. Which when Alexander heard, he was displeased, but resolv'd notwithstanding to continue the Siege at Tyre, until such time as it should be taken; yet threaten'd he, that as soon as he had taken it, he would lead forth his Army against the High-Priest, to the end that all men might know to whom they ought to keep their Faith. For which cause, sparing no labour, he overcame Tyre; and after he had given order for the settlement thereof, he came unto Gaza, and took it with Bahemeses the Captain of the Garrison that held it. But Sanaballath finding a fit Opportunity to make himself great, forsook Darius, and follow'd Alexander, leading with him eight thousand of his Subjects: And coming to him at the beginning of the Siege of Tyre, he offered to surrender to him all those places wherein he commanded, acknowledging him for his Lord more willingly than he had Darius. Alexander receiv'd him graciously: Whereupon, Sanaballath inform'd him of his Condition, and let him understand, that Manasse (who was Brother to Jaddus the High-Priest of the Jews) was his Son-in-Law, who E with divers of the same Nation, were desirous to build them a Temple in the Countries under his Dominion, assuring the King of much profit thereby; because in so doing, the force of the Jews would be dismembred into two parts, and they could not conspire together to make any new Insurrection or trouble, as in times past they had done during the Government of the Kings of Assyria.

Manasse's exhortation to his disciples.

When Sanaballath had permission from Alexander to build his Temple, with the greatest speed he might he finish'd the same, and made Manasse the High-Priest thereof, supposing that it was the greatest advantage that might happen to his Daughter's Children. Seven months after the surrender of Tyre, and two after the taking of Gaza, Sanaballath died. Alexander also razed Gaza, and prepared himself to come suddenly upon Jerusalem; which when the High-Priest Jaddus understood, he was much grieved, and afraid, not knowing how to gain the favour of the Macedonians: And, on the other side, knowing that the King was displeased with him, (because heretofore he had disobey'd him, he commanded the people to make their Prayers unto God, and he in his own person offered sacrifice; beseeching God that it would please him to be a shield of Defence and Succour to their Nation, and to deliver them from those imminent Dangers wherewith they were threaten'd. But the next night following, whilst he slept, God appeared unto him, and commanded him to be of good Courage, and that as soon as he had gone about the Wall, he should open the Gates boldly, and command the rest of the People to attire themselves in white; and that accompanied with them, he should march forward in those priestly Ornaments which were appointed by the Law, to the end that in this

The year of the World, 3630. before Christ's Nativity, 334. Alexander intending to besiege Jerusalem, meeteth with the High-Priest and people in white, and is honourably received by them, and doth them honour in memory of his Vision that appeared unto him in the like habit.

H this Equipage they might go and meet with Alexander, without any apprehension of future evil, because he would protect them: As soon as he awaked from his sleep, he was very joyful, and related this Revelation from God; and performing that which had been commanded him, he expected in this manner the approach of the King; and when he knew that he was not far off from the City, he marched forth to meet him, accompanied with the Priests, and a multitude of other people, giving him a most Royal Entertainment, and far different from that of other Nations, near unto a place called Sapha, which word signifieth a Watch, (by reason that from that place a Man may discover the City and Temple of Jerusalem.) The Phenicians and Chaldeans that were in Alexander's Army, grounding their Hopes upon his Displeasure, doubted not but that he would give them leave to sack the City, and to Hew the High-priest in pieces: But it fell out quite contrary, for Alexander clyping the people from afar in white Rayments, and the Priests going before them in their Rochets, and the High-priest attired in a Robe of purple, brodered with Gold, having his Mitre on his head, and his plate of Gold wherein the Name of God was written, Alexander himself marched forward before the rest of his Company, and fell prostrate on his face before that Name, saluting first of all the High-Priest; and at the same instant, all the Jews together saluted the King with one Voice, and encompassed him round about. The Kings of Syria and the rest that saw that which hapned, were wonderfully astonished, and thought that the King was out of his Wits: Parmenio only drew near unto him, and ask'd him, What he meant to adore the Priest of the Jews, whereas all other Men adored him? To whom he answer'd, I do not adore him, but that God whom the Priest worshippeth; for in my sleep I saw him in such a habit, as I see him in at this present, at such time as I was in Dio, a City of Macedonia: And whilst I consulted with myself by what means I might attain to the Conquest of Asia, he counsel'd me to make no delay, but to march forward boldly, assuring me, That it would be he that would guide both me and mine Army, and would deliver the Empire of the Persians into my hands. Since that time, I have not seen any one attired after the same manner: And at this present beholding this Man, and calling to mind the Vision and Exhortation that he gave me in my sleep, I hope that mine Army being conducted by Divine Providence, I shall overcome Darius, and discomfit the Persians, and that my Designs shall have a happy issue.

L When he had thus answer'd Parmenio, he gave the High-Priest his hand, and went with him into the City, being conducted by the Priests: After this, when he came into the Temple, he offered sacrifice according to the High-Priest's Direction, whom he honour'd likewise with very great Reverence. And when Jaddus shewed him the Prophecy of Daniel, wherein he declar'd that a certain man of the Nation of the Greeks, should destroy the Empire of the Persians, and that in his opinion he was the man; Alexander was very pleas'd, joyful, and dismissed the multitude that attended him, for that time. The next day assembling the Jews, he commanded them to let him know, what favours they desired at his hands. Whereupon the High-Priest answer'd, That he desired that they might be permitted to live according to the Laws and Customs of their Forefathers, and that every seventh year they might be exempted from Tributes. Which was granted them fully. They besought him likewise, That by his permission, the Jews that were in the Countries of Babylon and Media, might live according to their Laws. And he promised them willingly to do all that which they desired. He made proclamation also among the people, That if any one of them would bear Arms under him, (and live according to the Custom of their Nation) he was ready to receive them. Whereupon divers listed themselves under him in the Wars.

After that Alexander had thus behaved himself at Jerusalem, he marched with his Army against the Neighbouring Cities; and wheresoever he went, he was received with great affection. But the Samaritans, whose Metropolitan City at that time was Sichem (situate near unto the Mountain of Garizim, in which there dwelt divers Jews also, that were revolted from their Nation) seeing how favourably Alexander had received those of Jerusalem, they resolved to profess themselves to be Jews. For such is the nature of the Samaritans, (as we have declared heretofore) that when the Jews are in affliction, they renounce all alliance with them, (wherein they confess the truth:) But when they perceive our Affairs to be in prosperous condition, they endeavour to persuade the World that we are both sprung from the same Original, and are descended of the Race of Ephraim and Manasse, the Sons of Joseph. They came therefore to the King's presence, and met him near unto Jerusalem, with great magnificence, and demonstration of singular Affection towards him. And after that Alexander had entertain'd them, they of Sichem approached near unto him, (being accompanied with those Men of War that Sanaballath had sent unto the King) beseeching him, That he would visit their City, and honour their Temple with his presence: Whereupon he promised, That at his return he would visit them. They required red him also, That he would acquit them of the Tribute of the seventh Year, because they did not sow in the same. He ask'd them, Who they were that made that Request? They answer'd him, That they were Hebrews; but that they were called Sichemites by the Sidonians. He ask'd them again, If they were Jews? And they said, They were not. Well, (said he) I have made this Grant unto the Jews; when therefore I shall return, and be more particularly informed, I shall do that which shall be requisite. Thus dismissed he the Sichemites; but he commanded Sanaballath's Men of War to follow him into Egypt, promising in that place to give them Possessions by Lot: which afterwards he did, (enjoyning them to live in Garison in the City of Thebes, to make good that Country.) After Alexander's Death, his Empire was divided amongst his Successors, and the Temple built near unto Mount Garizim, remained entire. And if any one were accused in Jerusalem for eating the unlawful Meats, or for breaking the Sabbath, or for any such-like Fault, he fled unto the Sichemites, saying, That he was accused unjustly. In that time deceased the High-Priest Jaddus; and Onias, his Son, succeeded him. This was the state of the Inhabitants of Jerusalem at that time.

CHAP. I.

After the Death of Alexander the Great, his Army is divided amongst his Captains. Ptolomey, one of the chief of them, makes himself Master of Jerusalem by surprise, sends several Colonies of Jews into Egypt, and puts great confidence in them; continual Wars betwixt the Inhabitants of Jerusalem and the Samaritans.

Alexander, King of Macedon, having overcome the Persians, and established the state of the Jews (according as hath been related) departed this life. Whereupon his Dominions and Kingdoms fell into divers Mens hands. Antigonus made himself Governour of Asia: Seleucus of Babylon, and the bordering Nations: Lysimachus had the Hellespont: Cassander, Macedon: and Ptolomey the Son of Lagus held Egypt. Now when these Men were at discord amongst themselves (whilst each of them affected the sovereignty, and fought the one against the other) they raised divers great and bloody Wars, which ruined many Cities, and destroyed great numbers of their Inhabitants. Syria had sufficient experience of all these miseries under the Government of Ptolomey the Son of Lagus, surnamed Soter, a Title which he little deserved. He it was that seized on Jerusalem by a stratagem; for he entered the City upon a Sabbath-day, under pretext to offer Sacrifice; and whilst the Jews suspected nothing; but spent the day in ease and idleness, he surprised the City without resistance, and made the Citizens Captives. Agatharchides the Cnidian (who wrote the Acts of Alexander's Successors, testifieth the same) reproaching us of Superstition; as if by that means we lost our City. He writeth to this effect; "There is a certain Nation, which are called Jews who inhabit a City which is call'd Jerusalem, both strong and mighty. They suffered it to fall into Ptolomey's hands, because they would not stand upon their Guard; and through their unreasonable "superstition, "superstition, they permitted themselves to be subdued by a Tyrant Conquerour. See A here what Agatharchides saith in this place of our Nation: But Ptolomey leading away with him divers Prisoners from the better quarters of Judea, and the places near unto Jerusalem, of Samarita and Mount Garizim, sent them into Egypt to inhabit there: and being assured that those of Jerusalem were most firm in maintaining their Oaths and Promises, according as it appeared by their answer made to Alexander, when after the discomfiture of Darius, he sent Ambassadors unto them: he put divers of them into his Garisons, giving them the same privileges in the City of Alexandria, which the Macedonians had. After he had received their Oath, that they should be faithful unto him and his successors, in memory of the great Trust and Favours he had bestowed on them, many of the other Jews likewise of their own accord went into Egypt, partly allured thereto by the plenty of the Country, partly by the liberality of Ptolomey towards their Nation. Yet were there continual quarrels betwixt their Posterity and the Samaritans: because they would keep and maintain the Customs and Ordinances of their Forefathers; whereupon divers Wars arose amongst them. For they of Jerusalem said that their Temple was the true Sanctuary of God, and would have the Offerings and Sacrifices sent thither; the Samaritans on the other side commanded them to be brought to the Mount Garizim.

C H A P. II.

Ptolomey Philadelphus caused the Laws of the Jews to be translated into the Greek Tongue: and dismissing many Captive Jews, dedicated many Presents to the Temple of God.

Heir to Refine, cap. 2. The Library of Ptolomey Philadelphus.

AFTER the death of Ptolomeus Soter, his Son Ptolomeus Philadelphus succeeded in the Kingdom of Egypt, and held it for nine and thirty years space, he it was that translated the Law into the Greek Tongue, and delivered the Jews from that servitude wherein they were intrahled in Egypt, to the number of sixscore thousand, upon this occasion. Demetrius Phalerus Master of the Kings Library, endeavoured to make a collection of all sorts of Books that were in the World, and brought all which he thought would be agreeable to the King, who was very curious in his collection of Books, D The King demanding one day how many thousands of Volumes he had already gathered, he answered him, that he had already got about two hundred thousand Volumes; but that shortly he hoped to have to the number of five hundred thousand. Besides he told him, that he had been lately informed that there were divers Volumes among the Jews, wherein many things touching their Laws and Polices were written, which were worthy to be known, and deserved a place in so memorable and famous a Library, but that it would be very difficult to translate them into the Greek Tongue, for their characters seem to have some relation to the Syrack, and their pronunciation likewise is not much different from it; notwithstanding they have their phrase proper and peculiar unto themselves. But nevertheless he believed it might be done, since his Majesty would not think much of any Charge; the King approved of this Proposal, and wrote unto the High-Priest of the Jews to help him to these Books. In the mean time a certain Man called Aristeus, who was intirely beloved by the King by reason of his Modesty, and had divers times resolved with himself to solicit the King, to dismiss all the Jews that were in his Kingdom, supposing that at that instant he had a fit opportunity to make his request, he spake unto Sophus, to Tarentin, and Andrew the chief Captain of the Kings Guard, beseeching them to favour him in that which he intended to move to the King. Having found how they stood inclined, he addressed himself unto the King, and spake unto him after this manner. Since your Majesty hath resolved not only to transcribe, but also to translate the Laws of the Jews, I should not speak to your Majesty with that freedom and sincerity which I ought to use, if I should not inform you that I know not how this can be fairly done at the same time that you detain as your Slaves so great a number of Jews within your Kingdom of Egypt: You will therefore do a work answerable to the Greatness of your courage and benignity if you deliver them from their misery, considering that he who gave them their Law is God, who governeth your Kingdom (as by diligent inquiry I have certainly learnt) for both they and we adore one God, Creator of all things, whom we call by the name of Jupiter, for as much as he preserveth our life and the lives of all Men. For that honour therefore which you owe unto God, send back these People unto their Country, and permit them to inhabit it, who amongst all Men are most singularly affected to their Religion. Neither hath your Grace occasion to suspect, that I make this address unto you, because I am either allied or descended of any of their Tribes; but only for this reason, because I am assured that there is but one God, who is the Maker of all Men, and that he taketh pleasure in those that

addit

H addit themselves to Benevolence. When Aristeus had spoken thus, the King beholding him with a cheerful Countenance, ask'd him, How many thousands he thought they were, whose liberty he desired? Andrew (being nigh at hand) answer'd, That there were more than 120000. Whereupon the King replied, Is this Demand, Aristeus, a matter of small consequence, which thou requirest? Sophus and Tarentin replied, That he could do nothing more worthy of himself, than by such an Action, to acknowledge the great Obligations which God had laid upon him, in raising him to the Throne. The King being well pleased to see them so unanimous in their Request, promised that the Jews should be set at liberty, and that he would pay unto his Soldiers 120 Drachmes for each Jew that was his Slave: And touching the Request made by them, he promis'd them to dispatch his Letters Patents, in I most ample manner, to bring an happy issue to Aristeus's suit; or rather to satisfy the Will of God, which was chiefly to be regarded. Hereupon he sent out his Proclamation, declaring, That he not only set them at liberty, who had been brought thither by his Father, or those of his Army who attended him; but those also who heretofore had been in his Kingdom, or lately had been brought thither: And notwithstanding it was told him, that the Money that would be required for their Ransom, would amount to more than 400 Talents, yet ceased he not to confirm that which he had promised. But that it may more plainly appear how great his Royal Magnificence was, I thought good to insert in this place the Copy of the Edict, which he sent abroad, to this effect:

K Whosoever of you that in my Father's service (by bearing Arms unto him) have made any The King of Egypt's Proclamation touching the liberty of the Jews, collected by the Arifem. inroads into Syria and Phoenicia, and after the Conquest of Judea, having taken any Prisoners, and brought them into our Cities and Countries, with intent to sell them: All they also, who have heretofore detained any, or at this present have any such Captives in their possession, they are commanded hereby, to set them at liberty that live under their thralldom, receiving for the Ransom of every Person 120 Drachmes; if they are Soldiers, at such time as their Wages shall be paid them: As for the rest, they shall receive their Money out of the King's Treasury. For I am persuaded, that it was contrary to my Father's intent, and against all right, that they have been taken Prisoners, and that their Country hath been harassed by the insulency of the Soldiers, who have thought to make their profit and merchandize by them, by bringing them in L to Egypt. Having therefore an especial regard to Justice, and intending to shew mercy to those who are wrongfully oppressed, I command that all those Jews who are detained in servitude be discharged, and that they who hold them captive, receive the Ransom promised by us, so as no deceit or fraud be used therein. And to the end that our Ordinance be exactly and fully observed, our Will is, That this Edict of ours be publicly proclaimed three days after it shall come unto your Hands; and that those who hold such Prisoners in their possession, declare how many Prisoners they have. Moreover, it shall be lawful for any Man that will, to accuse such as obey not this Edict; and our Pleasure is, That such as shall not observe it, shall have their Goods confiscated to the King's use.

M When this Edict of the King's, published to this effect, was proclaimed abroad, and that only point was omitted, that concerned those that before-time had been, and afterwards the second time were led away Prisoners, in whose behalf he had given no direction, he shewed himself most bountiful in like manner toward these; and gave order that the Number and Tally should be speedily gathered, and the Money distributed to the Commissioners and Treasurers appertaining to him. This was dispatched in the space of seven days, all the King's Ordinance was accomplished, and there was laid out for the Ransoms of them all, to the sum of more than 460 Talents: For the Masters exacted sixscore Drachmes for the Children also, grounding themselves upon the King's Edict, by which it was ordained, that for every Person they should have that sum, extending the same even unto Children.

After this extraordinary Munificence, according to the King's Command, he appointed Demetrius to make a Decree, touching the Translation of the Books of the Jews. For the King did nothing rashly, but administr'd all things with great Wisdom and Circumspection; and therefore the Copy of Demetrius's Proposal, and the Letters sent to this effect, are registered, and recorded in writing: The number likewise of the Presents that were sent, and by whom they were offered. So that whosoever shall behold them, he will judge by the curious Workmanship, the great Skill of the Workman; and by the Excellencies of the Pieces, he will know by whom each of them was fashioned. The Copy of the Advice given by Demetrius, is this:

Demetrius
honoratory Letter to Ptolemy, touching his Library.

Most mighty Prince, since you have committed the Trust unto me to find out such Books as are wanting to your Library, and to search for such Volumes as hitherto have been hid from my sight, to the end that I might gather them together; after that I had used herein all the care that was possible, I have found, that amongst others, we want the Books of the Laws of the Jews; for they being written in Hebrew Characters, we have no notice thereof; nor have we taken the pains to enquire after them, because your Majesty hath not as yet thought fit to desire them. But I think it necessary, that your Majesty should have them procured, and that they be faithfully translated, because those Laws proceeded from God himself; and it is most certain, that of all other Laws in the World, they are the wisest and incorruptest. For which cause, Hecateus the Abderite saith, That neither Poets nor Historians have made any mention of them, nor of those that have been governed under the same; because in themselves they are pure, and are not to be published by the mouth of the profane. May it therefore please your Majesty to write unto the High-Priest of the Jews, commanding him to send you six of every Tribe, such as he shall know to be most expert in their Law, by whom we may clearly apprehend the sense contained in those Books, to the end that having the faithful interpretation of those things that are contained therein, we may collect and gather them together, to the satisfaction of your Majesty.

The King's Librality towards the Jews.

When the King in this manner had been advised, he wrote unto Eleazar the High-Priest of the Jews, touching this matter; letting him know what liberty was by him granted unto the Jews that were in his Kingdom: He sent him also 50 Talents of Gold to make Cups, Ewers, and Vessels, with an infinite number of precious Stones, commanding his Cofferers, who had the charge of his Jewels, to suffer the Workmen to choose what Stones they liked best. Furthermore, he appointed that 100 Talents should be given for the Sacrifices and Oblations, and other uses of the Temple. But after that I have declared what was the Copy of the Letter sent unto Eleazar the High-Priest, and the manner how he obtained that Sacerdotal Dignity, I will give an account of the rich Presents, and their curious Workmanship.

After the death of Onias the High-Priest, his Son Simon surnamed the Just, succeeded in his Place, who for that cause was so called, by reason of the Piety which he shewed toward God, and good Affection which he bare unto his Country-men. This Simon dying, and leaving behind him one only Son, of young and tender years, who was called Onias; his Brother (which was this Eleazar of whom we speak at this present) took upon him the Priesthood; and to him wrote Ptolemy, in such manner as is hereafter expressed.

Whereas divers Jews dwell in my Kingdom, whom my Father had honoured, (though during the Reign of the Persians, they were sent thither as Prisoners) and made some of them Captains in his Wars, allowing them honourable Wages and Conditions: To others born in his time in Egypt, he hath committed his Forts and Garrisons, which made them much honoured and feared among the Egyptians. Since my coming to the Government, I have behaved myself graciously towards all Men, and especially towards those of your Nation, of whom I have delivered more than 10000 out of Captivity, paying their Ransom out of mine own Coffers: I have likewise lifted some of those that were of Age in the Companies and Bands of my Men of War: I have received some into my Court, whom I took to be faithful and loyal, and in my Opinion well worthy of such Preference; supposing this to be the most acceptable Present that I could offer up unto God, for his Providence in advancing me to the Kingdom. And being desirous not only to gratify them, but also all those Jews that are in the whole World, I have determined to cause your Law to be translated, out of Hebrew into Greek, that I might put it in my Library. You shall therefore do well, if you choose out six discreet and learned Men of every Tribe amongst you, and send them unto me, such as by reason of their Age shall be well instructed in your Laws, and sufficiently enabled to expound the same. And I doubt not but that (the Work succeeding as I hope it will) I shall thereby gain great Glory. Wherefore I send unto you Andrew the chiefest Captain of my Guard, and Aristeus also, (whom we especially honour) to confer with you; by whom I have sent you 100 Talents of Silver, as the first-fruits of those Gifts and Sacrifices which we intend to offer in the Temple. You will do us an especial Favour, if you signify your Mind unto us by your Letters.

As soon as Eleazar had received the King's Letters, he return'd him an answer full of respect, as followeth:

The

The High-Priest Eleazar, to King Ptolemy, Health.

If your self, your Queen Arsinoe, and your Children be in Health, we do very much rejoice thereat. We have received your Princely Letters with no small Joy, and have read and considered the Contents thereof; we have also published them in the presence of all the People, and have declared unto them your Piety towards God, and have shewed them those Vessels which you sent us, twenty of Gold, and thirty of Silver; with five Vessels, and a Table which you have sent us as Presents. We have likewise shewed them those hundred Talents which Andrew and Aristeus (various and excellently learned Men, and honoured by you amongst your dearest Friends) have brought unto us, to be employed in sacrifices and other uses in the Temple. We therefore, that whatsoever you are pleased to command we will readily observe, that we may acknowledge the Benefits, which you have divers ways bestowed upon our Nation. We have therefore daily offered sacrifice for you, your Queen Arsinoe, your Children and Friends: The People likewise have prayed that God would send you happy Success in whatsoever you desire, that your Kingdom may be continued in Peace, and that the Translation of our Law may be accomplished at your desire, for our own satisfaction. To that intent we have chosen six Elders out of every Tribe, whom we send unto you, together with the Original of our Law. Our request is, that according to your accustomed Piety and Justice, you return us both our Laws and these Interpreters in safety, as soon as they have answered your expectation. Fare you well.

This is the answer which the High-Priest sent unto him. I have not thought it necessary to set down the names of the seventy two Elders in particular, who were sent by Eleazar together with the Law, although they were all mentioned in the Letter sent by the High-Priest. Yet I think it not amiss to recite the excellency of those Presents that were sent by the King, and offered up unto God; to the end that all Men may know how Zealous he was towards the Service of God. For in performance thereof, he spared no Expence, but continually assisted the Workmen and examined their workmanship; to the end that nothing might be carelessly finished, or negligently performed. I will therefore set down (as near as I can) the excellency of every Piece (although it may be that the course of History requireth it not) because my desire is, by so doing, to let the Reader know how great the Liberality and Generosity of the King hath been. I will begin with the magnificent Table.

The King desirous to make it surpass that at Jerusalem, inquired after the Dimensions of it, to the intent that he might make it far greater. And having certain notice how large it was, and that there was no letter but that he might make his far greater, he said that he would have it five times greater than the other; but that he feared lest being so great it would be unfit to offer Sacrifice thereupon; and his intention was, that the Presents which he offered, should not only serve for show, but that they might also be somewhat proper for the use and service of the Temple. Wherefore concluding that the first was of a size large enough, he resolved his should not exceed the other in greatness; but that equalling it in the quantity of Gold, it should exceed it in the variety and beauty of workmanship. For he was very skilful in all Arts; very ingenious in all new Inventions, so that by his own Judgment, he contrived such things as were not before in use; and commanded them to make and finish them, having always an Eye to the Model, which he had given them to work by. He undertook therefore to make the Table of two Cubits and a half in length, of one in breadth, and of one and a half in height all of massy Gold; about which there was made a Border; of a hand breadth, enriched with moving Waves, on which there was a Figure graven with admirable Art, appearing on three sides: For being triangular, every angle presented the same engraving; so that when it was turned, it seemed that one and the same Figure represented it self. Within the inside of this Border it was inclosed, with divers goodly Figures, but on the out-side it was far more excellently beautified and wrought, because in that part it was most open to the Eye. For this cause the upper part of the Table appeared to be of two parts, and of three Angles, which (as we said) were apparent at such time as the Table was turned, each one seeming of equal magnitude with the other. Upon the graven bends there were precious Stones inclosed, distant by equal proportion the one from the other, and fastned by golden Buttons tied by Loops. The sides of the Borders (which presented themselves to the Eye) were beautified with rich Stones, disposed after the manner of an Oval; and there was a Border of golden Twigs engraven round about the Table; under the Ovals there was a Crown garnished with clusters of divers sorts of Fruits, the clusters of Grapes hung down, the Ears of Corn stood upright, and all was inclosed with Pomegranates, A and the precious Stones were incised in Gold thorow the whole circuit of the Table, to present each sort of Fruit in their native Colours. There was also a rank of Ovals under the Crown, not unlike to the former, made of Gold; so that on both sides, both the Variety and Delicacy of the Work appeared, both in the Bends and Borders, as also in the Table, in which there appeared not any difference, on whatsoever side it was turned; and from the top unto the bottom one and the same Workmanship appeared. For it had a Plate of Gold, four Fingers broad, comprehending the breadth of the Table, on which the Feet of the same were itaid, which were afterwards fastned to the Border by Buttons and Clasps of Gold, to the end that the excellent and curious Workmanship might the better be seen, and on what side soever it were turned, it might always seem B the same. They engraved also on the same, a Labyrinth, in the midst whereof there were divers kinds of precious Stones, shining like Stars: And amongst the rest there were Rubies and Emeralds of most Orient brightness, as also all other sorts of Stones that either are esteemed for their Beauty or Price. Near unto this Labyrinth, from the one end unto the other, there were certain Knots engraven, the middle whereof was like to a Rhombus or Losenge, upon which there were certain Pieces of Chrystal and Amber, incised and placed one by the other in equal distance, and proportion; which gave a marvellous satisfaction to the beholders. The Corniches of the Feet were made after the form of a Lily; the leaves whereof bent themselves under the Table, and the Stalk seemed to be stretched out straight. The Base of the same was an hand's breadth C large, adorned with a Carbuncle in every part. The breadth thereof was eight Fingers, on which all the Plate of the Feet was itaid; and on every one of them was there engraven by curious workmanship Ivy and Vine branches laden with clusters of Grapes, so made to the life, that they seemed to be Grapes indeed. For the whole was so subtle and delicate, that when the Wind blew, the Workmanship waved and was carried up and down; so that it seemed that these Fruits were rather natural, than counterfeited by Art. The Work was made after a new Fashion, as if it consisted of three Pieces; and notwithstanding it was so well shut and closed together, that the Seams and Joyns might not any ways be seen: The thickness of the Table was no less than half a Cubit. D

See here what this was, which the King presented; wherein the price of the Stuff, the diversity and beauty of the Workmanship, and the excellency of the Engraving was very excellent; so that the richness of the Materials, and the great variety of Ornaments of this Magnificent Present, made it evident, that though this great Prince could not, for the reasons before-mentioned, make this Table larger than the former, yet he spared no Charges to make it surpass it in all other respects. He gave besides this, two Vessels of Gold, scaled from the bottom as far as the half part of the Cup; and besides that, enriched with divers precious Stones curiously incised. And in the midst of them there was a Labyrinth a Cubit high, made of all sorts of precious Stones, and at the Foot thereof were engraven Spires, after the manner of Twigs, and fast by them a certain Fold E like unto a Net, made in oval fashion, that ascended even unto the brims. The midst thereof was filled with little Targets, of the bigness of four Fingers, made of precious Stones; and round about the edges thereof were Lilies, Ivy Flowers, and Vines with their clusters of Grapes engraven round about. This was the Beauty and Excellency of those two Cups, each of them containing twenty and four Pints. There were also others made of Silver, so transparent as if they had been of the purest Chrystal, thorow which all things that were put into them, were manifestly discovered. He caused also thirty Ewers to be made, in which all the Gold that was not covered with precious Stones, was shadowed with Ivy Leaves, and Vine Branches most curiously engraven: And all these things were not only curiously wrought by the wonderful cunning of the workmen; but were in like manner seconded by an ambitious diligence of the King, who thinking it not enough that without sparing for any thing, he had undertaken the Charge, did oftentimes (forsaking his most serious Affairs) visit the Shops, and examine the Works; and that which more and more increased their diligence, was, because they saw him so intent upon the Work.

And these were the Presents which were sent by this King to be dedicated in the Temple of Jerusalem. All which being consecrated and laid up in the Temple by the High-Priest Eleazar, after he had greatly honoured those that brought them thither, and given them certain Presents to be tendered in his behalf unto the Kings, he dismissed and sent them back again. No sooner were they arrived in Alexandria, G but the King (having notice thereof, and how the seventy two Elders were come with them)

H them) he sent to seek out his Ambassadors, Andrew and Aristen, who came and presented him with Letters from the High-Priest Eleazar, and answered him to all which he demanded of them. And being desirous to communicate with the Elders that came from Jerusalem to expound and interpret the Law, he contrary to his ordinary custom and manner dismissed all those that came to him about private business, to whom he was accustomed to give Audience every fifth day; as he used monthly to Foreign Ambassadors. Having therefore for that time dismissed them, he kept those by him whom Eleazar had sent unto him; who coming to his presence (accompanied with those Presents which the High-Priest had delivered them to present unto him, with the Original wherein the Law was written in Golden Letters) he asked them I where their Books were; and they discovering and opening them, shewed them unto him. After the King had seen them, he was very much astonished, to see the Parchments so delicate, and to behold the whole form thereof so perfectly conjoined, that it was impossible to discover the Seams; and he told them that he gave them thanks, that were come unto him, and unto him that had sent them, but more especially unto God, who was the Author of these Laws. Whereupon the Elders and those that assisted them, cried out altogether, and wished that all good hap might befall the King; who through the excellent joy that he conceived, burst out into Tears; for naturally extreme Joy as well as great Grief is the cause of Tears. After he had commanded that these Books should be committed to their Trust who were deputed to that Office, at length he K saluted the Elders, telling them that it was very requisite after he should have treated with them concerning the occasion of their coming to take care of their particular entertainment. In a word, he confessed unto them, that their coming was so acceptable unto him, that he promised them so long time as he lived, he would every year renew and honour the memory of that day, (and by good hap it was the very same day wherein he overcame Antigon by Sea. His pleasure was also, that they should be his Guests, and he caused divers goodly Lodgings to be assigned them under the Castle.

Nicanor likewise, who had the charge to entertain strangers, commanded Dorothens (who was ordinarily employed in the same) to prepare for every one of them such things, as were necessary for their Diet and Entertainment. For so was it ordained L by the King, that in every City, there should be a Commissary appointed to provide for Foreigners that should come to that place, to the intent they might be treated according to their own Customs: Intending thereby, that their Entertainment should be the more agreeable unto them, and that they might be the less tired with Foreign Novelities. This Custom of his was put in practice at this time by Dorothens's Care and exact Diligence, who in his own Person disposed all that which was necessary for that Hospitality. He prepared two places to Banquet in, in two several parts (according as the King had commanded him) so that some of them might sit on either side of him and the rest might be placed near unto his Table, omitting nothing of that which concerned their honour. When they were in this manner placed, the King commanded Dorothens M to entertain them as he was wont to do those who repaired unto his Court from Judea. Hereupon he dismissed the Egyptian Priest, and others that were wont to make the ordinary Prayers; which done he commanded that one of the Elders called Eliseus (who was a Priest) should bless the Table; whereupon he standing upright in the midst of them all, besought God to bless both the King and his Subjects with all happiness. Whereupon there arose an applause and acclamation of all Men, which being ceased, they fell to their Banquet, and made good cheer with that which was set before them. When the King had kept silence so long as he thought convenient, he began at last to play the Philosopher, asking of every one of them certain questions in Physick, N answering to the question that was propounded unto them, the King took great pleasure therein, and for twelve days space he continued this Feast. Whoso desired to know the questions that were propounded unto them in particular, let them read the Book which Aristen hath written to that effect. The King was astonished at their answers, and the Philosopher Menedemus confessed that they confirmed him in his Opinion that all things were administered by Divine Providence, and that they furnished him with reasons to maintain his Sentiments. But the King protested in their presence, that their Conversation had infinitely contented and instructed him, in that by their means he had obtained the good hap to be informed by them how to govern his Kingdom. Whereupon he commanded that each of them should have three Talents given him, and that they O should be conveyed to their Lodgings. Some four days after, Demetrius took them with him, and led them over that Trench of the Sea that containeth seven Furlongs, and that Bridge which joyneth the Island to the Continent, and toward the Northern part thereof, he assigned them a Lodging remote from all noise, and fit for Contemplation; to A which place after he had brought them, he besought them, that since they had all those things which were necessary for the interpretation of their Laws, they would apply themselves unto it without any discontinuance of the Work, until they had brought it to perfection; whereupon they employed all the diligence that was possible, to the end the interpretation might be exact, intending only this from the morning until three hours after noon; after which time they employed the rest of the day in their refection; and to that end they were furnished in all abundance with all sorts of Victuals. Besides, Dorotheus presented them with a part of divers Dishes which were prepared for the King's Palace, and after they had saluted him they retired themselves to their accustomed place; and after they had washed their Hands in the Sea-Water, and were purified, they sat down in that manner to prosecute their translation. Now when the Law was fully interpreted, and the Work was finished, in the space of seventy and two days, Demetrius assembled all the Jews in that place where the Law had been translated, and caused it to be read over in the presence of the Interpreters themselves. Which done, the Assembly approved the Exposition of the Interpreters; and praised Demetrius, by whose suggestions they enjoyed so great a good. They requested likewise that this Exposition should be perused and over-read by the Nobles and Governours. After this, both the Priest, the Elders, the Interpreters, and the Magistrates of the People required, that since this Translation was so happily achieved, it might remain unaltered; so that C no joy thereof might be changed.

God's Justice upon those Ethnicks that Intermeddled with the sacred Scriptures.

Which resolution being allowed by all Men, it was ordered, that if any Man perceived any thing in that Translation, which was either exuberant or deficient, he should consider thereupon and give notice thereof, to the end it might be corrected; dealing herein very discretely, to the end that that which had once been adjudged good, should continue inviolable for ever. The King therefore was highly contented, seeing his endeavours and purpose in that behalf so happily and profitably finished; but above all things, he took pleasure in reading the Law, admiring at the profound Wisdom of the Law-maker, and began to question with Demetrius, by what means it came to pass, that neither any Poet nor Historiographer had made mention of that Law, notwithstanding that in it itself it was so admirable. To whom Demetrius gave this answer; That no Man was so hardy to touch that Work, by reason that it was Divine, and every way Venerable; assuring him also, that certain Men who had attempted to set their Hands thereto, had been punished by God; giving him to understand, how Theopompus, intending to reduce some part of that Law into his History, had ran mad for more than thirty days, and that having some intermission of his fit, he appeased God by Prayer; thereby easily conjecturing what was the cause of his Malady. Moreover, he was certified by a Vision that appeared unto him in his sleep, that this inconvenience befel him, because he had too curiously searched into Sacred and Divine matters, and had intended to communicate the same unto prophane and wicked Men, from which enterprize when he had desisted, he recovered his right wits again. He likewise insinuated further, that Theodotes the Tragick Poet, intending to make mention in some of his Poems of a certain History written in the sacred Scriptures, was stricken blind; and acknowledging the cause hereof to proceed from his audacious presumption, he was restored to his sight after he had appeased God's displeasure.

The Presents which the King bestowed upon the Interpreters, and those he sent to Eleazar.

When the King had considered on these words, according as Demetrius had discoursed them unto him, he prostrated himself on the Earth, and commanded that the Books should be carefully kept, to the end they might continue free from corruption. Furthermore, he exhorted the Translators to repair oftentimes unto him from Judea, assuring them that in so doing, the matter would redound both to their honour and profit; telling them that for that time he thought good to dismiss them; but when they should return unto him again, of their own motion, they would obtain all that which their Wisdom deserved, or Magnificence could impart unto them. This said, he gave them leave to depart, after he had given each of them three several Suits of Apparel, two Talents of Gold, and a Cup that was in value worth a Talent, and a certain Bed or curious Couch to sit and banquet upon. This gave he them for themselves; But to Eleazar the High-Priest he sent, by them, ten Couches, whose Feet were of Silver, and the Furniture answerable, and a Vessel of thirty Talents; ten Purple Robes likewise, and a magnificent Crown, and one hundred pieces of fine Linen; and besides that, he sent, by way of present, unto the Temple, Ewers, Basins, and two golden Vessels; beseeching Eleazar, by his Letters, that if any one of his Subjects had an inclination to come unto him, he would permit him, assuring him that he would highly esteem the conversation of so learned Men; and that he had Riches which he would employ with great pleasure in such affairs. Thus did Ptolemy Philadelphus esteem and honour the Jews.

T he Jews received honour likewise at the hands of the Kings of Asia, because they had born Arms under them. For Seleucus surnamed Nicator, highly respected them, and permitted them to dwell in those Cities which he built in Asia and lower Syria; and in Antioch, which was the Metropolitane chief City. Moreover he gave order, that they should be held in as great estimation, as either the Macedonians or Greeks that inhabited therein, so that even unto this day that order is continued (as it appeareth by this) for that the Jews refusing to anoint themselves with foreign Oil, do receive a certain sum of Money from the Masters of the Exercises in lieu of the Oil. Which when the People of Antioch intended to abolish, during the present War, Mutianus at that time Governour of Syria, opposed himself against them. Again, when Vespasian and his Son Titus had conquered the World, although the Alexandrians and Antiochians desired that the Privileges which the Jews enjoyed might continue no longer; yet could they not obtain it. Whereby the humanity and valour of the Romans may appear, and especially of Vespasian and Titus, that notwithstanding they had received so great trouble by the Wars of the Jews, and were so bitterly incensed against them, for that they had not, by laying down their Arms, submitted themselves, but had continued War against them to the uttermost, yet they deprived them not of their Privileges, but put a stop to that displeasure which they had long before conceived against them; and in like manner had no regard to the request of two so puissant Cities, as Alexandria and Antioch: wherefore they granted nothing in favour of them, nor ordained any thing to the prejudice of those whom they had overcome in War, so as to abolish one jot of those Privileges which they had in times past; but said that they that had resisted them by Arms, and who had been overcome, were sufficiently punished for their obduracy: and as touching those that had not committed any offence, they saw no reason to deprive them of their Rights and Privileges. We know likewise, that Marcus Agrippa was of the same opinion touching the Jews. For whereas the Ionians were seditiously bent against them, and besought Agrippa, that it might be only lawful for them to make use of the Privileges which Antiochus Seleucus's Nephew (whom the Greeks intituled by the name of God) had given them; requiring, that if the Jews were of their Blood, they might be tied to adore the same gods which the Ionians worshipped: When therefore this matter was referred to the determination of the Judges, the Jews had the better, and obtained the liberty to live according to their own Laws and Customs: and he that at this time pleaded their cause, was Nicholas Damascene. For Agrippa pronounced, That it was unlawful for them to innovate anything. And if any Man desire to have a more exact knowledge hereof, let him read the 123 and 24 Book of the Histories of Nicholas. Neither ought this judgment of Agrippa's, to seem in any sort strange; for at that time our Nation had not by any Wars procured the Romans displeasure. But upon just occasion may a Man admire the magnanimity of Vespasian, and of his Son Titus, who behaved themselves with such moderation after so great a War, and such doubtful Battels as they had fought against us. But to return to my purpose, from whence I have digressed: At such time as Antiochus the great reigned in Asia, the Country of Jewry was much harassed, and both the Jews and Inhabitants of Celsyria endured many miseries. For Antiochus making War against Ptolemy, Philopater the Jews, and his Son, called Ptolemy the famous, they were miserably perplexed. For whether Antiochus overcame, or was overcome, they were continually spoiled; so that betwixt the prosperity and adversity of Antiochus, they fared like a Ship tossed in a storm. But at length, after Antiochus had overcome Ptolemy, he conquer'd Jewry. After the death of Philopater, his Son sent a great Army into Celsyria, under the conduct of Scopas, who seized a great number of those Cities; and falling upon our Nation also, he conquer'd it. Not long after this, Antiochus fought with Scopas, near unto the River Jordan, and obtained the Victory, discomfiting the greater part of the Enemies Army; at which time Antiochus recover'd again those Cities of Celsyria, which were before taken by Scopas. He took Samaria also; which when the Jews perceived, they submitted themselves of their own accord unto him; and having received him in the City of Jerusalem, they gave both his Army and his Elephants abundance of Provision, and willingly assisted him with their Forces, to subdue those Garisons which Scopas had placed in the Fortresses of the higher City. Whereupon Antiochus supposing it to be for his honour, to acknowledge and remunerate the affection and forwardness which the Jews had expressed in his service, wrote unto his Captains and Friends, signifying unto them how forward the Jews had been in his Wars; and to let them know, that he was resolved to gratifie them for their service.

Here

Hereafter I will insert the Copy of his Letters which he wrote in favour of them, after A I have recited that which Polybius the Megalopolitane writeth, to this purpose, which I will recite out of the sixteenth Book of his Histories. Scopas (saith he) the General of Ptolemy's Army, marching towards the Mid-land, did in one Winter overcome the whole Nation of the Jews. He reciteth also in the same Book, that after that Scopas had been overcome, Antiochus seized Bathanea, Samaria, Abila, and Gadra; and anon after the Jews, which dwelt at Jerusalem where the Temple was, joyned themselves with him; and although we are to speak more amply and particularly of that apparition that hapned near unto the Temple; yet we shall defer the recital hereof until another time. This is that which Polybius hath written. But to return unto our purpose: I will recite in this place the Copy of those Letters which were sent by the King.

King Antiochus to Ptolemy, Health.

Polybius the Megalopolitane of Scopia Ptolemy's Captain. Antiochus's Epistle to Ptolemy, as touching the Liberty of the Jews.

Whereas the Jews have given us most apparent Testimony of their Affection towards us, since the first time of our entrance into their Country, and have magnificently entertained at such time as we were in Person before their City, by presenting themselves before us, with all their Elders; and have also furnished us largely with all that which was necessary for our Soldiers and our Elephants; and have likewise taken Arms with us against the Egyptian Garrison: we have thought fit to afford them some satisfaction in repairing their City, ruined by calamities, to the intent it might be inhabited and peopled again, by gathering together those Jews that are scattered abroad in divers places, and planting them again in the same. And in especial (to the end that the Service of God may be renewed) we have set down a certain sum of Money, to be employed in Sacrifices, and in buying Beasts for their Offerings, Wine, Oyl, and Incense; that is to say, twenty thousand Sicles of Silver, and for fine Flour, according to the Law of the place, one thousand four hundred and sixty Measures of Wheat, and three hundred seventy and five Measures of Salt. And my will is, that all these things that are above-mentioned, be delivered unto them according to the form of our Ordinance. We likewise command, that the work of the Temple be finished with the Galleries, and other necessary Buildings; and that all the Timber be brought out of Judea and other places, and especially out of Libanus, without any Tax or Tollage; which exemption also shall take effect in all other necessities that are requisite towards the reparation of so famous a Temple. My pleasure likewise is, that all they of the same Nation govern their State according to their own Laws. Let the ancient Priests and Scribes of the Temple also, and the singing Men be freed from all Taxations, that are payed by the Poll, and the Tributes of the Crown, and all other whatsoever. And to the end that the City may be the sooner built, I grant unto all them that inhabit the same at this present, or that hereafter transport themselves thither within the Month of October, to inhabit the same with exemption from all Charges for three Years space. We forgive them moreover the third part of their Tributes, to the intent they may recover their loss. We will also that those Citizens that have been forcibly led from thence into servitude, be set at liberty, both they themselves, and also those that are of their Alliance; commanding their Goods to be restored unto them. Farewell.

The Edit of Antiochus the Great in honour of the Temple.

These are the Contents of this Letter. And to yield the more honour unto the Temple, he sent an Edict thorow all his Kingdom to this effect.

That it should not be lawful for any Stranger, to enter within the inclosure of the Temple without the Jews permission; except those that should be purified according to the Law and Customs of the place. That no Man should bring into the City any Flesh of Horses, Mules, wild or tame Asses, Leopards, Foxes, or Hares, or generally of any Cattel prohibited to be eaten by the Laws of the Jews. That it should not be lawful likewise for any Man to bring their Skins into the City, or to nourish any such Beasts in the same, but that it might be only lawful to use those Beasts which might be sacrificed unto God, according to the Law of their Ancestors. That whosoever should not observe these Laws he should pay three thousand Drachms of Silver unto the Priests. Furthermore, to express his Piety and Fidelity towards us, at such time as he heard of the troubles that happened in Phrygia and Lydia, he wrote also unto Zeuxis Governor of one of the higher Provinces, and his intire Friend, commanding him to send certain of our Nation from Babylon to Phrygia, writing unto him unto this effect.

King G

H

King Antiochus to Zeuxis his Father, Health.

Understanding that those of Lydia and Phrygia are newly fallen into Rebellion, I have thought good (according to my duty) to prevent the same; and whilst I consulted with my Friends what was to be done, it hath been thought fit that two thousand Families of the Jews should be sent thither; all which should be drawn out of Mesopotamia and Babylon, to plant them in Garisons, and places of security. For I am persuaded of their good Affection and Zeal towards us, both in respect of their Devotion towards God, as also from the Testimony which our Predecessors have given them, namely, that they are faithful, and ready to execute that wherein they are employed. Moreover, it is our pleasure, that notwithstanding all difficulties, you cause them to pass thither, and permit them to live according to their own Laws. Now when they shall arrive in that place, thou shalt bestow on every one of them ground to build them Houses on, with sufficient Lands both for Tillage, and to plant their Vineyards in; for which they shall pay no Tribute for ten years space: and during such time as they may gather of their own for their sustenance, they shall be allowed their provision of Corn for themselves, and their Servants. Our will is also, that they who shall be employed on necessary Affairs, be sufficiently provided of that they need, to the intent that being so bountifully dealt withal by us, they may shew themselves the more affectionate in that which concerneth us. Thou shalt give order also to the uttermost of thy power, that this Nation be no ways oppressed, or injured by any Man. Farewell.

Hitherto we have sufficiently declared what friendship Antiochus the Great bear unto the Jews. After this, Antiochus contracted an Alliance and Friendship with Ptolemy, who gave him his Daughter Cleopatra in Marriage, and assigned him for her Dowry Celosyria, Samaria, Judea, and Phoenicia; and because these two Kings divided the Tributes between them, the chiefest in Authority in every Province, collected from their Country, and paid the Sum agreed upon to the King's Treasury.

At that time the Samaritans puffed up with their Prosperity, vexed the Jews, spoiling their Country, and leading them away Prisoners by force. This hapned under the High-Priest Onias. For after the decease of Eleazar, Manasse's Uncle obtained the Priesthood, and after the death of Manasse, Onias the Son of Simon, surnamed the Just, enjoyed this Dignity. Simon was Brother to Eleazar, as I have heretofore related. This Onias was of no great capacity, and withal was very covetous; by which means he failed to pay the twenty Talents of Silver which his Predecessors were wont to pay to the Kings of Egypt of that Tribute which the People paid unto him. Whereupon Ptolemy Evergeter, the Father of Philopater, was grievously incensed against him; so as he sent an Ambassador to Jerusalem to accuse him, because he failed to pay his accustomed Tribute, threatening him, that if henceforth he received it not, he would divide the Country amongst his Soldiers, and send them to inhabit it. When the Jews heard this they were much troubled; but Onias was no whit moved thereby, because he was wholly given over to covetousness.

CHAP. IV.

Joseph, the Nephew of the High-Priest Onias, obtains Pardon for his Uncle, of Ptolomy King of Egypt, gets the Favour of that Prince, and raiseth a very considerable Fortune for himself. Hircanus, the Son of Joseph, becomes a great Favourite of Ptolomy. The Death of Joseph.

The Taxation of the High-

King.

But a certain Man call'd Joseph, the Son of Tobias and of Onias Sister, who was the High-Priest, being young in years, (but honoured in Jerusalem for his Wisdom, Foresight and Justice, having certain notice by his Mother of the arrival of this Ambassador, came unto the City (for he had been absent in the Village of Pithcala, where he was born) and sharply reproved Onias his Uncle on the Mothers side, because he did not any ways provide for the security of his Country, but sought to draw his Countrymen into a general hazard, in that he retained in his Hands that Money which was levied for the Tribute, whereby he told him, that he had obtained the Government over the People, and purchased the High-Priesthood. And that if he were so bewitched with Money, that for the love of it, he could have the patience to see his Countrymen in hazard, and behold his Citizens suffer all that which Cruelty could inflict upon them, he advised him to repair to the King, and to require him to bestow the whole or the half of the Tribute upon him. Hereunto Onias answer'd, That he would no more execute the Government; and that if it was possible for him, he was ready to give over the Priesthood, rather than repair unto the King. Whereupon Joseph asked him, If he would permit him, in the Peoples behalf, to go Ambassador to Ptolomy. Whereunto Onias answer'd, That he gave him leave. Upon this occasion Joseph went up into the Temple, and summoned the People to a general Assembly, exhorting them to be no ways troubled, and to conceive no fear through the negligence of his Uncle Onias, wishing them to be of good Courage, and promising them that he himself would go Ambassador unto the King, and faithfully plead their Cause before him, and persuade him that they had committed no insolent neglect or contempt against his Majesty; which when the People understood, they gave Joseph hearty thanks. Whereupon he presently came down from the Temple, and honourably entertained the Ambassadors that came from Ptolomy, and having presented them with gifts of great value, and feasted them magnificently for many days, he sent them back to their Prince; assuring them, that he would in Person follow them. And the rather was he incited to this Journey, because the Ambassador had persuaded him to come into Egypt, under such assurance, that he would obtain all his requests at Ptolomy's hands; the rather, for that he was won with the young Man's free Spirit and noble Entertainment.

The King's

As soon as the Ambassador returned into Egypt, he certified the King of Onias's Ingratitude, and Joseph's Humanity; certifying him, that he would come in Person to entreat Pardon for the People for that Offence they had committed against him; and the rather, for that he was in especial Authority among the People; and he so far enlarged himself in the Praise of Joseph, that both the King and Queen Cleopatra had a good opinion of him, although he was yet absent. But Joseph sent unto Samaria to his Friends, and borrow'd Money, making preparation for his Voyage. Having therefore furnished himself with Apparel, Vessels and Horses, and with almost twenty thousand Drachms, he arrived at Alexandria.

At that time it happened, that the Princes and Governors of Phœnicia and Syria repaired thither to farm their Tributes; for the King was accustomed every year to sell them to the Men of most respect in every City: These meeting with Joseph on the way, began to mock at his Baseness and Poverty. But when he came to Alexandria, and had intelligence that the King was at Memphis, he set forward, and went out to meet him. When therefore the King, accompanied with the Queen, and Athenion his Friend, who had discharged the place of Ambassador in Jerusalem, came riding in his Chariot; Athenion (who had been honourably entertained by Joseph) perceiving him upon the way, certified the King that it was he of whom he had spoken upon his return from Jerusalem; protesting on his behalf, that he was a virtuous and honourable young Man. Whereupon Ptolomy received him with more Kindness than the rest, and made him come up into his Chariot; where he was no sooner seated, but the King began to accuse Onias for what he had committed. But Joseph said unto him, Pardon him, O King, and have respect to his old Age. For you know that ordinarily old Men and young Children have one and the same understanding; but from our selves who are young, you shall have what you please to require, without any pretext or cause of discontent.

This

H This wife answer increased the affection which the King had already conceived for him; whereupon he commanded that he should be lodged in his own Palace, and that daily he should accompany him at his Table.

As soon as the King came back to Alexandria, the Lords of Syria seeing Joseph sitting near unto the King, were displeased; and the day drawing near wherein they were to know what they should pay for their Tribute, they that were of the greatest quality in their Country farmed it; so that the Tributes of Cœlœsyrta, Phœnicia, Judea, and Samaria, amounted together to eight thousand Talents. Whereupon Joseph arising, blamed the Farmers, because they had designed amongst themselves to beat down the price of the Tributes, promising to give double; and that he would likewise return the forfeitures that were levied upon the Goods of such as offended; which were farmed together with the Tributes. The King gave ear to this discourse of his with great content, and said, that he approved the sale of these Tributes unto Joseph, who would hereby so considerably augment his Revenue. When therefore he was asked whether he could give Surety? he made him answer with great confidence: O King (said he) I will give thee such Pledges as are both worthy and honourable, and such as you cannot mistrust. When therefore the King desired him to produce them; I will (said he) O King, present thee for Sureties, thy self and the Queen thy Wife, that one of you may be Surety for me to the other. Ptolomy smiling hereat, granted him the farm of the Tribute, without farther Surety. This favour of his displeased those Governours of the Cities that were come into Egypt, in that they saw themselves contemned and constrained to return with shame unto their Houses. But Joseph obtained 2000 Footmen from the King, that he might by their assistance levy the Tribute from those Cities, who were negligent in their payments: And after he had borrowed five hundred Talents of the King's Friends in Alexandria, he departed into Syria.

As soon as he came to Ascalon, he demanded the payment of the Tribute at the Citizens hands, which they not only refused, but moreover upbraided him with injurious words. Whereupon laying hold on about twenty of the principal among them, he put them to death; and having gathered their Substances together, he sent the King some thousand Talents, certifying him of that which he had done. Ptolomy admiring at his Wisdom, and approving what he had done, permitted him to dispose of all things at his pleasure. The Syrians when they heard this began to fear the like severity; and perceiving that the Ascalonites were slain by Joseph, they opened their Gates, and received him willingly, and payed him their Tributes. Whereas also the Sythopolitanes contumaciously refused to lay down, according to order, their accustomed Tributes, he slew the chiefest amongst them, and sent the confiscation of their Goods unto the King. When therefore he had gathered much Silver, and made great gains of the farming of the Tributes, to the intent he might establish and make his power of longer continuance, he liberally employed his gains, considering with himself, that it was a part of Wisdom to secure his good Fortune, by those Riches which himself had gotten: For he sent many Presents both to the King and Queen, and gave liberally to their Friends and Favourites, and to all those which had any Authority or Credit in the Court, that he might win and bind them unto him by his Benevolence. And in this Felicity continued he twenty two years; during which time he was the Father of seven Children by one Wife; and of another called Hircanus, by another Wife, who was the Daughter of his Brother Solymius, whom he married upon this occasion.

Going once to Alexandria in the company of his Brother (who carried with him his Daughter already marriageable, intending to bestow her upon some Jew of good quality) whilst he sat at Meat with the King, a fair Daniel coming into the Room danced so well that he gained the Heart of Joseph, whereupon, he told his Brother of it, praying him, since by the Laws of their Country it was forbidden to a Jew to marry a stranger, that he would hide his fault, and be an assistant unto him, that he might procure her for his Mistress. His Brother promised him his assistance, and in the mean time he dressed up his own Daughter, and brought her, by night, unto his Bed; whereupon he lay with her (not knowing who she was, because he had drunk over-much) and had her company. His Love still increased, and not knowing how to conquer his Passion, he told his Brother that he feared the King would not bestow this Daniel on him. His Brother told him that he needed not trouble himself, promising that he should enjoy her whom he loved, and that already she was his Wife; letting him know the whole contrivance, and how he had rather wrong his own Daughter than so suffer his Brother to fall into dishonour. O After that Joseph had commended the kind and natural Affection of his Brother towards him, he took his Daughter to Wife, who bare him a Son called Hircanus, as it hath been said: Who being thirteen years old, gave testimony of that natural spirit, and dexterity ty that was in him; by reason whereof his Brethren conceived an hatred against him, A and the rather because he excelled them in all things, and thereby instead of gaining their love he raised their jealousy and hatred. Whereas Joseph was desirous to know which of his Children had the ripest Judgment, and Understanding; he sent them one by another to those Masters, who were most renowned for Science in that time; but all of them returned back unto him rude, and illiterate, because they were negligent and idle. Whereupon he sent Hircanus the youngest of them into a desert place, distant from the high-way some seven days journey, and gave him with him three hundred couple of Oxen, to sow the Ground in that barren place, concealing from him the Yokes that should couple them together.

When therefore he came unto the place, and perceived that the Yokes were missing, B he asked advice of some of the husbandmen; who counselled him to send some one back unto his Father to fetch the Couples. But he supposing he ought not to lose so much time as would be spent in sending back a Messenger, he made use of a contrivance which seemed much beyond his years. For he caused ten couple of the Oxen to be slain, and distributed the Flesh amongst his workmen, and made them cut the Skins, and fashion Couples thereof, and having yoked his Oxen, he caused the Land to be manured, according to his Father's direction; and afterwards returned home unto him. Whereupon he loved him the more intirely, by reason of his Wisdom and the subtlety of his Understanding; and esteemed him as if he had no other Child but him alone, but this increased the malice and envy of his Brothers.

Joseph sendeth his Son Hircanus to Ptolomy.

When news was brought unto Joseph, that about that time King Ptolomy was blessed C with a young Son, and how all the chiefest Lords of Syria, and the Countries under his obedience, repaired to Alexandria in great Pomp to celebrate the Birth-day of the King's Son; he being of himself unable (by reason of his age) to go thither, he asked his Children, whether any one of them would go and compliment the King. When therefore the eldest Sons had excused themselves, and refused to undertake the Journey, pretending they were unfit to perform the Message, and understood not the manner of living at Court, all of them advising that their Brother Hircanus might be sent: Joseph was well pleased thereat, and calling for Hircanus, asked him if he would go to King Ptolomy; he promised to undertake the Journey, and told his Father he needed no great sum of Money to perform it, because he should travel frugally, and content himself for the whole expence with ten thousand Drachms. Joseph was very glad to hear of his Sons Prudence; and after Hircanus had kept silence for a while he advised his Father, that he should not present the King with any thing out of Judea, but that he should write unto his Factor in Alexandria, commanding him to deliver such sums of Money as he thought convenient, to buy that which he found to be most Magnificent and of best esteem in the City. Joseph imagining that perhaps he would employ about ten Talents in Presents, and approving of his Son's Counsel, wrote unto his Factor Arion (who had the use of almost three thousand Talents of his in Alexandria.) For gathering up his Money in Syria, he was wont to send it thither; and as oft as the prefixt time came E wherein the King's Tributes were to be paid, he commanded Arion to pay them. Having therefore Letters of Credit unto him, he went towards Alexandria. Whereupon his Brethren wrote presently unto all the King's Friends, that by some Means they would make him away.

As soon as he was arrived in Alexandria, and had delivered his Father's Letters to Arion; Arion asked him how many Talents he would have? hoping that he would desire but ten, or thereabouts; but when Hircanus had told him ye had need of a thousand, he waxed wroth, and reproved him for his Prodigality, telling him how his Father had gathered his Goods with much Labour and Frugality, and refusing to give it him, he prayed him to imitate his Father's example; and in a word he told him, that he would deliver F him no more than ten Talents; and that for no other use, than to buy Presents for the King. Whereupon Hircanus was offended and caused Arion to be kept in Prison. Whereof his Wife informed Queen Cleopatra, and desired her that the young Man might be chastised for his insolence (for Arion was in great esteem with the Queen, so that she acquainted the King with the matter.) Whereupon Ptolomy sent for Hircanus, and said unto him; That he marvelled, that being sent unto him by his Father, he had not as yet visited him; and besides, that he had committed his Father's Agent to Prison; he therefore commanded him to yield him a reason thereof. Whereunto he answered, that there was a Law among the Jews that no Man should taste of the Sacrifices that had not first of all visited the Temple, and sacrificed unto God; and that in that respect he had not hitherto visited his Majesty, because he expected certain Presents to present unto his Majesty from his Father, who was his Servant. Furthermore, he alledged that he punished his Father's Servant, because he had disobeyed his command-

H ment, which he ought not to do, whether his Master were noble or ignoble; and if (said he) we chastise not such Men, as they have deserved, expect (O King) that you also shall be neglected by your Subjects.

When Ptolomy heard these words, he rose well pleased, and wondered at the magnanimity of the young Man. Arion perceiving that the King rose satisfied, and that he was like to have no assistance at his hands, delivered Hircanus the thousand Talents, and by this means he was set at liberty. Some three days after, Hircanus came and saluted both the King and Queen; who entertained him graciously, and feasted him, for the kindness which they bare unto his Father. He enquiring among the Merchants, bought one hundred young Lads well learned, and in the flower of their Age, paying a Talent for I each one; and the like number of Virgins for two Talents. Being invited to a Banquet by the King, with all the Princes and other Lords, he was placed beneath them all, because that (by reason of his youth) they that assigned the places, according to every Man's Dignity, made small account of him. The rest that sat at Table, after they had eaten their Meat, laid all their Bones before Hircanus, so that the Table was covered round about him; whereupon a certain Droll, called Triphon, (in whose rally the King took some delight) to divert the Company, said,

See here, Sir, what store of Bones lie before Hircanus, whereby you may conjecture after what manner his Father hath sleeved all Syria. The King laughing at Triphon's words, asked Hircanus, how he came by so many Bones before him? Not without good reason (said he) O K King; for Dogs devour the Flesh with the Bones, as these do (pointing at those who fate with him at the Table, because they had no Bones before them;) but Men eat the Flesh, and cast the Bones away, as I do, because I am a Man. The King was so well pleased with his discreet answer, that he commanded the rest not to offer him any affront for the future.

The next day he sought out all the King's Friends, and the principal Courtiers, and saluted them one by one, enquiring of their Servants, what Presents they would court the King with upon the Birth of his Son? Who told him that some of them would give twelve Talents, and others that were in Dignity, would present them according to their Ability. Whereupon Hircanus seemed dissatisfied, as wanting power to offer such a Present, pretending that he had no more than five Talents. All which these Servants L presently reported to their Masters; who were very joyful thereat, in hopes that the King would not be well pleased to receive a small present from Hircanus. Now when the day of Solemnity was come, and they that pretended to present the King most magnificently, offered no more than twenty Talents; Hircanus presented the hundred young Lads he had bought to the King, and the Virgins unto Cleopatra; for whom he had paid a Talent by the Pole. At this unexpected Magnificence, all Men were amazed: But besides this, he gave Gifts of divers Talents to the King and Queens Favourites and Servants, and their Attendants; whereby he secured himself from the danger that might fall upon him by their means. For the Brothers of Hircanus had written unto them to murder him. Ptolomy was much pleased with the great Magnificence of this young M Man, and bid him ask whatsoever he pleased at his hands. But he required no other thing, but that it would please the King to recommend him, by his Letters, to his Father and Brethren. When therefore the King had particularly honoured him, and had given him many rewards, he wrote unto his Father and Brethren, and all his Governours, and Communitaries, and in that manner sent him away. His Brothers hearing how he had in all things highly pleased the King, and that he returned with great glory, they went out to meet him, with an intent to murder him, with their Father's knowledge: For he being displeased with him, by reason of his above-mentioned large expence, took no care to secure him; yet concealed he his discontent for fear of the King. But when his Brothers came and encountered him on the way, he slew divers of those that accompanied them, and N two of his Brethren also were left slain upon the place, and the rest fled unto Jerusalem unto their Father. And when upon his coming unto Jerusalem, he perceived that no Man welcomed him, he was afraid, and departed presently from thence to the other side of Jordan, where he past his life in receiving and gathering the Tributes of the Barbarians. In that time Seleucus, surnamed Soter, the Son of Antiochus the Great, reigned in Asia. At that time also died Joseph, Hircanus's Father, who was a Man of good Repute and great Courage; who established the People of the Jews in a lasting Peace, and freed them from Poverty and many Disasters, and collected the Tributes of Syria, Phoenicia and Samaria, for the space of twenty two years. His Uncle Onias died also about the same time, leaving the Priesthood to his Son Simon; after whose death, his Son Onias was made High- O Priest; to whom Arus, King of Lacedemon, sent an Embassage and Letters, the Copy whereof hereafter ensueth.

WE have found out a certain Writing, wherein it is recorded, that the Jews and Lacedemonians are of the same Race, and both of them descended from Abraham. It is therefore requisite, that since we are Brethren, you let us know wherein we can serve you, that we may have one common Interest. Demoteles our Messenger bringeth you our Letters, written on a square Leaf, the Seal whereof is an Eagle holding a Dragon in her Talons: These were the Contents of the Lacedemonians Letters.

After the death of Joseph it came to pass, that the People began to mutiny in the quarrel of his Children; for the elder Brethren made War against Hircanus, who was the younger, by means whereof the People were divided; the greater part of them followed the elder Faction; and the High-Priest Simon also, by reason of his affinity with them, followed C their Party. Whereupon Hircanus resolved to repair no more unto Jerusalem, but fixing his habitation on the other side of Jordan, he made continual War against the Arabians, slaying a great number of them, and taking many Prisoners. He built an huge Tower of white Marble from the bottom to the top, and on it he placed the Figures of many living Creatures in Sculpture, of great height. About the same he cut a deep Trench of Water; and having hewed the front of the Rock that stood over against the Building, he made divers Caves therein, many Furlongs long. He also made divers Chambers therein, both to eat, and sleep, and dwell in. He drew thither likewise Currents of springing Water, in so great abundance, that it gave much Delight to those that dwelt there, and great Ornament to the whole Building. The mouth of every Cave was so little, that but one only Man could enter at once; which he therefore made so narrow, because they might the better serve for his security and refuge; that if so be he were at any time assailed by his Brethren, he might avoid the danger of surprisal. Moreover, he built within his Castle many large Halls, which he adorned with great and goodly Gardens: And this place thus built, was called by him Tyre, and is situate between Arabia and Judea, on the other side of Jordan, not far from the Country of Esdsou. He commanded in this Country seven years, all that time that Seleucus reigned in Syria. After whose death, his Brother Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, obtained the Kingdom. Ptolemy also King of Egypt (who was likewise called Epiphanes) died and left two Children very young behind him, of whom the eldest was called Philometer, and the younger Ptolemy. But when Hircanus perceived that Antiochus grew very powerful, he feared to be punished by him for his IncurSIONS made upon the Arabians, whereupon he slew himself with his own hands; and Antiochus enjoyed all his Goods.

Onias, surnamed Menelaus, seeing himself excluded from the High-Priesthood, retires to Antiochus, and renounceth the Religion of his Forefathers; Antiochus enters Egypt, and being ready to make himself Master of it, the Romans force him to retire.

O Nias the High-Priest being dead about this time, Antiochus gave the Priesthood to Jesus, surnamed Jason, his Brother: For that Son unto whom Onias had left the Succession, was as yet very young (of whom we will speak in convenient time and place. I This Jesus (Onias's Brother) was deprived of the Priesthood, through the King's Displeasure conceived against him, who gave it shortly after to his younger Brother called Onias: For Simon had three Sons, who, as we have declared, successively possessed the Priesthood: This Jesus caused himself to be call'd Jason, as his other Brother caused himself to be call'd Menelaus, whereas his Name was Onias. But Jesus, who had first of all been established in the place of the High-Priest, arose against Menelaus, who was elected into the place after him. So that the People were divided into Factions, and Tobias's Sons were on Menelaus's side; but the greater number of the People follow'd Jason; so that Menelaus, and the Sons of Tobias, being much troubled by them, retired to Antiochus, telling him that they intended to forsake the Religion and Ordinances of their Fathers, and to follow that of the King, and to live after the manner of the Greeks; exhorting him to give them licence to erect a place of Exercises in Jerusalem. Which when Antiochus had granted them, they so behaved themselves, that there appear'd no more sign of Circumcision in them; so that at such time as they were naked, there was no difference between them and the Greeks; and neglecting all the Ordinances and Customs of their own Country, they conform'd themselves to the Behaviour and Manners of other Nations. Antiochus having all things in his Kingdom according to his Heart's Desire, resolv'd to make War upon Egypt: He contemned Ptolemy's Sons age (who were not as yet capable to manage their Affairs). Arriving there near to Pelusium with a great Power, he circumvented, by a stratagem, the young Ptolemy Philometer, and subdu'd Egypt: For after he had besieged Memphis, and taken it, he came to Alexandria, with an intent to besiege the City, and to lay hold on the King, who was therein. But he was driven, not only from Alexandria, but also out of all Egypt, by the Summons that were sent him by the Romans, who commanded him to depart, and withdraw his Army out of that Country, as we have heretofore declared in another place. Now will I more largely and particularly discourse the Acts of this King who overcame Judea, and spoil'd the Temple: For having only made a brief mention of him in my former Works, I think it necessary in this place to make a more exact recital of his History.

CHAP. VII.

M King Antiochus being received into Jerusalem, utterly ruins it; pillageth the Temple, and builds a Citadel that commands the Town. He abolishes the Worship of God; many Jews forsake their Religion. The Samaritans disown their Relation to the Jews, and consecrate the Temple at Samaria to Jupiter.

A Fter that King Antiochus was return'd out of Egypt, and for the fear of the Romans had forsaken that Country, he led his Army against Jerusalem, and encamped before the City, and took it by surrender, the Gates of the City being left open unto him by those of his Faction; which hapned in the 143 year since the beginning of N the Reign of Seleucus. When he saw himself Lord and Master of Jerusalem, he slew divers of the contrary Faction; and after he had gather'd together many great and rich Spoils, he return'd back to Antioch. Two years after, in the 145 year of the Reign of that Family, on the 25th Day of that Month which we call Chasten, and the Macedons Apellens, the Romans December, in the 153 Olympiad, he return'd again to Jerusalem; at which time, he spared not them who gave him peaceable entrance, and opened the Gates. But his insatiable Avarice transported him so far, that he feared not to violate the Temple, and to spoil it of all those Riches which he knew to be there laid up; being no less insolent towards his Friend, than to the Offender he spared neither. For having seen what quantity of Gold was in the Temple, and how great a number of Presents and precious Ornaments were there laid up, he was so covetous, that he brake and violated all Covenants and Conditions. After therefore he had spoiled the Temple, and carried away the Vessels dedicated unto God, the golden Candlestick, the golden Altar, the

Table of the Shew-bread, the Censers, and pulled down the Curtains made of fine Linen and Scarlet. After he had emptied the Treasures that were hidden, and left nothing behind him of any value, to complicate the miseries of the Jews, he forbade them to offer their usual and daily Sacrifice unto God, according to the order of the Law: And after he had spoiled the whole City, he flew a great part of the Inhabitants, and carried away the rest of them into captivity, with their Wives and Children, to the number of 10000. Furthermore, he burnt the fairest Buildings of the City, and razed the Walls, and raised a Fortrefs in the lower City. For the Temple was as it were a high Citadel, commanding the rest. For this chuse, having inclosed it with high Walls and Towers, he placed a Garison of Macedonians therein, with whom remained the rabble and scum of the wicked Apostate Jews, who were given over to all Impieties, and who also afflicted their Fellow-Citizens with many Injuries. The King also commanded that an Altar should be erected in the Temple, on which he caused Swine to be slaughtered, offering Sacrifice contrary to the Religion and Ordinances of the Jews. He constrained them likewise to forsake the Worship of the true God, and to adore those Idols whom he revered for Gods, building in every City and Borough both Temples and Altars, on which he ordinarily caused Swine to be offered. He forbade them likewise to circumcise their Children, threatening to punish him whoever he was that was found to do the contrary. Moreover, he chose certain Overseers that should compel them to observe his Commands, so that a great number of Jews, some of their own accord, others for fear of punishment, conformed to the King's Commands. But those Men who were of upright Hearts, and valiant minds, little regarded these menaces: For having more respect to their Laws and Customs, than to the Torments wherewith they were threatened, if they observed not the Edict; they were beaten, and exposed to most cruel punishments, for many days, amidst which many times they yielded up the Ghost. For after they were whipt, and maim'd in their Bodies, they were crucify'd and tortured alive: They strangled the Women also with their circumcised Children, whom, according to the King's Command, they hung about the Necks of their Parents, who were crucify'd: And if in any place they found any part of the sacred Scripture, they defac'd and burnt it; and they with whom it was found, were put to a most cruel Death.

The Samaritans seeing this affliction of the Jews, pretended no further alliance to them, and call'd their Temple of Garazin no more the Temple of God, but (as we have heretofore declared) they shewed their own corrupt and unconstant Natures, and derived their descent from the Medes and Persians, as in effect they were; wherefore they sent Ambassadors to Antiochus, with Letters to this effect:

To King Antiochus the visible God, the Request of the Sidonians that dwell in Sichem.

Our Ancestors, enforced by the continual Pestilence that reigned in their Country, and induced by a certain ancient Superstition, have been accustomed to observe that Day as a Festival, which the Jews call their Sabbath; and having built on the Mount of Garazin a Temple, and dedicated it unto a God who hath no Name, they have offer'd up in the same divers solemn Sacrifices. But since that you have inflicted punishment on the Jews, according as their Wickedness deserved, the Commissioners of the King, supposing that we were tied to their Customs, (by reason of some Alliance between us) joyn us with them, and charge us with the same Accusations; where-as we are born Sidonians, as appeareth by our publick Records. We therefore beseech you, who are our Benefactor and Saviour, to command your Governour Apollonius, and your Steward Nicanor, not to molest us any more, by charging us with those Accusations which are peculiar to the Jews; who neither are tied to us by Alliance, nor agree with us in Customs; but that our Temple, which hath not hitherto born the Name or Title of any God, may now be called the Temple of Jupiter of Greece: By which means, we shall be deliver'd from all trouble; and being at liberty to attend our Affairs, we may the easier and more willingly pay you the greater Tributes. To this Request of the Samaritans the King answer'd, sending them back their own Letter:

King Antiochus to Nicanor, Health.

The Sidonians of Sichem have sent us this Request, to which we annex unto these our Letters: Since they, who were sent unto us to this intent, have sufficiently made appear both to us and our Council, that they are utterly strangers unto those Crimes wherewith the Jews are charged, and are desirous to live according to the Laws of the Grecians, we absolve them in as much as concerneth this Cause, and their Temple, which hereafter shall be called by the Name of Jupiter of Greece: We have written to the like effect also to Apollonius their Governour. Given the 46th Year, and the Eleventh of the Month Hecatombeon, which signifieth August.

C H A P. VIII.

Matthias and his sons they that were sent by King Antiochus to compel them to offer abominable Sacrifices, and after betake themselves to the Desert. They are followed by many others, of whom a great number are stifled in their Caves, because they would not defend themselves on the Sabbath-day. Matthias abhorreth that Superstition, and exhorts his Sons to offer their Privileges, and deliver their Country from Bondage.

At this time there dwelt a certain Man in Modin (a Village of Jury) whose name was Matthias, who was the son of John, who was the son of Simon, the son of Amnon, a Priest, of the rank of Jarib, born in Jerusalem. This Matthias had 5 sons, John call'd Gaddis, Simon call'd Matther, Judas call'd Marobabens, Elexazar named Anan, Jonathan call'd Appur. This Matthias oftentimes complain'd unto his sons, of the deplorable condition to which their Nation was reduc'd, of the ruine of their City, the desolation of their Temple, and the miseries of the People, telling them, That it were better for them to die in the defence of the Laws and Religion of their Forefathers, than to live dishonourably amidst so many Calamities. When therefore the Commissioners, deputed by the King, came unto Modin, to constrain the Jews to perform that which was enjoyn'd them, and to command them to sacrifice according to the ordinance; requiring Matthias (who surpassed the rest in Honour and other qualities, but especially in excellency of Descent and Nobility) to begin first of all to offer Sacrifice, to the end that the rest might follow him, and be induc'd by his example; assuring him, That the King would testify his being well pleased with his compliance, by the rewards which he would suddenly send him. Matthias answer'd, That he would by no means commit that Idolatry; assuring them, That although all other Nations of the World, either for Love or fear of Punishment, should obey the Edicts of Antiochus; yet that neither he, nor any of his Children, would be induc'd to forsake their Father's Religion. As soon as he had return'd this answer, he held his peace, and a certain Jew stepped forth to offer sacrifice according to Antiochus's Ordinance; wherewith Matthias was so much displeas'd, that both he and his sons fell upon him, and with their swords hew'd him in pieces. He flew Appelles the King's Captain likewise, and the Soldiers which he brought with him; to compel the People to commit Impiety. And not content herewith, he overthrowed the Altar, crying out with a loud voice, If (said he) any one be affected to the Laws of his Fathers, and the Service of God, let him follow me: And this said, he presently retir'd into the Desert with his Sons, leaving the Borough utterly unpeopled. The rest, after his example, retir'd also into the Desert, with their Wives and Children, and made their habitation in Caves. The King's Captains having intelligence hereof, gather'd those Forces that were at that time in the Citadel of Jerusalem, and pursued the Jews into the Desert. And having overtaken them, they labour'd first of all to make them submit themselves, and to make choice of that which was most for their advantage, rather than to endanger themselves, and enforce them to chastise their disobedience with Blood. But the Jews nothing mov'd herewith, resolv'd rather to die, than commit such an Impiety: Whereupon they (who omitted no opportunity) assailed the Jews on a Sabbath-day, and burnt them within their Caves; who neither resisted their Enemies, nor so much as clos'd up the mouths of their Caves, forbearing to make any resistance, by reason of the day, resolving with themselves: not to violate the Sabbath-day, (for we are commanded to cease from all labour on that day.) There were therefore about a thousand stifled in their Caves, with their Wives and Children. Yet notwithstanding divers escap'd, and joined themselves with Matthias, whom they chose for their Captains; who declared unto them, That they ought to fight on the Sabbath-day: assuring them, That if they did not, but scrupulously observed the Law, they themselves should be Enemies unto themselves, if perhaps the Enemy should assault them on that day, and they should not stand upon their guard: for by that means they should be destroyed without resistance. Hereby he persuaded them to do as he had said: and until this day, it is a custom among us, that if need require, we make no difficulty to fight on the Sabbath-day. Matthias therefore having assembled a sufficient number of Men about him, destroyed the Altars, and slew those that had forsaken their Religion, as many of old Idolatry, as he could lay hands on. For divers were scatter'd here and there among the Nations, for fear; he commanded these to circumcise their Children that were not circumcised, driving those from every place, whom Antiochus had ordain'd to see his law executed.

After that Matthias had govern'd for the space of one year, he fell sick of a dangerous Discaise; whereupon he called for his Sons, and spake unto them after this manner: My Sons, I must now go that way which is defined unto all Men; I therefore exhort you to follow my advice, and diligently to observe it, remembering the intent of your Father, who hath begot and nourish'd you; which is, to maintain the Laws of your Country, and to establish our State, which is in danger to be overthrown, and bold no correspondence with those that would betray it to the Enemy. Let it appear to all the World, that ye are my Children indeed; strengthen your hearts with Courage, to overcome all force of necessity: And assure your selves, that if you act after this manner, God will not forsake you, but taking pleasure in your virtue, he will once more bless you in your former peace and liberty, and will permit you to live again after the manner of your Ancestors. True it is, our Bodies are mortal, and subject unto destiny, but the memory of our virtuous actions will never perish: Being therefore stirred up with the love thereof, strive and bestir your selves to obtain honour, to the end that projecting mighty things, you make no difficulty to hazard your lives in the execution of the same. Above all things, I exhort you unto Concord, to the end that in whatsoever one of you shall be found more naturally apt and diligent than another, he may prosecute it without any contradiction of the rest. I charge you also to observe and obey your brother Simon (who is a politick and valiant Man) in whatsoever he shall counsel you. And for your Captain, you shall choose Machabeus, because he is both Valiant and Strong; for he shall revenge the injuries and outrages which have been done to our Nation, and put our Enemies to flight: And assure your selves, that there is no Man that hath any love to Virtue and Religion, who will not join himself unto you in so holy an enterprize.

After Matthias had thus spoken unto his Sons, and pray'd God to favour their enterprizes, and to restore the People to their ancient policy, and their accustomed manner of living, which they had in former times observ'd; he died, and was buried in Modin. After the People had mourned for him for a certain time, and perform'd publicly his funeral honours at his Funerals, as was agreeable to his quality, his son Judas Machabeus took upon him the management of the War, in the 146 year; and by the assistance of his Brethren, and other Jews, he drove the Enemies out of the Country, and put those of his own Nation to death, who had forsaken their Religion, and purged the Country of all abominations which had been committed therein.

When Apollonius, who was Antiochus's General in Samaria, heard hereof, he gathered his Army together, and invaded Judea: against whom Machabeus made head, and overcame him in a Battell, wherein there died many, and amongst the rest Apollonius, whose Sword Machabeus got as his part in the spoil. There were a great number of them also wounded, and much Booty was taken in the Enemies Camp: after which Victory, enriched with spoils, he retreated. But Seron, Governor of Calesyria, hearing hereof, and understanding that divers had joyned themselves with Judas, and that he had already about him a sufficient power to keep the Field, and give him Battell; he thought that it concern'd him to begin to punish those who obey'd not the King's Edicts. Whereupon, after he had assembled all the Forces that he had, and besides them, hired certain Apostates, or fugitive Jews, he marched forth against Judas, and came as far as Bethoron, a Village in Jewry, where he encamped. Judas also came out to meet with him, resolving to give him Battell: and seeing that his Soldiers would hardly be drawn out to fight, (both by reason of their inequality of number, as also because they were faint by fasting a long time) he encourag'd them, saying, That the means to obtain Victory, and to have the upper hand over their Enemies, consisteth not in the greatness of their number, but in their dependance upon God: whereof they had a most eminent example in their Forefathers, who had oftentimes defeated with a small number of Men, divers thousands of their Enemies, because they fought for the defence of their Laws, and for their Children: for the greatest power, (said he) that a Man can have, is to be innocent, and without offence. By these words, persuaded he his Soldiers, so that without any fear of the multitude of their Enemies, they all together ran upon Seron, and encountering with him, they discomfited the Syrians. For their Chieftain being slain, all the rest betook themselves to flight, in which thing only consisteth the safety of their lives. Judas therefore pursuing them as far as the Campaign, slew about 800 of them. The rest saved themselves in those quarters that bounded upon the Sea.

Judas Machabeus defeats a great Army which King Antiochus sent against the Jews. Lyfias the next year returns with a much greater power. Judas kills five thousand of his Men, and causeth him to retreat. He purifieth the Temple, and setteth it in order. Other great Exploits perform'd by him.

When King Antiochus heard these things, he was much displeas'd at that which had happen'd; whereupon he muster'd all his Forces, and hiring divers Strangers and mercenary Islanders, he prepar'd himself to invade Judea about the Spring-time. But after the muster of his Army, when he found that his Treasure fail'd him, and that he was in great scarcity of money, (for his Tributes were not duly paid him, because the Nations were rebellious) being likewise in his own Nature, a Man of great and magnificent Spirit, which put him upon great Expences, he resolv'd first of all to go into Persia, to gather his Tributes. He therefore left the charge of his Affairs with Lyfias, (a Man very much esteem'd by him, and one that govern'd all the Country from Euphrates, as far as the Borders of Egypt, and the lower Asia) giving him likewise a part of his Army, and some of his Elephants. To him had the King given charge to see his Son Antiochus carefully train'd up, until his return; commanding him expressly, That when he had conquer'd Judea, he should make the Inhabitants thereof his Slaves, and sell them to those that would give most, and so destroy Jerusalem, and utterly abolish that Race. The King having given this charge to Lyfias, led forth his Army towards the Country of Persia, in the 147 year: And after he had pass'd Euphrates, he march'd onward toward the upper Provinces.

Lyfias chose Ptolomy the Son of Dorymentis, Nicanor, and Gorgias, (Men of great Power and Authority amongst the King's Friends) and gave them 40000 Footmen, and 7000 Horsemen, to invade Jewry. Who marching as far as the City of Emmaus, encamp'd in the Plain near unto it, and strengthened their Army with divers Allies out of Syria, and the Countries thereabouts, and with divers Jews also who were Apostates. There came also certain Merchants with them, with an intent to buy those that should be taken Prisoners, bringing Gifts with them, to manacle those that should be captivated, and money to pay for them.

When Judas had view'd the Camp, and numbred the Enemy, he encourag'd the Soldiers, exhorting them to repose their confidence and hope of Victory in God, willing them to invoke and call upon him, according to their Law; and that cloathing themselves in sackcloth, they should humble themselves according to their accustomed manner in such extreme Dangers, and call upon God with Supplications and Prayers; and that in so doing, God would have compassion on them, and give them power to stand against their Enemies, and put them to flight. When therefore he had order'd his Battell according to the Custom of his Country, by thousands and hundreds, and sent away those that were newly married, and such as had newly bought Possessions, left the love of their Wives or Estates should abate something of their Courage, he stood up in the midst of them, and exhorted his Soldiers to fight valiantly, in these, or such-like words:

Helio & Ruf-
sim, cap. 10.
Ptolomy, Gorgias, and Nicanor's war in Judea.

My Country-men and Companions, never have we hitherto had any occasion more necessary, wherein we ought to shew our Courage, and contemn our Dangers, than at this present. For at this time, if you fight courageously, you may recover your liberty, which of it self is so acceptable unto you all, and ought the rather to be desired, because thereby you will enjoy the free exercise of your Religion. As therefore you shall behave your selves at this time, you may obtain the Victory, and enjoy a happy Life, (which consisteth in living according to our Laws and ancient Customs) but if you prove Cowards, you are to expect nothing less than the extremest Infamy, and the utter extermination of all your Race. Think therefore with your selves, that if you fight not, you must die; and, on the other side, assure your selves, that in fighting for your Liberty, for your Laws, and for Piety, you shall obtain immortal Glory. Prepare your selves therefore, that to morrow morning you may give your Enemies battell. Thus spake Judas to his Army, to encourage them.

Whilst he was intent upon the Battell, certain tydings was brought him, that Gorgias, who was sent with 10000 Horsemen, and 5000 Footmen, to the end that under the conduct of some Fugitives, he might by night, and when he least suspected him, set upon him: Whereupon he resolv'd the very same night to break into the Enemies Army, especially since he knew that their Forces were divided. Having therefore refresh'd both himself and his Army, and left a number of Fires in his Camp, he march'd all that night, and fought out the Enemy, who was at Emmaus. Gorgias perceiving that the Jews had forsaken their Camp, suppos'd they were retired for fear into the Mountains to hide themselves: So that he resolv'd to proceed, and search for them diligently. But early in the morning, A Judas, accompanied with 3000 Men, (who were illarm'd by reason of their Poverty) came up unto his Enemies, who were at Emmaus; and after he had seen their warlike Discipline, and mighty number, and how Soldier-like they were encamped, he exhorted his Followers, telling them, That they ought to fight, although they were naked; for although they were in that condition, yet God (who took pleasure in the greatness of their Courage) had already given them the Victory against a number of armed Soldiers. And forthwith he commanded the Trumpets to sound; so that rushing in upon his Enemies on the sudden, the surprize and astonishment was so great, that he slew divers of them who resist'd, and put the rest to flight; he pursu'd them as far as Gadara, and the Plains of Idumaea, of Azor, and of Jamnia. In this Encounter there died about 3000 of the Enemy. Notwithstand- B ing, Judas would not permit his Soldiers as yet to take the benefit of the spoil, because they were to fight against Gorgias and his Army, assuring them, That as soon as they should have defeated him, they might take their Booty, without fear, because they should have no more Enemies to expect.

Whilst he thus spake unto his Soldiers, they that were with Gorgias, perceived from the top of an Hill, that the Army that was left behind them, was put to flight, and that their Camp was on fire: For although they were far off, yet did the smoke assure them of it. Which when they understood, and perceiv'd Judas and his Fellows in battel aray, expecting their coming, they fear'd, and betook themselves to flight. When as therefore Judas perceiv'd that Gorgias's Troops were discomfited, without stroke stricken, he went C up to gather the pillage; and after he had gotten together great store of Gold, Silver, Scarlet, and Purple, he returned to his Quarters with joy, praising God for their happy success: For this Victory did not a little advantage them, towards the attainment of their liberty. But Lysias, to repair the Dishonour which he had suffer'd by this Defeat, rais'd the next Year another Army of almost 60000 chosen Men, and 5000 Horsemen, to invade Judaea. After he had therefore made his entry by the Mountains, he encamped in Beth- Jura, a Village of Judaea.

Judas having notice thereof, came forth against him, accompanied with 10000 Men; and discovering the number of his Enemies far to exceed his, (after he had besought God by Prayer, That it would please him to assist him in the battel) he charged the Van- guard of the Enemy with so great Courage, that he discomfited them, and slew about 5000, leaving the rest in great fear. Lysias knowing the resolution of the Jews, and how they were resolv'd to die, except they might enjoy their Liberty; and fearing their despera- tion, more than their force, he gather'd together the rest of his Army, and returned back to Antioch, where he sojourn'd, hiring many foreign Soldiers, to make a greater Army to invade Jewry. After that Antiochus's Captains had been discomfited so many times, Judas assembled the People together, and told them, That after they had obtained so many D Victories through the mercy of God, it behoved them to go up to Jerusalem, and to purify the Temple that was left desolate, and to offer those Sacrifices ordained by the Law. When he came thither with a multitude of People, he found the Temple like a Desert, and the Gates thereof burnt, and Grass growing within it; so great a Desolation drew Sighs from his Heart, and he wept with all those that accompanied him: And having chosen out certain of his best Soldiers, he commanded them to assault the Garison that were in the Fort- tress, whiles he himself purged the Temple. Which Command of his being exactly and resolutely fulfilled, he sent for new Vessels, a Candlestick, a Table, and Altar of Incense, all made of Gold. He put also Veils or Hangings to the Doors, accustomed to be spread abroad, and made Gates to the Temple. And having thrown down the Altar of Burnt- Offerings, which had been prophand by Antiochus, he built a new one of all sorts of Stones, neither hewn, nor hammer'd, according to art. The 25 Day of the Month of Chashlev, (with us September) there were Lights set upon the Candlesticks, and Perfumes laid upon the Altar, and Loaves upon the Table, and Sacrifices offered upon the new Altar. All which hapned the same Day three Years, wherein the sacred Religion was changed into prophaneness and impiety. For the Temple was ruinat'd and left desolate by Antiochus, and remained in that state for the space of three whole Years. For this desolation hapned in the 145th Year, and the 25th Day of the Month call'd Apellars, or August, in the 152 Olympiad; and the Temple was purified the same Day, in the Year 148, and the 154 Olympiad. This Desolation of the Temple hapned, according as Daniel had foretold, four hundred and eight Years before; for he declared that the Macedonians should destroy it.

After that Judas had re-establish'd the Service of the Temple, both he and his Coun- G try-men solemniz'd a Feast for eight Days, omitting not any kind of lawful Pleasure, banquetting sumptuously, and honouring God in Hymns and Psalms. Thus rejoiced they

H at this re-establishment, seeing that contrary to all hope, after so long time, they had re- cover'd the Customs of their Country, and their ancient Religion: So that a Decree was made for those that should come after, whereby it was commanded, That for the space of before Christ's eight Days, the rebuilding of the Temple should be solemniz'd, with the Ceremonies and ancient Ordinances. And ever since that time, until this Day, we celebrate this Feast, call'd the Fest of Lights, for this Reason, in my Opinion, because this so great Felicity began to shine unto us as a Light, contrary to all hope. He enclosed the City likewise with a Wall, and built high Towers thereon, in which he placed Garisons against the Incurfions of the En- mies. He fortified the City of Bethsura also, that it might serve as a Fort against the Enemy.

I Whilst these things pass'd thus, the Nations round about displeased with the re-esta- blishment and power of the Jews, slew divers of them, whom they surpriz'd by Ambushes and Treachery. On those Judas made continual War, to hinder their Incurfions, and to make them partakers of those Evils they had inflicted upon the Jews. So that invading Acrabathan, he slew the Idumeans that were defend'd from Esau, and brought away a great Prey out of their Country, and shut up the Sons of Baan their Prince, who lay in wait for the Jews; and having besieg'd them, he overcame them, setting fire on their Towers, and killing all the Men that were therein. After this, he departed from thence, and made War upon the Ammonites, who had a great and mighty Army, under the Con- duct of Timotheus: These he encounter'd and overcame, and took their City of Jazor, K and burnt it, and led away their Wives and Children into Captivity, and afterwards re- turned unto Judaea. The Neighbouring Nations hearing of this, assembled themselves to- gether in Galaad against the Jews, who inhabited the Frontiers of Galaad; who having retired to the Fort of Dathema, sent Letters unto Judas, to let him know, That Timotheus intended to surprize the place wherunto they were retir'd, and requested him to deliver them from this Danger. And whilst he was reading of these Letters, certain Messengers came unto him out of Galilee, to inform him, that they were assaulted by the Inhabitants of Ptolomais, Tyre, Sidon, and other People thereabouts.

L C H A P. XII.

The Exploits of Simon the Brother of Judas Machabees in Galilee. Judas, accompanied with Jonathan his Brother, obtaineth a Victory over the Ammonites. Some other Performances of Judas.

JUDAS, that he might send relief to these two Parties that were assaulted both at the same time, commanded his Brother Simon to take 3000 chosen men with him, and to go and succour those Jews that were assail'd in Galilee: And himself, accompanied with Jonathan his other Brother, and 8000 fighting men, repaired unto the Country of Ga- laad, leaving the Government of the rest of the Forces in the hands of Joseph the Son of M Zachary, and Azarias, commanding them to have a careful and diligent eye to Judaea, and not to engage with any one until his return. Simon coming into Galilee, fought against his Simm over- Enemies, and discomfited them; and afterwards pursuing them that fled as far as the cometh his Enemies in Gates of Ptolomais, he slew about 3000: And after he had gather'd the Spoils of such as Galilee, deliv- ered the Jews that were slain, he set many Jews at liberty who were Prisoners; and having restor'd them to their Goods, he retir'd back again to his Country. But Judas Machabees, and Jonathan were captive, his Brother, having pass'd Jordan, and march'd on the other side thereof for the space of Judas and Jo- three Days, came at length to the Nabatheans, who peaceable came out to meet them, Nathan succour by whom he understood the state of those that were in Galaad, and how divers of them were in extrem want, inclosed and besieg'd in Castles and Cities of the Country by N their Enemies. These likewise besought him to make haste, and encounter the strangers, and to seek the means to save their Country-men. Hereupon he returned into the De- Bofra taken fart, and first of all assail'd the Inhabitants of Bofra, and took their City, and set it on fire, killing all the men that were therein, who were able to bear Arms. Neither was he contented therewith, but when night drew on, he march'd towards another Castle where the Jews were inclosed, and shut up by Timothy and his Army; and coming up to them about break of Day, he surpriz'd the Enemy at such time as they were raising their Lad- ders to scale the Walls, and made ready their Engines for battery: Whereupon he caus'd the Trumpets to sound, and after he had encouraged his People to fight valiantly and faithfully for their Kinsmen and Friends, being in great danger, and had distributed his Judas suc- Forces into three Battalions, he set upon the Enemies rearward. Timotheus's Soldiers per- ceiving that it was Machabees, whose Valour and good Fortune they had already experi- enced to their great loss, they, without delay, betook themselves to flight. But Judas, with his his Army, follow'd after them, and slew about 8000 of them; and marching toward A Millas, (a City of the Enemies) he surpriz'd it, and slew all the Men therein, and afterwards confum'd it with fire. After this, departing thence, he took and destroy'd Chaspoma, Bozair, and divers other places in Galaad.

Shortly after, Timothy levy'd another great Army, and drew out with him all his Allies to his succour, and a number of Arabians, whom he had hired: With this Army of his pass'd he the River, and encamp'd near unto a Town call'd Repbas; exhorting his Soldiers to behave themselves like valiant Men against their Enemies the Jews, and to hinder their passage, because all their hopes of Victory depended upon the securing of that Pass. Judas understanding that Timotheus was prepar'd to fight, took with him all his Forces, and march'd hastily against the Enemy; so that having pass'd the River, he set upon them, killing divers of them that resist'd; and terrifying the rest, who casting away their Arms, were constrain'd to flee. There were some of them who sav'd themselves by their swiftness, and some by retreating into a Temple call'd Carnain, where they were in hope to be secur'd, and so to escape: But after that Judas had taken the City where the Temple was, he slew them, and caus'd all his Enemies to perish either by the Sword, or by Fire. After this overthrow, he led away with him from Galaad all the Jews, their Wives and Children, and Substante, and brought them with him unto Judea. When as therefore he drew near unto the Town of Ephron, which was situate directly in his way, so that it was impossible for him to march any other ways in his return home, without going very much about, and putting himself to great Inconveniencies; he sent Messengers to the Inhabitants to pray them to open their Gates, and to grant them free passage through their City; for they had made Baracado's of Stones to cut off the passage. But when therefore the Ephronites would give no ear unto him, he besieg'd their City for a Day and Night's space, and took and burnt it, and slew all the Men that were therein, and afterwards went onward on his way; and so great a number was there of those that were slain, that he march'd upon the Bodies of dead Men.

After they had pass'd Jordan, they came into a great Plain, wherein the City of Bethshan (by the Greeks call'd Scythopolis) stood; from whence they departed, and came into Judea with joy and gladness, singing and praising God, and using their accustom'd Pastimes and Songs of Victory. This done, he offer'd up Sacrifices of Thanksgiving for their happy success, and the safety of his Army; especially since in all those Battels and Encounters he had not lost one Jew.

In the mean while, two Captains, to wit, Joseph the Son of Zachary, and Azarias, who were left for the guard of Judea, (whilst Simon went into the Country of Galilee against those of Ptolomais, and Judas and Jonathan his Brother were in Galaad against the Ammonites) desirous also to obtain the Honour and Reputation of valiant Men by some notable Exploit, march'd with the Forces under their command towards Jamnia. Against these came forth Gorgias, who was Governour in that place, and charg'd them in that manner, that the Jews lost 2000 Men, and fled as far as the Marches of Judea. This mischief fell upon them, because they had disobey'd Judas's Commandment, who had prohibited them to fight with any before his return. And this gives us just cause more and more to admire the Providence and excellent Conduct of this great Captain of the Jews. Judas and his Brethren making War against the Idumeans, gave them no respite, but continually charging them on every side, they took also the City of Chebron, and destroy'd all the Fortifications thereof, and burnt the Towers, spoiling all the Country of the Enemies, and razed the City of Marissa likewise. Afterwards coming to Azor, they took and spoil'd it, and carried away a great quantity of Booty from thence, and return'd back into Judea in safety.

CHAP. XIII.

King Antiochus Epiphanes being forced shamefully to raise his Siege from before Elymais a Town in Persia, (where he designed to pillage a Temple consecrated to Diana) and troubled for the defeat of several of his Captains which he sent against the Jews, dyeth for Grief.

At this time Antiochus passing through the upper Provinces of his Kingdom, understood that there was a very wealthy City in Persia called Elymais, in which there was a Temple dedicated to Diana, full of all sorts of Presents: wherein also he was inform'd, that the Shield and Cuirass of Alexander was kept, who was Philip, King of Macedonia's Son. Hereupon he resolv'd to make himself Master of the place, and forthwith besieg'd it. And the Inhabitants thereof being neither affrighted with his approach, nor terrified with his Siege, made a stout resistance, so that he fail'd of his purpose. For they drove him from their City; and falling out upon him, they pursu'd him so hotly, that he fled back to Babylon, and lost a great number of his Men. After this defeat and frustration of his hope, news was brought him of the overthrow of his Captains, whom he had left to War against the Jews, and how they of Jews were now the stronger, and had the upper-hand. This trouble seconding his former discontent, touch'd him so nearly, that he fell sick; and his disease, aggravated with other accidents, increasing, he knew well that he should die: and therefore he call'd for his most familiar friends, and told them, That his sickness was violent and desperate, and that he deserv'd this affliction, because he had persecuted the people of the Jews, and destroy'd their Temple, committed horrid Sacrilege, and contemn'd that God which they ador'd: And whilst he thus spake unto them, he gave up the Ghost. So that I wonder at Polybius the Megalopolitane, (who is in other things a good Historian) who writeth, That Antiochus died, because he would have spoiled the Temple of Diana in the Country of Persia. For since he had only intended to commit Sacrilege, but had not effected it, he merited not to suffer punishment for it. And if it seemeth good unto Polybius, that Antiochus was punished by death upon this occasion; it is far more likely to be true, that his death befel him for the Sacrilege he had committed in the Temple of Jerusalem. But our purpose is not to argue against those that maintain that Polybius's reasons are of greater truth and consequence than ours are.

CHAP. XIV.

Antiochus Eupator succeeds his father Epiphanes. Judas Machabeus lays Siege to the Citadel at Jerusalem. Antiochus comes against him with a great Army, and besiegeth Bethsura; they both raise their Sieges, and come to a pitched Battel. The wonderful courage, and the death of Eleazar, one of the Brothers of Judas. Antiochus takes Bethsura, and besiegeth the Temple of Jerusalem; but when the Jews were reduced to the greatest extremity, he raiseth the Siege upon the news that was brought him of Philip's having caused himself to be proclaimed King of Persia.

Before Antiochus gave up the Ghost, he call'd for Philip, one of his chief friends, and made him Governor of his Kingdom. And having deliver'd his Diadem into his hands, his Royal Robe, and his Ring and Jewels, he charg'd him to deliver them to his Son Antiochus, entreating him to take care of his education, and to secure the Kingdom for him, until he came to years of discretion. This done, Antiochus died the 149 year of the Kingdom of Syria. After that Lysias had certifi'd the People of the King's death, he proclaim'd his son Antiochus (whom at that time he had in his protection) King, signing him Eupator, (according to the instructions that were given him.) About that time, the Garifon and Apostates that were in the Fortresses of Jerusalem, did much mischief unto the Jews. For setting upon them that went up to the Temple to worship and offer Sacrifice, they slew them: for the Fortresses commanded the Temple. For this cause, Judas resolv'd to cut off these Garifons, and to that intent he assembled all the People, and besieg'd it. This enterprize was undertook in the year 150, after that Seleucus had usurped the Government of those Countries. Having therefore made him certain Engines and rais'd divers Platforms, he industriously continued the Siege: But divers of those Apostates that were revolted, and of that Garifon, came out by night, and assembling together such Men as were as malicious as themselves, they came unto King Antiochus, beseeching the Citadel.

feeching him, That he would not suffer them to be abused by those of our Nation; nor to be neglected by him, since their Sufferings preceaded only from their having devoted themselves to his Father's Service; for whose sake they had forsaken their own Religion, and follow'd his Laws and Ordinances. Furthermore they told him, That the Fortres was in danger to be surprized by Judas and his Associates, except some present succors were sent unto them. When Antiochus the younger had notice hereof, he was displeased, and sent for his Captains and Friends, commanding them to hire Strangers, and to list all those in his Kingdom that were of years to bear Arms; so that he gather'd in short time an Army of 100000 Foot, and 20000 Horse, and 32 Elephants; and with this Equipage march'd out of Antioch, committing his Army to Lycias. As soon as he came into Idumæa, he went up unto Bethsura, a walled City, and very difficult to be taken, which he besieged: but with such a disadvantage, that the Bethsuriens resisting him valiantly, and slaying out upon him, burnt those Engines which he had prepar'd for the Battery of the Town. When therefore a long time was consumed about the Siege, Judas having intelligence of the King's approach, raised his Camp from before the Cattle of Jerusalem, and marching forward to meet the Enemy, he encamped in a certain freight, in a place call'd Beth-zacharia, about 70 furlongs from the Enemy.

The King having notice thereof, raised his Siege from Bethsura, and march'd toward the freight where Judas's Army was encamped, and about the Morning he fet his Soldiers in battel array. He first of all caus'd his Elephants to march one after another through the freight, for that it was impossible for them to march in a square body. About every Elephant were 1000 footmen and 500 horsemen. These Elephants bare high Towers on their backs, fill'd with Archers. The rest of his Forces he caus'd to march two several ways by the Mountains, under the conduct of his most trusty Friends, commanding them to charge their Enemies with a great shout, and to discover their golden and brazen Bucklers, to the end the reflection thereof might dazzle the eyes of the Jews: whereupon the Mountains resounded with the fearful cries of Antiochus's Army; yet was not Judas any ways discourag'd at it. For receiving the Charge with a great Courage, he flew almost 600 of the Forlorn Hope. But Eleazar surnam'd Auran, Judas's Brother, seeing a huge Elephant among the rest, with trappings somewhat extraordinary, and supposing that the King was mounted thereon, he made towards him with a mighty Courage; and after he had slain divers of those that ironed the Elephant, and scatter'd the rest, he thrust his Sword into the belly of the Beast, and wounded him to death; but the Elephant falling upon Eleazar, slew him with his weight: and thus honourably died this worthy Man, after that he had slain a great number of his Enemies, and fold his Life at a dear rate. Judas seeing his Enemies Forces so great in number, retir'd back to Jerusalem to continue his Siege; and Antiochus sent part of his Army to Bethsura to take it, and with the rest he himself march'd toward Jerusalem.

King Antiochus Eupator makes peace with the Jews, but, contrary to his Promise, he demolisheth the Wall that encompassed the Temple. He cuts off the Head of the High-Priest Onias surnam'd Menelaus, and confers that Honour upon Alcim. Onias the Nephew of Menelaus retires into Egypt, where the King and Queen Cleopatra his Wife, permit him to build a Temple at Heliopolis, in imitation of that at Jerusalem.

IN pursuance of this Resolution, King Antiochus sent a Herald to Judas, and those that were besieged with him, promising them peace, with permission to live according to their Religion. Which Conditions they willingly embrac'd; and having taken an Oath of Assurance from the King, they surrender'd up the Temple. Whereupon Antiochus entered into it, and seeing it to be a place so well fortify'd, he, contrary to his Oath, commanded his Army to level the Wall that environ'd it even with the Ground: Which done, he return'd to Antioch, leading away with him the High-Priest Onias, who was call'd Menelaus. For Lycias had counselled the King to murder Menelaus, if he intended that the Jews should live in peace; and the rather, because it was he only who was the Author of all those Evils, by reason of the Counsel he had given to Antiochus his Father, to enforce the Jews to forsake their Religion. The King for that cause sent Menelaus unto Borsada, a City of Syria, where he commanded him to be put to death, after he had enjoy'd the High-Priesthood ten years. He was a wicked Man, and to raise himself to that great Honour and Authority, had caus'd several of our Nation to violate our most holy Laws: As long therefore as Menelaus was dead, Alcim was made High-Priest, who was call'd Jucimus. Now when Antiochus found that Philip had already conquer'd a great part of his Country, he fought with him, and taking him Prisoner, he put him to death. But Onias the Son of the High-Priest, (whom, as we have heretofore declared, was left an Orphan in his infancy) seeing that the King had slain his Uncle Menelaus, and given the Priesthood to Alcim, who was not of the Race of the Priests, and had transferred this Honour into another Family at the persuasion of Lycias, he fled unto Ptolomy King of Egypt, where being honourably entertain'd by the King and his Queen Cleopatra, he obtain'd a place at Heliopolis, where he built a Temple like unto that which was at Jerusalem; whereof we shall hereafter have a more fit opportunity to speak.

Demetrius the Son of Seleucus, escapes from Rome, comes into Syria, and causeth himself to be crown'd King, and puts to death King Antiochus and Lycias. He sends Bacchides with an Army into Judea, to exterminate Judas and his Party, and to establish Alcim in the High-Priesthood; he proceeds with great cruelty, but Judas compels him to retire to Demetrius for fresh supplies.

AT that time Demetrius the Son of Seleucus fled from Rome, and took possession of Heliopolis in Syria; and after he had set the Diadem upon his own Head, and had levied and hired certain Souldiers, he invaded the Kingdom, where he was receiv'd to the general content of all Men, who submitting themselves unto him, laid hold on the King Antiochus and Lycias, and brought them alive unto him; but he forthwith commanded that they should be put to death, after that Antiochus had reigned two years. To this new-elected King, divers Jews, (banish'd for their Impiety) and with them the High-Priest Alcim resorted; who in general accus'd their own Nation, and principally Judas and his Brethren, objecting against them, that they had slain his Friends, and all such as were on his side; and that among all those that were in the Kingdom, and expected his coming, some of them were slain; and the rest being driven from their native Country, were banish'd into other places: Wherefore he desired him that he would send some one of his Friends to take notice of the Outrages committed by Judas and his Brethren. Demetrius was much moved by these Reports, and for that cause sent Bacchides (who was in times past much esteem'd by Antiochus Epiphanes for his Valour, and to whose Government at that time all Mesopotamia was committed:) To whom he gave an Army, joining with him the High Priest Alcim, with Commission to kill Judas and his Confederates. Bacchides departing from Antioch with his Army, came into Judea, and sent an Herald unto Judas and his Brethren, to treat with him upon certain Articles of Peace, because his intent was to surprize them by some treachery. he intended no Peace, but to make War: Notwithstanding, some of the People gave ear unto the peaceable Proclamation of Bacchides; and supposing that there was no ill Design in Alcim, who was their Country-man, they submitted themselves unto his Government. And having receiv'd an Oath from them both, That neither they, nor any of their Followers, should any ways be endangered by them; they committed themselves to their protection. But Bacchides setting light by his Oath, slew 60 of them; and by this breach of his Faith towards these, he caused others (who intended to submit themselves) to forsake and flee from his Government. As soon as therefore he had removed his Army from Jerusalem, he came unto the Village of Bethsabee, and there apprehending many of those which had fled, and some others among the People, he slew them all, commanding all those that liv'd in the Country to obey Alcim, to whom he left in that place, for the guard of his Person, a part of his Army: And that done, he return'd unto Antioch to King Demetrius. In the mean while Alcim intending to secure his Government; and supposing that it would be so much the better confirm'd, if he could obtain the Good-will of the People; he us'd all kind of plausible and familiar speech unto them; and conversing with every Man pleasantly and graciously, he joy'n'd in a short time great Forces to those which he had before: Amongst whom, there were many Fugitives and ungodly Men, by whose help and assistance he march'd through the Country, killing all those whom he found to be of Judas's Faction. Judas perceiving that Alcim having gather'd great Forces, had already slain divers of the most worthy Men, and such as fear'd God, he prepar'd himself also to over-run the Country, and slew as many of Alcim's Party as he could meet with. At length finding that he alone was unable to stand against Judas, he thought fit to seek after the Assistance of Demetrius. For which cause, he repair'd to Antioch, and incens'd Demetrius exceedingly against Judas, accusing him for offering many Injuries unto him, protesting that he should suffer many more, except he were prevented and punish'd by a good Army sent out against him.

CHAP. XVII.

Demetrius, at the instance of Alcim, sends Nicanor with a great Army against Judas Machabeus, whom he endeavours to surprize. They come to a Battel, and Nicanor is slain. The death of Alcim, by a most remarkable piece of Divine Vengeance. Judas is made High-Priest in his place, and enters in an Alliance with the Romans.

Demetrius imagining, that if Judas should increase in power, it would be some prejudice to his state, sent Nicanor his most faithful Friend, to make War against him; (who was one of them who accompanied him in his flight from Rome). And having furnish'd him with a sufficient Army, and able to make head against Judas, he commanded him to spare no one of that Nation. When Nicanor came to Jerusalem, he would not proclaim an open War against Judas, but design'd to surprize him by some subtilty: To this intent he sent him a peaceable Message, telling him, That he knew no reason why he should engage himself in the Dangers of a tedious War, since he was ready to assure him with an Oath, that he would offer him no injury; and that he came thither with his Friends, only to express the good affection of the King Demetrius towards him, and his kindness to the Nation of the Jews. Judas and his Brethren believ'd this Delusion of Nicanor, and suspecting no harm, they gave credit to him, and entertain'd both him and his Army. When therefore Nicanor had lulled Judas, he conferr'd with him, and in the mean while gave a sign unto his Soldiers to lay hands on him; who perceiving his Treason, brake from him, and fled unto his Soldiers. When Nicanor saw that his Intentions were discover'd, he resolv'd to make open War upon Judas, and to give him Battel near unto a Borough call'd Capharsalama, in which place obtaining the Victory, he constrain'd Judas to retreat into the Fortrefs at Jerusalem. On a certain Day when Nicanor came down from the Fortrefs, and went towards the Temple at Jerusalem, certain of the Priests and Elders went out to meet him, and after they had done their reverence, they shew'd him those Sacrifices, which (as they said) they intended to offer unto God for the King's Prosperity and Health. But he blaspheming, threatened them, That if the People did not deliver Judas into his hands, he would destroy the Temple upon his return. And with these menaces he departed out of the City. Which, when the Priests heard, they wept bitterly, and intreated God, That it might please him to defend his sacred Temple, together with those which called on his Name therein, from the violence and outrage of their Enemies.

Nicanor threatneth the People, that except they yield up Judas, he will destroy the Temple.

Nicanor departed from Jerusalem, and came unto Bethoron, and encamped there, where he receiv'd great Supplies of Soldiers which came unto him out of Syria. Now Judas was encamped in another Village call'd Adas, about 30 Furlongs distant from Bethoron, having having with him at the most not above 100 Men. Notwithstanding he exhorted his Soldiers not to be afraid of the Multitude of their Enemies; nor so much to consider against how many they were to fight, as against whom, and for what recompence, to the intent they might altogether courageously set upon the Enemy, at such time as he should lead them forth to Battel: Whereupon assailing Nicanor, there arose a dangerous Conflict between them, wherein Judas had the better; for he slew a great number of the Enemy: And finally, Nicanor himself fighting courageously, was slain; and as soon as he fell, his Army betook themselves to flight. For having lost their Captain, they dispersed themselves, and cast away their Weapons: Judas speedily pursuing them, made a great slaughter, and by sound of Trumpet, certified those of the Neighbouring Villages, That he had discomfited the Enemy. Whereupon the Inhabitants betook themselves to their weapons, and meeting with those that fled, they slew them, so that not one escaped from this Battel, although the Syrian Army consisted of 9000 Men. This Victory hapned on the 13th day of the Month Adar, as our Country-men call it, and the Macedonians Disfre: Adas, Much. And hereof each year there is a solemn Feast and Memorial observed. From this time forward, the Nation of the Jews were in quiet without any Invasion, and lived in Peace for a little time; but afterwards they were troubled with the like Incurfions. Whereas which had been built by the holy Prophets, he was suddenly stricken by God; so that dieth. he lost his Speech, and fell to the ground; and after he had endured many torments, at last he died miserably, after he had enjoyed the Priesthood for the space of four years.

After his death, the People with a general consent, conferred that Office upon Judas; who hearing of the great Power of the Romans, and how they had conquer'd Gaul, Spain, Carthage, Greece, and the Kings Perseus and Philip; and besides all these, the great King Antiochus, he resolv'd to procure their Friendship, and to that purpose he sent Eupolemus the Son of John, and Jafon the Son of Eleeazar, his two most intimate Friends, unto Rome, to entreat the Romans to be their Allies and Confederates, and to write unto Demetrius, That he should forbear to make War against the Jews. When the Ambassadors that were sent from Judas were arrived at Rome, the Senate received them; and after they had discoursed with them upon the occasion of their coming, they accepted their Alliance, and made a Decree, the Copy whereof was then brought into Judea, and the Original reserved in the Capitol, engraven on a Table of Brass. Which Decree of the Romans, concerning their Alliance with the Jews, contained these Articles:

That no Man under the obedience of the Romans, should maintain War against the Nation of the Jews; nor should furnish them with Victuals, Ships, or Money, that should make War against them. And if any Enemies should assail the Jews, the Romans should give them Succor to the utmost of their Power: And that likewise if any one should make War against the Romans, the Jews should succor them. That if the Jewish Nation would add or diminish any thing of that Association, it should be done with the common advice of the People of Rome; and that that which should be ordain'd, should remain irrevocable.

This Copy was written by Eupolemus the Son of John, and by Jafon the Son of Eleeazar, at such time as Judas was High-Priest, and his Brother Simon General over the Army. Thus the first Amity and Alliance was contracted between the Romans and the Jews.

CHAP. XVIII.

King Demetrius sends Bacchides with a new Army against Judas Machabeus, who resolves to give him Battel, although he had but 800 Men.

When Nicanor's death, and the defeat of his Army was told Demetrius, he sent a new Army into Judea, under the Conduct of Bacchides; who departing from Antioch, and coming to Judea, encamped in Arbela a City of Galilee; where having taken captive a great number of those that were retir'd unto Caves, he departed from thence, and went to Jerusalem. And understanding that Judas was encamped in the Village of Bethsabee, he march'd out against him with 20000 Foot, and 2000 Horse. Judas had not far on his side in all above 2000 Men, the greater part whereof being afraid of the numerous Army of the Syrians, forsook their Camp, and fled away; by which means there remained no more with Judas, than 800 Men. He seeing himself abandoned by so many of his Men, and press'd by his Enemies, who gave him no time to reinforce his Army, he resolv'd to engage with those 800 which remained, whom he exhorted to be of good courage, and to fight valiantly; but they answer'd, That they were not able to make head against so great an Army, and counsel'd him to retire, and stand on his guard for that time, until he had gather'd Forces that might be able to face the Enemy. But Judas replied plied to this effect: God forbid (said he) that the Sun should see me turn my back upon A mine Enemies. And if by this means I meet with my death, and that I must needs spend my last Blood in this Battel, I will never fully so manly achieve, nor diminish that Glory which I have obtained, by one Ignominious fight. And having in this manner exhorted the small remnant of those Soldiers that were with him, he commanded them that without any apprehension of danger, they should make head against the Enemy.

C H A P. XIX.

Judas Macchabeus with 800 Men, engageth against the whole Army of Demetrius. He is slain, after he had performed Actions almost incredible. His praise.

Bacchides disposeth his Army, and fighteth with Judas. Bacchides drew out his Army, and ranged them in Battel, placing the Horsemen on both the Wings, his light-armed Soldiers and Archers in the Front of the Army, and after these a strong Band, called the Macedonian Phalanx; and he himself led the right Wing of the Battel. And in this Array he approached Judas's Camp, and caused the Trumpets to be sounded, commanding his Soldiers to give a great shout, and to charge their Enemies. Judas did the like, and encountred Bacchides; so that on both sides there was a most cruel Conflict, which continued until the Sun-set. And when Judas perceiv'd that Bacchides, and the flower of his Army fought in the right Wing, he chose out a certain number of his most resolute Soldiers, and drew towards that Quarter, and setting C upon them, he brake their Squadron; and afterwards thrusting into the midst of them, he forced them to fly, and pursu'd them as far as the Mount Azaz. They of the left Wing perceiving the flight of those in the right, went after Judas, and inclosed him behind. So that being unable to fly, and seeing himself inclosed by his Enemies, he resolv'd to fight it out. And after having slain a great number of his Enemies, he found himself so cumber'd by the Wounds which he had receiv'd, that he fell to the Ground, and crown'd all his other great and immortal Actions by a glorious death. His Soldiers seeing him dead, and having no Commander of note left amongst them, after the loss of so valiant a Captain, betook them all to flight. Simon and Jonathan his Brothers, upon intreaty, recover'd his Body, and carried it to Modin, (a place where his Father was buried;) there was he in- D terred by all the People, who wept for him divers days, and honour'd him publicly, according to the custom of their Country. Such was Judas's end, who was a valiant Man, a great Warriour, and very respective of the Commandments of his Father Matthias, having done and suffer'd all that was possible, to recover the liberty of his Country. Being therefore after this manner accomplished, he had left behind him a perpetual re- nown of his worthy Acts, and an honourable Memory of himself obtained by the liberty, in which he re-established his Nation, delivering them from the servitude of the Macedo- nians: He died, after he had discharged the Office of the High-Priest for the space of three years.

C H A P. I.

After the death of Judas Macchabeus, Jonathan his Brother is by the Jews chosen General of their Army. Bacchides, the Commander of Demetrius's Army, attempts to kill him treacherously; but failing, he assaults him openly. A great Battel, and a fair Retreat managed by Jonathan. The Son of Amar kills his Brother John, and thereby draws the Divine Vengeance on his head. Bacchides besegeth him and Simon his Brother in Bethlaga, but they force him to raise his Siege.

WE have declar'd in the former Book, how the Nation of the Jews (after they had been under the subjection of the Macedonians) recovered their liberty: We have likewise related the great Wars of Judas their Captain, and in which he was at last slain in the defence of their liberty: How likewise (after the death of Judas) all the wicked Apostate Jews, who had revolted from their Religion, took Courage, molesting and doing many Injuries to the rest of their Country-men. Finally, how besides their Malice, the Famine rag'd in the Country; so that divers being unable to sustain these two scourges of Famine and War, were constrain'd to submit themselves unto the Macedonians. In the mean while, while, Bacchides gathering together the Apostates, (who were fallen from the Religion of the Jews, with an intent to live after the manner of the Heathen) committeth the government of the Country unto them, who laying hold on Judas's friends and partakers, betrayed and deliver'd them to Bacchides; who first of all tormented and beat them, and afterwards put them to death. This so great affliction (than which, the Jews had never endured a worse, since their return from Babylon) was the cause that those of Judas's Faction, who were yet alive, fearing the total ruine of their Nation, address'd themselves to Jonathan his Brother, exhorting him to imitate his Brother Judas's Virtues, and to have no less care of his Country, than him who dyed in the defence of it; beseeching him, that he would not suffer his Nation to perish for want of a Captain, since he himself was so well qualified to command them. Jonathan answer'd them, That he was ready to die for them; and being in all things esteem'd no less Valiant and Politick than his Brother Judas, he was proclaimed General and Captain of the Jews.

Bacchides having notice hereof, feared lest Jonathan should be no less troublesome to the King and the Macedonians, than his Brother Judas before him had been, for which cause he sought means to make him away by Treason. But both Jonathan and his Brother Simon gat intelligence thereof, and having discover'd his practice, they took all their Families with them, and fled into the desert that confin'd upon the City of Jerusalem; and retiring near unto a Water call'd the Lake of Alphar, they remained in that place. When Bacchides perceiv'd that they mistrusted him, and were driven thither; he went out against them with all his Forces, and being encamped on the other side of Jordan, he gather'd his Army together. Jonathan knowing well that Bacchides came out to seek him, sent his Brother John (surnam'd Gadiah) unto the Arabians and Nabatheans, to commit the trust of their Goods into their Hands, until the end of the War betwixt him and Bacchides; for the Arabians were his Friends. Whilſt therefore John march'd towards the Nabatheans, (who were of the City of Medaba) the Sons of Amareus laid an ambush for him; and after they had furiously set upon him on the way, and laid hold on whatsoever he brought with him, they at length flew him, and all his company; for which Fact of theirs, they were shortly after punished by his Brethren, as we shall relate hereafter.

When Bacchides knew that Jonathan was encamped in the Marſhes of Jordan, he made choice of the Sabbath-day to set upon him, hoping that he would not defend himself on that day, because of the prohibition of the Law. But he, contrary to his expectation, encouraged his Soldiers, and declar'd unto them how it concern'd their lives to be Valiant, for that it was impossible for them to escape, because they were shut up in the midst betwixt the River and the Enemy; for they had the Enemy before them, and the River on their backs. As soon therefore as he had made his Prayer unto his God, that it might please him to grant him the Victory, he set upon the Enemy with great resolution, and slew a great number of them; and perceiving how Bacchides assaulted him with great fierceness, he stretch'd out his right Hand to strike him; but he preventing the stroke, by stepping aside, Jonathan and his Companions leapt into the River, and so saved themselves, by swimming over to the other side of Jordan, because the Enemy durst not pass the Water to pursue them. Whereupon Bacchides returned incontinently to the Castle of Jerusalem (after he had lost about 2000 of his Men.) After this, he fortify'd divers Cities (which were before ruin'd) namely, Jericho, Eman, Bethoron, Bethella, Thamnata, Pharathon, Tecboa, and Gazara, and built in every of them certain Towers, and great and strong Walls, and afterwards he plant'd Garisons therein, to fall out upon the Jews, and vex them; but especially he fortify'd the Cittadel of Jerusalem, in which he kept for Hostages the Children of the principal Men of Judea.

About that time there came a certain Man to Jonathan and his Brother Simon, bringing them news, that the Sons of Amareus, would solemnize their Nuptials, and were to lead the Bride, which was Daughter to one of the noblest amongst the Arabians, from the City of Gabatha; and it was intended that she should be conducted with great Magnificence and Pomp. Jonathan and his Brother supposing that a fit opportunity was offer'd them to revenge their Brother's death, and to punish the Medabanes for the wrongs they had done unto their Brother, they took with them the greatest Forces that they could, and march'd towards Medaba, where they lay in Ambush under the side of a Hill. But when they saw them that led the Bride, and accompanied the Bridegroom, and a great Troop of their Friends likewise, according to the manner of Marriages, they brake out of their Ambush, and put them all to the Sword; and after they had seiz'd their Jewels, and all the other Booty of that Company that follow'd them, they retir'd back again joyfully, having accomplish'd their design: and thus revenged they the death of their Brother John, upon the Sons of Amareus. For not only these alone, but their Friends that accompanied them, with their Wives and Children, were all of them slain, to the number of 400. And in this manner Simon and Jonathan return'd into the Marſhes aforeſaid, and abode there. But Bacchides having fortified all the Garisons of Judea, return'd back unto the King. And at that time the state of the Jews was in Peace, for the space of nigh two years.

But the wicked, and such as were revolted from the Religion of the Jews, seeing that Jonathan and his followers convert'd in the Country with great affluence, by reason of the Peace, they sent certain Ambassadors unto King Demetrius; requiring him to send them Bacchides, who might apprehend Jonathan; declaring that it might easily be done, and that in one night breaking in upon them, he might murder them all before they were aware. When Bacchides, by the King's commandment, came into Jewry, he wrote unto all his Friends, both Jews, and also his other Allies, requiring them to lay hold on Jonathan; but when by no Policy, nor Prowess of theirs, they were able to apprehend him, (for that Jonathan having notice of their Ambushes, stood upon his guard;) Bacchides the Macedonian was displeas'd with the Apostates and Fugitives, objecting against them, that they had deceiv'd both the King and him; and laying hold on fifty of the principal of them, he put them to death. But Jonathan and his Brother, with those of their company, retir'd themselves into Bethlaga, (a certain Village in the Desert) for fear of Bacchides; in which place he built Towers and Walls to keep his Garison in more security. Bacchides having notice of it, took the Army that he had with him, and those Jews that were his Confederates, and march'd forward against Jonathan; and approaching those Fortification that were made by him, he besieged him for many Days. But Jonathan, for all his Siege and Violence, was not a whit terrified, but stood out valiantly; and leaving his Brother Simon in the City to make head against Bacchides, he secretly stole out, and gather'd a great number of Soldiers that favour'd his proceedings, and in the night-time courageously brake into Bacchides's Camp; and after he had there slain a number of his Men, he gave his Brother Simon notice of his coming; who, as soon as he heard the noise in the Enemies Camp, hastily issued forth with his Soldiers, and burnt all the Macedonian Engines, and made a great slaughter of them. Bacchides seeing that he was circumvented by his Enemies, and that both before and behind he was press'd by them, being astonish'd at this so unexpected an encounter, was almost out of his wits; so much was he troubled at the issue of his Siege, that fell out altogether contrary to his expectation; for which cause he discharged all his Choler upon those Apostates, supposing he was abused by them, who had sent unto the King, and had caus'd him to be sent thither; so that he thought of nothing now, but raising the Siege, and returning home with as little dishonour as he could.

C H A P. II.

Jonathan confirmeth Bacchides to make Peace with the Jews, and to depart out of the Country.

When Jonathan knew his intentions, he sent an Ambassador unto him to conclude a Peace betwixt them, with this condition, That they should each of them deliver up those Prisoners that were taken on either side. Bacchides judging the Proposal to be honourable, and that a fit occasion was now offer'd him, whereupon he might raise his Siege without any disgrace, promised Jonathan his friendship; so that both of them swore from that time forward, never to make War the one against the other, and each of them restored their Prisoners. Thus returned Bacchides into Antioch unto his King, and after that Retreat, he never made War again upon Judea. But Jonathan having obtained his security, went and dwelt in the Town of Medaba, where, during his Governments, he executed such severe justice on those that were revolted from the Religion of their Country, that he purged the Nation from Apostates.

C H A P. III.

The year of the World, 3813.
before Christ's
Nativity, 151.

Alexander Ballez, the Son of King Antiochus Epiphanes, enters with an Army into Syria. The Garison of Ptolemais set open their Gates to him, by reason of their hatred to King Demetrius, who prepares himself for War.

IN the hundred and sixteenth year, Alexander, surnamed Ballez, the Son of Antiochus Epiphanes came into Syria, and seized the City of Ptolemais, by the reason of those who were therein, who were ill-affected towards Demetrius, by reason of his arrogancy, which was such, that he granted no Man access unto him; for being locked up in a Royal Fort, fenced with four Towers, (which himself had built near unto Antioch) he suffered no Man to approach his presence, but was careless, and wholly negligent in his Affairs, living in Pleasure and Idleness; whereby he was much hated by his Subjects, as we have already declared in another place. Now when Demetrius knew that Alexander had seized Ptolemais, he gathered all his Forces, and marched forth against him.

C H A P. IV.

King Demetrius desireth the Alliance of Jonathan, who makes use of this occasion, to repair the Fortifications of Jerusalem.

Demetrius's War against Alexander,
1 Mac. 10.

IN the mean time he sent Ambassadors unto Jonathan, that might make an Alliance, and ratifie a Friendship betwixt them; for he determined with himself to prevent Alexander, for fear lest he capitulating with him first of all, should obtain his assistance. And this did he especially for the fear he had of Jonathan, lest remembering those Injuries he had before received at his hands, he should oppose himself against him. He therefore sent unto him, requiring him to assemble his Forces, and to make preparations for the War; commanding likewise, that those Jews should be delivered into his possession, whom Bacchides had shut up for Hostages in the Fortres of Jerusalem. After that Demetrius had demeaned himself in this sort, Jonathan came to Jerusalem, and in the presence of all the People, and of the Garison that was in the Fortres, he read the King's Letters; and after the reading thereof, the wicked and revolted Jews that were in the Fortres were afraid, seeing that the King permitted Jonathan to levy an Army, and to receive Hostages. But he receiving them into his hands, restored each of them to their Fathers and Mothers: And by this means remained Jonathan in Jerusalem, where he made divers reparations, and built according as he pleased. For he built the City Walls of hewn Stone, to make them more durable against the assaults of War. Which when they perceived who were in the Garisons throughout all Judea, they forsook them all, and retired back to Antioch, except they that were in the City of Bethsura, and those in the Fortres of Jerusalem; for they conspired for the most part of those Jews that had abandoned their Religion, who for that reason feared to forsake their Garisons.

C H A P. V.

King Alexander Ballez desireth the friendship of Jonathan; and to oblige him, confers on him the Office of High-Priest, void by the death of his Brother Judas Machabeus. King Demetrius on the other side, makes suaver Proposals unto him, and those of his Nation. The two Kings come to a Battel, in which Demetrius is slain.

Hec. & Ruf.
Jews, cap. 8.

BUT Alexander knowing what promises Demetrius had made unto Jonathan, and being well assured how valiant he was, and how he behaved himself against the Macedonians, and how he was persecuted by Demetrius, and Lieutenant Bacchides; he told his Friends that it was impossible for him to meet with a better Ally at that time than Jonathan, who had approved himself a valiant Man against his Enemies, and particularly hated Demetrius, from whom he had received many injuries, and on whom he had several times taken revenge: Wherefore if they thought it good to draw him unto their side against Demetrius, the time was very fit to make an Alliance between them; which advice of his being approved by his Favourites, he sent a Letter unto Jonathan to this effect:

King Alexander to Jonathan his Brother, Health.

We have long since heard of your Valour and Fidelity, which hath caused us to send our Ambassadors

H. sadors unto you, to treat with you of an Alliance and Amity betwixt us; and from this day forward, we elect and ordain you High-Priest of the Jews, and receive you into the number of our chiefest Friends. Moreover, as a Present, I send you a Purple Robe, and a Crown of Gold, exhorting you, That since you are thus honoured by us, you will likewise yield us an answerable Respect and Friendship.

Jonathan having received this Letter, invested himself in the habit of the High-Priest, on the day of the Feast of the Tabernacles, which was the fourth year after the death of his Brother Judas. (For during all that time there had not been any High-Priest.) He assembled also a great number of Soldiers, and caused a great quantity of Arms and Weapons to be made.

When Demetrius heard this, he was much troubled, and accused himself of sloth, and too much negligence in his Affairs, because he had not prevented Alexander, by drawing Jonathan to his Party, but had suffered him to take the benefit of this occasion. Nevertheless he forbore not to write to Jonathan, and the rest of the People of the Jews, as followeth.

King Demetrius to Jonathan, and to all the Nation of the Jews, Health.

Since you have observed the Friendship that you bear unto us, and have not engaged your selves with our Enemies, notwithstanding their divers solicitations, we praise your Fidelity, and pray you to persevere in the same estate, assuring you, that you shall receive the like Favours from us, in all Integrity. For I am content to remit the greater part of the Tributes and Taxes that you have usually paid, either to the Kings my Predecessors, or to me; and from this time forward, I acquit you from those Tributes you are to pay hereafter. And, moreover, I release you of the price of Salt, and of the Gold which you were wont to give unto us for our Crown. We likewise acquit you of the thirds of the Fruit of your Lands, and the half of the Fruit of your Trees, which heretofore you have been accustomed to pay, that you may enjoy them peaceably from this time forward. I acquit you also at this present, for ever, of all that which the Inhabitants of Judea, and the three Provinces annexed therunto, Samaria, Galilee, and Peræa, are bound to pay me; willing and commanding that the City of Jerusalem be held Sacred, and enjoy the Privilege of a Sanctuary; and that it shall be exempt from the payment of Tythes, and all manner of Impositions. And I commit the Fortres in the same to the hands of Jonathan the High-Priest, permitting him to place such a Garison therein, as he shall think fit, and such as will faithfully keep it for his use. I will also that all the Jews who are imprisoned in my Country, be set at liberty. Moreover, it is my pleasure, that no Horses of the Jews be taken up to run Post for us: I grant also that the Sabbaths, and festival Days; and three days also before every one of those Feasts, be days of Liberty and Freedom. And my will is, that the Jews, who inhabit within my Dominions, be likewise freed from all molestations. The like Privilege grant I them that will bear Arms with me, to the number of 30000; who, in what place soever they shall be, shall have no worse entertainment than my own Army; and part of them will I place in my Garisons, the rest shall be of my Guard; and I will make them Captains in my Court, and will permit them to live according to the Ordinances of their Country, which they shall observe; and I will also that the three Governments annexed to Judæa, be made subject unto the same Laws. My pleasure is, in like manner, that the High-Priest shall take order, that no Jew shall worship in any other Temple than that of Jerusalem; and of my own Charge I give every year an 150000 Sicles of Silver, to be employed in Sacrifices; and that which shall be over and above those Sacrifices, my pleasure is, that it shall be your profit. Moreover, I acquit the Priests and Ministers of the Temple, of the 10000 Drachms of Silver, (which the Kings levied on the Temple) because they apertain unto Priests who serve in the Temple, as I have been rightly informed. I grant also to all those who shall repair unto the Temple of Jerusalem for refuge, and within the Precincts thereof, (whether it be for Money due unto the King, or for any other cause) that they be acquit thereof, and receive not any damage in their Goods. I permit also, that the Temple be repaired and built at my Charge. My will is also, that the Walls of the City be re-edified, and that certain Towers be built about the same, at my expense. Furthermore, if there be any places fit to build Fortresses and strong Holds in, throw all the Country of Judæa, and to place Garisons in them, my will is, that all this be done and fortified, at the Charges levied out of mine own Coffers. These are the promises and offers that Demetrius made unto the Jews.

But King Alexander having gathered great Forces, as well of strange and hired Soldiers, as of those who in Syria had revolted from Demetrius, led forth his whole Army against the Enemy; and after the Ensigns were displayed, and the onset given, the left Wing of Demetrius compelled Alexander's Soldiers that fought against it to fly; and his Men

Alexander endeavoured to draw Jonathan to his Party by making him High-Priest. Demetrius fludied by Promises, to assure himself of Jonathan's Friendship.

Nativity, 151.

Men pursuing them, spoiled their Camp. But the Right-Wing, in which the King himself was, being forced to retire, was discomfited; and as for the rest, they betook themselves to flight; but Demetrius fighting valiantly, slew some of his Enemies; and in pursuing others, who could not endure his fierce Assault, was in the end, by setting spurs to his Horse, carried into a deep and muddy Bog, whereinto by chance his Horse fell, and being unable to get out, he was slain in that place. For being discover'd by his Enemies, they turned back upon him; and having inclosed him, they altogether shot their Arrows against him; so that he being on foot, and fighting valiantly, was at length slain, after he had received divers wounds, and was no longer able to resist. Thus died Demetrius, who departed this life the eleventh year of his Reign, as we have related in another place.

C H A P. VI.

Onias the Son of Onias the High-Priest, builds a Temple in Egypt, of the same Form with that at Jerusalem. A contention between the Jews and the Samaritans, before Ptolemy Philometor, King of Egypt, concerning the Temple of Jerusalem, and that of Garizim. The Samaritans lose the cause.

BUT Onias the Son of the High-Priest, called also Onias, (who flying out of his Country, lived in Alexandria, with Ptolemy Philometor, as we have heretofore declared) seeing all Judea destroyed by the Macedonians, and their Kings; and intending to acquire immortal Praise, determined to beseech the King Ptolemy, and the Queen Cleopatra, by Letters, That it might be lawful for him to build a Temple in Egypt, resembling in all things that at Jerusalem; and that he might have liberty to place Levites and Priests in it of his own Kindred: And hereunto was he especially moved, by a certain Prophecy of Isaiah, who more than 600 years before, had foretold that a Temple should be assuredly built in Egypt, in honour of Almighty God, by a Jew. Being therefore encouraged by this Prediction, he wrote a Letter to Ptolemy and Cleopatra, to this effect.

During the time that I was employed in your Wars, and by God's favourable assistance have done you many services, I have visited Cœsølynia and Phœnicia, and have been in the City of Leontopolis (which is in the Territories of Heliopolis) I have also visited divers other places, wherein the Jews have built Temples, without observing those Rules that are necessary upon such an occasion, which is the cause that they agree not among themselves: As also the like hath befallen among the Egyptians, through the multitude of Temples, and the great diversity of Religions. And having found out a very convenient place near a Castle called Bubastis in the Plain, where there is store of all sorts of Materials for Building, and Cattel fit for Sacrifice; I beseech you that it may be lawful for me to purify the Temple that is ruined in that place, and dedicated to no sacred power: And that in stead thereof, to erect a Temple in honour of Almighty God, according to the form and dimensions of that Temple which is at Jerusalem, where we still pray for the Preservation and Prosperity both of your self, your Queen, and Children. And this will certainly unite all the Jews within the Kingdom of Egypt, for they will all in this place assemble to celebrate the Praises of God, according as it hath been foretold by the Prophet Isaiah, There shall be (saith he) a Temple for our Lord God in Egypt. Many other things also hath he foretold touching this place.

This is the substance of that which Onias wrote unto King Ptolemy. And by his answer which he made hereunto, a Man may easily conjecture what Piety was both in him, and Cleopatra his Sister, and Wife. For they have returned the sin and transgression of the Law, which through this means fell upon Onias's head, by this answer that ensueth.

King Ptolemy and Queen Cleopatra, to Onias the High-Priest, Health.

We have perused your Letters, by which you desire us to give you leave to cleanse the Temple that is defaced at Leontopolis, in the Seignory of Heliopolis, in the place called Bubastis in the Plain. We marvel very much, that a Temple built in a place so unclean, and full of execrable Beasts, should be acceptable unto God; but since that you inform us, that the Prophet Isaiah did long since prophesie the same, we give you liberty, if it may be done according to the Law, and with this condition, that we commit not any sin against God.

Upon this answer, Onias (taking possession of the place) built therein a Temple, and erected an Altar unto God, according to the model of the Temple of Jerusalem; but far far less, and less rich. I think it no ways requisite to declare the Dimensions thereof, nor the Vessels belonging to it, because I describe them particularly in my tenth Book of the Wars, and Captivity of the Jews; neither wanted some Levites and Priests, who being of the same opinion with Onias, officiated at the Celebration of Divine Service. But let this suffice for the present, touching the Temple.

But it came to pass, that the Jews of Alexandria, and the Samaritans that brought in the Service and Worship of the Temple upon the mount Garizim, under Alexander the Great, dissented from one another, and debated their Differences before Ptolemy. For the Jews said, That the Temple in Jerusalem built according to Moses Laws and Ordinances, was the lawful Temple; but the Samaritans maintained, That that which was built on mount Garizim, was the true Temple. They therefore besought the King, That it would please him to sit in Judgment, with the assistance of his Friends, to hear their Allegations in this behalf, and to condemn the Party unto death, who should be found faulty in his Process. Now the Advocates which pleaded for the Samaritans, were Sabben and Theodotus; and Andronicus, the Son of Messalem, defended the Cause of those of Jerusalem, and the other Jews. And both of them swore both by God and the King, That they would bring their Proofs according to the Law, beseeching Ptolemy to adjudge him to death, whom he should find to have falsified his Oath. The King therefore sat down with his Friends, to hear the Cause, and determine their Differences. But the Jews of Alexandria were much displeased with them that had drawn the preeminence of the Temple at Jerusalem into question, and were highly discontent, that a Temple so ancient and famous, and so esteemed and honoured through the whole World, should be so disparaged. When therefore the day of Audience was come, Sabben and Theodotus suffered Andronicus to speak first; who began to prove the Lawfulness, Holiness, and Religion of the Temple in Jerusalem out of the Law; and by the successive Government of the High Priests, who from Father to Son, and from Hand to Hand, had received this honour; therein alleging, That all the Kings of Asia had honoured the Majesty of that place with Presents and rich Oblations; whereas neither in the record of Men, nor course of Antiquity, the Temple of Garizim had been in any estimation. Hereunto he added such other reasons, as persuaded the King, that the Temple of Jerusalem was built according to the Ordinance of Moses, and caused him to adjudge Sabben and Theodotus to death. This may suffice to have spoken concerning the Differences of the Jews of Alexandria, and such things as befel them during Ptolemy Philometor's time.

C H A P. VII.

Alexander Ballez finding himself, by the death of Demetrius, in the peaceable possession of the Realm of Syria, espouseth the Daughter of Ptolemy Philometor, King of Egypt. Great honour is done by Alexander to Jonathan the High-Priest.

AFter that Demetrius was slain in the Field (as we have already related) Alexander made himself King of Syria, and wrote to Ptolemy Philometor, desiring his Daughter, the Princess Cleopatra, in marriage, telling him, That it was not below his Dignity, to contract Affinity with him, since he had obtained his Father's Empire by the Favour of God, and had overcome Demetrius. Ptolemy yielding a willing Ear to his request, wrote back, That he was very glad that he had recovered his Father's Kingdom, promising him to give him his Daughter in Marriage; assuring him, that he would meet him at Ptolomais, and bring his Daughter unto him to that place, and there celebrate the Nuptials. After he had written these Letters, Ptolemy made haste to Ptolomais, and led with him his Daughter Cleopatra, where meeting with Alexander, (according to their appointment) he delivered him his Daughter, and gave her a Dowry, worthy of so great a King. Unto the solemnizing of his Marriage, Alexander, by Letters, invited the High-Priest Jonathan, commanding him to come to him to Ptolomais. He went thither, and presented magnificent Presents to both the Kings; he was highly honoured by both, inasmuch as Alexander constrained him to put off his ordinary Garments, and to put on a Purple Robe, and after that to sit upon a Royal Throne, commanding his Captains to march before him through the City, and to command by publick Edict, That no Man should dare to speak any thing against him, nor offer him any cause of discontent. All which the Captains performed; so that they, who purposely and maliciously came thither to accuse him, seeing the honour that was done unto him by the King, fled away, lest the mischief which they designed for him, should fall upon their own heads. This King Alexander loved Jonathan so intirely, that he afforded him the chief place amongst his dearest friends.

Nativity, 146.

Demetrius Nicanor, the Son of King Demetrius, entred into Cilicia with an Army. King Alexander Ballez gives the command of his to Apollonius, who, with very ill success, sets upon Jonathan the High-Priest, who defeats him, takes Azot, and burns the Temple of Dagon. Ptolemy Philometor, King of Egypt, comes to the relief of King Alexander his Son-in-law, who appoints Apollonius to lay an ambush to surprize him. Ptolemy takes away his Daughter, and marrieth her to Demetrius, whom he causeth to be received by the Inhabitants of Antioch, from whence he had driven Alexander, but he returns with a great Army. Ptolemy and Demetrius unite their Forces, and overcome him in a pitched Battle; but Ptolemy died of his Wounds which he received, after he had seen the Head of Alexander sent to him by an Arabian Prince. Jonathan besiegeth the Citadel at Jerusalem, and by Presents appeaseth King Demetrius, who granteth new Favours to the Jews. This Prince seeing himself at Peace, disbandeth his old Soldiers.

I N the 165th year (Of the Reign of the Greeks) Demetrius, the Son of Demetrius, accompanied with divers hired Soldiers, whom Lafitenes, who was of Crete, furnished him with) departed out of Candia, and came into Cilicia. Which news, as soon as Alexander heard, he was much troubled; whereupon he instantly posted from Phenicia into Antioch, with intent to secure the Affairs of his Kingdom in those parts, by the arrival of Demetrius. He left behind him for his Governour in Callosyria, Apollonius Darius, who coming unto Jammia with a great Army, sent a Messenger unto the High-Priest Jonathan, to let him know, That it was very strange, that he only should live at his own ease, and in quiet, without submitting himself unto the King; who would not long pass by unpunished that affront which he offered him, in not submitting to his Obedience. Wherefore (said he) deserve not thyself, neither hope thou by skulking in the Mountains, or depending on thy Forces, to continue thy Greatness; but if thou trustest to thy Power, come down into the Field, and engage with me and my Army in the Plain, to the end that the issue of the Victory may show which of us is most valiant. Knowest thou not, that the chief Nobility of every City bear Arms under one, who hath always overcome thy Predecessors? Wherefore I challenge thee to meet me in that place where we may use our Swords, and no Stones; and where the vanquished shall have no advantage by his flight. Jonathan provoked by this bravado, chose out 10000 of his best Soldiers, and departed from Jerusalem, accompanied with his Brother Simon, and came unto Joppa, and encamped without the City, (because the Citizens had shut the Gates against him) for they had a Garison placed in that place by Apollonius. But as soon as he prepared to batter the City, the Inhabitants were afraid, lest he should surprize it by force, and therefore they opened the Gates. Apollonius understanding that Joppa was taken by Jonathan, he took 3000 Horsemen, and 8000 Footmen with him, and came into Azot; whence he departed, leading out his Army with an easie march; and arriving at Joppa, he retired back to draw Jonathan into the Field, putting great confidence in his Horsemen, and grounding his hope of Victory upon them. But Jonathan coming forth boldly, pursued Apollonius as far as Azot; who finding himself in the open Country, turned back upon him, and charged him. Jonathan was not at all surprized to see the thousand Horsemen that Apollonius had laid in ambush near unto a certain River, to the end they might charge the Jews behind, but disposed his Army after such a manner, that his Soldiers on every side turned their Faces upon the Enemy; commanding his Men to defend themselves on both sides, fighting with those that assailed them either in the Van or the Rear. After that the Battle had continued until evening, Jonathan gave his Brother Simon a part of his Forces, charging him to set upon the Enemies Battle; as for himself, he drew his Soldiers into the form of a Battalion resembling a Tortoise, to the end that being covered with their bucklers, joynted the one with the other, they might defend themselves against the Horsemen Arrows; to which all of them were obedient. The Enemies Horsemen shooting all their Arrows against them, did them no harm; for they pierced not as far as the Flesh, but lighting upon the Bucklers (enclosed and fastened the one within the other) they were easily beaten back, and born off, and fell down, being shot all in vain. But when the Enemies were wearied with shooting all the day long, and that Simon perceiv'd they could charge no further, he set upon their Infantry so courageously, that he put them all to flight. The Horse of Apollonius perceiving that the Foot were disordered, grew heartless likewise; and having lost the hope they had in their Foot, they betook themselves to flight in great disorder and confusion; so that they brake their Ranks of themselves, and were scattered through all the Plain. Jonathan also pursued them as far as Azot, and taking the City by assault, he slew divers of them, confining the rest that were in despair, to fly into the Temple of Dagon, which is in Azot; and taking the City by Assault, he burnt it, with the Villages round

H round about, and spared not the Temple of Dagon, but burnt it, and all those that were therein. The number as well of those that were slain in the Battle, as of those that were consumed by fire in the Temple, was 8000 Men. Having, after this manner, discomfited this Army, he departed from Azot, and marched toward Ascalon; and as he was encamped without the City, the Ascalonites came out unto him, and offered him Presents; which he received, and departed from thence, and marched towards Jerusalem, laden with great spoils.

As soon as Alexander heard that Apollonius the General of his Army was defeated, and forced to fly, he made a shew that he was glad thereof, pretending that it was without his knowledge that Jonathan had been assaulted, who was both his Friend and his Allie. I Whereupon he sent an Ambassador unto him, to let him know how much he rejoiced at his Victory, offering him Presents and Honours, with a Chain of Gold, such as the Kings were accustomed to give to those of their Kindred: He likewise gave him Accaron, and the Country thereabout, to him and his Heirs for ever.

About the same time, King Ptolemy Philometor set out an Army by Sea, and another by Land, to go into Syria, and to succour his Son-in-law Alexander; and in his way all the Cities received him with great Joy, according as Alexander had commanded them, and conducted him as far as the City of Azot; but that place made great complaints unto him, and demanded Justice at his hand because the Temple of Dagon was burnt and destroyed, accusing Jonathan for the firing thereof, and the slaughter of many People therein. But Ptolemy hearing these Accusations, answered not a word: But when Jonathan came to meet him at Joppa, he courted him with Royal Presents, and all the Honour that was possible; and after he had conducted him as far as the River called Eleutheros, he dismissed him, and sent him back to Jerusalem. When Ptolemy was come to Ptolomais, he hardly escaped death, and that contrary to all expectation, by the contrivance of Alexander, and his Friend Ammonius; which Treachery being discover'd, Ptolemy wrote un-rarities praifed against him, according to the heinousness of the offence. But seeing that Alexander delivered him not up into his hands, he conjectured and concluded, that he himself was the Author thereof, and conceived a great displeasure against this perfidious Prince, who had heretofore very much disoblged the Inhabitants of Antioch, by protecting the same Ammonius, from whom they had received a great deal of mischief; but in the end Ammonius was punished for these his Outrages, and disgracefully slain like a Woman, whilst in a Womans Attire he sought to hide himself, as we have related in another place.

At that time Ptolemy began to repent of bestowing his Daughter in Marriage on Alexander, and for refusing Demetrius to be his Friend and Confederates; so that he broke off the Affinity that he had with him; and after he had withdrawn his Daughter from him, he presently sent Ambassadors unto Demetrius, to confirm a League of Peace and Amity with him, promising him to bestow his Daughter upon him in Marriage, and to establish him in his Father's Kingdom. Demetrius very joyful to hear of this Ambassage, accepted both of the League and the Marriage. There only remained one difficulty for Ptolemy to surmount, which was, how he might persuade the Antiochians to admit Demetrius, against whom they were so much incensed, for the Indignities which his Father Demetrius had offered them; but this difficulty he overcame by this means. The Antiochians hated Alexander, because of Ammonius (as we have related before) and by that means were the more easily drawn to drive him out of the City. He perceiving himself to be thrust out of Antioch, came into Cilicia. Whereupon Ptolemy came unto Antioch, and was both by the Citizens and Soldiers therein proclaimed King, and was constrained to take two Diadems, the one as King of Asia, the other as King of Egypt. But he being a Man naturally very Just, Prudent, Moderate, and not at all Ambitious, and unwilling to displease the Romans, he call'd together the Inhabitants of Antioch, and prevailed so far with them, that at last he persuaded them to accept of Demetrius for their King; assuring them, That if he should receive that kindness at their hands, he would no more keep in memory those things that had fallen out betwixt them and his Father; protesting, for his own part, that he would instruct him both how to order the course of his life honestly, and to manage his publick Affairs with Justice; and promising them, that if he attempted to do any thing that should be unworthy of a good Prince, he himself would be the most ready to chastise him; for his own part, he would content himself to be King of Egypt. And by this means the Antiochians were induced to receive Demetrius.

But when Alexander was departed out of Cilicia, with a great Army, and was come into Syria, and had burnt and spoiled the Country of Antioch, Ptolemy, accompanied with with his Son Demetrius, (for he had already married his Daughter unto him) came forth A with their Armies, and obtained a complete Victory, by overcoming Alexander, who was constrained to fly into Arabia. It came to pass in that Battel, that Ptolemy's Horse hearing the noise of an Elephant, was troubled, and stumbled in such a manner, that he threw his Master on the Ground; which when his Enemies perceiv'd, they ran all together upon him, and gave him divers wounds on the Head, whereby he was in danger to have been slain, unless his Guard had rescu'd him; notwithstanding he was so dangerously wounded, that for four days he remained without any sense; on the fifth day, when he began to come to himself, Zabel the Prince of Arabia, who had beheaded Alexander, sent his Head unto Ptolemy; wherewith he was well-pleased; but this Joy lasted not long, for some few days after he died himself. This Alexander, surnamed Balles, reigned for the B space of five Years, as we have elsewhere related.

Demetrius, surnamed Nicanor, having obtained the Kingdom, quickly discover'd his ill nature, and treated Ptolemy's Army very unworthily, forgetting both the Confederacy and Affinity that he had contracted with him; by Cleopatra his Wife, who was Ptolemy's Daughter. But the Men of War hating his ingratitude, fled into Alexandria for their own security, notwithstanding they left the Elephants in his power and possession.

But the High-Priest Jonathan having assembled an Army of all the Country of Judea, began to besiege the Castle of Jerusalem; where there was a Garrison of the Macedonians, and a great number of wicked Apostates that were fallen from the Jewish Religion, who, in the beginning, sighted the Engites that Jonathan had raised to take that C place, in the strength whereof, they repos'd too much confidence: But, in the end, some of them breaking out by night, came unto Demetrius, and told him of the Sieges; at which he was displeased, and taking a strong Army with him, he departed from Antioch, to make a War upon Jonathan. When he came to Ptolomais, he wrote to Jonashan, and commanded him to come unto him: Notwithstanding Jonathan gave not over the Siege, but took the Elders and Priests with him, with Gold and Silver Robes, and a great quantity of Presents, intended for Demetrius; and when he had deliver'd them to him, he appeas'd his wrath; and after he had received many honours at his hands, he obtained the Confirmation of his Priesthood, in as ample manner as he enjoyed it during the time of his Predecessors; and although the wicked Jews accus'd him, yet did not D Demetrius give any credit to them. Moreover, Jonathan requiring; that for the whole Country of Jewry, and for the three Governments of Samarita, Joppa, and Galilee, he might pay no more than 300 Talents for Tribute; he granted him a full exemption, and wrote his Letters Patents in these terms:

King Demetrius to Jonathan his Brother, and to all the Nation of the Jews, Peace and Joy.

We have sent you the Copy of the Letter that we have written to Lathenes, our Father, to the end you may know the Contents thereof, which is this: E

King Demetrius to Lathenes, his Father, Joy and Peace.

Because the People of the Jews are our Confederates, and observe our Ordinances, my intent is to requite their good Affection, and to assign them the three Governments of Apherema, Lydia, and Ramatha, with their appurtenances, which have been taken from Samarita, and annexed to Judea. Secondly, we remit all that which our Predecessors received of them that sacrificed in Jerusalem; and other Tributes likewise, which were gathered for the Fruits of the Earth, and the Trees; the Tribute of the Salt likewise, and the Gold that was levied for the Crown;
so that it is our pleasure, that henceforward nothing hereof be exacted at their hands. F
See you therefore give order, that the Copy of these our present Letters be sent and deliver'd to Jonathan, to be affixed in some open and conspicuous place in the sacred Temple.

Demetrius perceiving that the Country was in Peace, and that he liv'd without fear of any War, he dismissed his Army, and disbanded his Soldiers, hiring only certain Strangers: (who were mulctured out of Candy, and other Isles;) whereby it came to pass, that his own Soldiers conceived an hatred against him, in that he gave them no Wages; whereas his Predecessors maintained them as well in Peace as in War, to the end that they might be the more affectionate towards them; and that if need required to employ G them, they might shew themselves more ready and courageous to fight for them.

Tryphon undertakes to establish Antiochus the Son of Alexander Ballex, in the Kingdom of Nicanor, who, by their assistance, subdues the Inhabitants of Antioch that had besieged him in his Palace. His Ingratitude to Jonathan. He is vanquished by young Antiochus, and flies into Cilicia. Great Honours are by Antiochus conferr'd on Jonathan, who assists him against Demetrius. A renowned Victory is obtained by Jonathan against the Army of Demetrius. He renews the Alliance with the Romans and Lacedemonians. The several rius* vanquished, and taken Prisoner by Artaces, King of the Parthians.

When Diodorus, surnamed Tryphon, (an Apamean by Nation, and General of Alexander's Army) heard of the Mutiny amongst Demetrius's Soldiers, he came to Malchus the Arabian, who had the care of the education of Antiochus, Alexander's Son, and endeavoured to prevail with him to commit Antiochus to his Trust, to the intent he might make him King, and establish him in the Government which belonged to his Father.
And although upon the first motion he could hardly be drawn to believe it; yet, at last,
K by the continual instance of Tryphon, he suffered himself to be overcome by his intrea-cies. See here what this Man pretended at that time. But Jonathan the High-Priest de-firing that they within the Cittadel of Jerusalem, and those wicked and apostate Jews, and in general all those that were in Garisons throughout all the Country, might be removed; he sent Ambassadors with rich Presents unto Demetrius, beseeching him to dismiss those that were in Garison in the Fortresses of Judea: He not only granted this, but promised things of far greater moment, after that War which he had then in hand, should be ended. For the present Troubles at that time gave him no opportunity to do what he intended: He therefore prayed, at present, to send him some of his Forces, because his own Army was Revolted. Whereupon Jonathan chose out 3000 fighting Men, and sent L them unto him. But the Antiochians hated Demetrius, both because of the Injuries they had endur'd under him, as also for the hatred they had conceiv'd against his Father, who had, in like manner, done them much wrong; so that they only expected an opportunity to cast him off. Understanding therefore that the succors that Jonathan sent unto Demetrius were at hand, and foreseeing that in a short time he would gather a great Army, if of the he were not timely prevented; they betook themselves to their Arms, and beset the King's Palace, after the manner of a Siege, and secured all the Gates, with an intent to lay hold on the King. Who seeing himself beset by the armed multitude of the Antiochians, took those hired Soldiers (with those whom Jonathan had sent him) and charged them; but he was forced to retire, being over-powered by the number of the Inhabitants.
M Whereupon the Jews perceiving that the Antiochians had the upper-hand, they mounted upon the battlements of the Palace, and from thence shot against them, without any danger to themselves (by reason of the distance and height of the place where they were) yet they much annoyed the Inhabitants, inasmuch that they drove them from the Houses near adjoining, which they incontinently set on fire, whereby the flame was spread thro' the whole City; so that the Houses that were close built the one by the other, and for the most part framed of Wood, were burnt down to the ground. The Inhabitants perceiv-ing that they could not put out the fire, betook themselves to flight, and the Jews cha-c'd them from House to House. When the King perceived that the Citizens of Antioch ran here and there to save their Wives and Children, and had given over the Battle, he N set upon them in divers places at once, whereby divers of them were slain, and all at last forced to cast down their Arms, and to yield themselves to Demetrius's Mercy, who pardoning their Rebellion, appeas'd the Sedition. After this, he rewards the Jews with part of the Pillage, thanking them as the only Authors of his Victory. Whereupon he sent them back to Jonathan, with no small acknowledgement and testimony of their Prowess and Virtue. But afterwards he discover'd his evil nature towards him, and broke his promises, threatening him to make War upon him, unless he paid him those Tributes which the People of the Jews ought, and were wont to pay unto the King's Ancestors heretofore. And that he had certainly done, had not Tryphon hinder'd him: for he was forced O to turn those Forces that he had prepar'd against Jonathan, to make War upon Tryphon: Demetrius who returning from Arabia into Syria, with the younger Antiochus, (who at that time was under Age) he set the Diadem upon his Head. All the Army likewise that had abandon'd Demetrius, for contracting their Pay, came and follow'd him, and made open War against their Master, and under Antiochus and Tryphon fought with him, and overcame Antiochus. Whereupon Demetrius being wholly discomfited, fled into Cilicia: But the younger Antiochus sent Ambassadors and Letters to Jonathan, calling him his Allie and Friend, confirming the Priesthood unto him, and assigned him the four Governments annexed to Judea; and besides these, he gave him Vessels of Gold, a Robe of Purple, with permission to wear the same: he gave him also a Pendent of Gold, and assured him, that he esteemed of him as one of his friends, and created his Brother Simon General of his Army, from the marches of Tyre as far as Aegypt. Jonathan finding such honours as these heaped upon him, sent Ambassadors both unto him and Tryphon, protesting, That he was their Friend and Allie, and that he would fight on his side against Demetrius, of whom he had so great reason to complain, in that he had made no other return but ingratitude, for all the services which he had done him.

But after that Antiochus had granted him leave to levy a great Army out of Syria and Phoenicia, to fight against Demetrius, he went into the neighbouring Cities, and was by them very kindly received; yet did they not afford him any Men of War. Coming from thence unto Ascalon, the Citizens in honourable array came out to meet him with Presents; whom together with the Cities of Celestria, he exhorted to forsake Demetrius's part, and to follow Antiochus, to the end, that joining themselves with him, they might all of them combine their Forces against Demetrius, and take vengeance of those mischiefs which they had oftentimes endur'd by his means: and which if they prudently examin'd, they had many reasons to prosecute their revenge. After he had perswaded these Cities to enter into Confederation against Demetrius, he came to Gaza to induce them likewise, and reconcile them to Antiochus. But he found the Gazians to be of a far contrary disposition than that which he expected, for they flatly resisted him: and although they were intended to forsake Demetrius, yet would they not join their Forces, or submit the City to his Government. For which cause, Jonathan besieged their City, and spoiled their Country: for with the one half of his Army he begirt Gaza, and with the other half he over-ran the Country, spoiling and burning the same. The Gazians seeing these miseries which they were constrain'd to endure, and perceiving that no succours came unto them from Demetrius, but that their own overthrow was at hand, and their assistance far off: and that which was worse, most uncertain; they thought it to be the wisest part for them, to forsake the one, and follow the other. Whereupon they sent messengers unto Jonathan, protesting, That they would be both his Friends and Confederates. For Men do unwillingly take knowledge of their Profit, before they have bought it to their sorrow; and that which they neglected at first, and was most expedient for them to perform before they were afflicted, that do they earnestly hunt after, at such time as they have been chastised. Upon this submission of theirs, Jonathan receiv'd them into favour, and took pledges of them, and sent them to Jerusalem, and from thence march'd he along the Country as far as Damasco. And whereas an huge Host sent by Demetrius, came out against him, as far as the City Cedasa, near unto Tyre and Galilee, making their reckoning to divert Jonathan from Syria, by succouring and relieving those of Galilee, who were their Confederates: Jonathan went out speedily to meet with them, recommending the state of Judea to the charge of his Brother Simon. Who assembling all the Country, encamped before Bethsura, a strong Fort in Judea, and besieged it (for Demetrius being before-time seized thereof, kept Garison therein, as before this we have declar'd. When as therefore Simon rais'd his Bulwarks, and fitted his Engines to assault the City, and employ'd all his study to surprize the same, they that were besieged waxed afraid, lest if he should take the Town by force, they should lose their Lives. For which cause they sent an Herald unto Simon, requesting him, That he would permit them to depart out of Bethsura, with the safety of their Lives and Goods, and go unto Demetrius; who satisfying their demands, they presently departed out of the City, and he planted a Garison therein of their own Men, in place of the Macedonians. In the mean while Jonathan, who was in Galilee, caus'd his Army to dislodge from a place called the Waters of Genesareth, where he was encamped, and march'd towards the Plain of Azor, without any suspicion that his Enemies had been planted thereabouts: When as therefore Demetrius's Soldiers had intelligence the day before, that Jonathan should march forward against them, they laid an ambush for him, which they plac'd near the Mountain, preparing the rest of their Forces to bid him Battel in the Plain. As soon as Jonathan perceiv'd their preparation to the Battel, he arrang'd his Army as conveniently as was possible; but when they that lay in ambush arose, and charg'd the Jews upon their backs, they feigning to be enclosed, and consequently easily slain, began to flee, to that all of them abandoned Jonathan, except some few, to the number of 50, with Matthias the son of Abisalon, and Judas the son of Chapsee, Lieutenant-Generals of Jonathan; who boldly

Simon, Jonathan's brother, taken in Bethsura.

Entered, and, like desperate Men, charg'd the Enemy in the Vanguard with such fury, that they made them amazed at their Valour, and compell'd them to trust to their heels. Which, when they that had abandoned Jonathan perceiv'd, they rallied, and pursu'd them as far as Cedasa, where the Enemies were encamped.

When Jonathan had obtain'd this glorious Victory, wherein there fell about 2000 of the Enemy, he return'd to Jerusalem, and (seeing that all things fell out according as he desir'd) he sent Ambassadors unto Rome, to renew the ancient League that was made betwixt the Romans and the People of the Jews: commanding his Ambassadors upon their return from Rome, to go likewise to Sparta, and renew their alliance with that City. As soon as they were come to Rome, and had presented themselves before the Senate, they declar'd how they were sent from the High-Priest Jonathan, who desir'd to renew their Alliance. Whereupon the Senate granted all which they demanded, and gave them their Letters of recommendation to all the Governors of Asia and Europe, and to those of each particular City, commanding them to grant them free passage to return into their Country; in their return they went to Lacedemon, and deliver'd those Letters which Jonathan had written to that State, which were to this effect:

Jonathan the High-Priest of the Senate and People of the Jews;
To the Ephores, Senate and People of Sparta, Health.

Forasmuch as heretofore we have received a Letter by the hands of Demothcles, written from Arius your King, to Onias our High-Priest, making mention of that alliance which is betwixt you and us (the Copy whereof we have here-unto inserted) we received those Letters with great joy, and testified the same both to Demothcles and Arius. (notwithstanding we were not ignorant of this conjunction long before, because we were informed thereof by our sacred Scriptures:) And whereas we have not first of all acknowledged our Alliance, it was for no other reason, but that we might give you the opportunity of preventing us. Since which time wherein we have contracted friendship with you, we have on our holy and solemn days sacrific'd unto our God, beseeching him to continue and keep you in prosperity; and forasmuch as we have been environ'd with many Wars, caus'd by the inordinate desires of our Neighbours, we have not thought it meet to be troublesome unto you, or to any other of our Allies. But since we have obtained an happy issue of all these troubles, we have sent Numenius, the Son of Antimachus, and Antipater, the Son of Jafon, Men honourable amongst our Counsellors, both to the Romans, and to you also; to whom we have given our Letters to be presented unto you, in our behalf, to the end they might renew the amity which is betwixt you and us: you shall therefore do well if you write back unto us, and certify us wherein we may serve you, there being no good Office which we are not ready to perform.

These Ambassadors were kindly entertained by the Lacedemonians, who made a publick Ordinance touching their affection and amity with the Jews, which they deliver'd unto them.

At this time there were three Sects among the Jews, who had different and contrary opinions touching humane affairs: the first was that of the Pharisees, the second of the Sadducees, and the third of the Essenians. The Pharisees affirm, That some things are directed by Destiny, and others are left to our liberty. The Essenians said, That destiny govern'd all things; and that nothing happened amongst Men, that was not dispos'd thereby. The Sadducees avow, That there is no Destiny, and that humane affairs cannot be govern'd and dispos'd thereby, but that all things depend upon our selves; so that we are the Authors of all the good or evil that happeneth unto us, according as we follow good or evil Counsels. But heretofore have I treated more exactly in my second Book of the Wars of the Jews.

Demetrius's Captains being desirous to wipe off the dishonour of their defeat, and to recover the loss that had lately befallen them, gathered together a greater power than the former; and went out against Jonathan, who having intelligence of their coming, march'd speedily to encounter them near unto the Plain of Awath; for he resolv'd to prevent their Incurions into Judea. Whereupon he encamped about 50 Furlongs from the Enemy, and sent out Spies to discover of what force they were, and how they were encamped. Who, when they had by a most diligent view known all that possibly they could, returning, took certain Prisoners, and brought them away by night with them: by whose confession, the design of the Enemies was discover'd to Jonathan; which was, to set upon him on the suddain. But Jonathan with a provident care, speedily fortifi'd his Camp, plac'd his out-guards, and prepar'd all things necessary for defence, keeping his Soldiers up in Arms all the Night, and exhorted them to be Valiant, and ready, if there should be a necessity of Fighting by Night, to prevent the surprisal of their Enemies.

mies. But when the Captains of Demetrius understood that their Design was discover'd A unto Jonathan, and knew that they were not strong enough to give him battle in the open field, they decamp'd in the Night, and left a great number of Fires burning, that they might the better conceal their retreat. On the Morrow, when Jonathan came to attack them in their Camp, and saw it abandoned, and conjectured thereby that they were fled, he follow'd after them; but he could not overtake them, because they had already pass'd the River Eleutherus, and were retir'd into their strong holds and places of security. Returning therefore from thence into Arabia, and making War on the Nabatheans, he spoiled their Country, took great Booties, and led away many Prisoners: and from thence came to Damascus, and there sold all that he had taken. About this time, Simon (his Brother) B marching throughout all Judea and Palestine, as far as Ascalon, placed his Garisons in such places as he thought for his purpose; and fortify'd them both with Men and Munition, and at length came to Joppa, which he took by force, and planted a great Garison therein, because he was advertis'd, that they of Joppa intended to surrender the City to Demetrius's Forces. When Simon and Jonathan had signalized themselves by so many great actions, they returned to Jerusalem, and assembled the People together in the Temple, and persuaded them to repair the Walls of the City, and to rebuild that of the Temple that was ruined, advising them to fortifie the same with strong Towers: and besides this, he caus'd another Wall to be built in the midst of the City, to secure it against the Garison of the Citadel, to the intent that by that means they might cut off and stop up the passages to vidual the Fort. He advis'd them likewise to build far stronger Fortresses throughout the Country, than those that were already finish'd. All that he propos'd was well approved of; whereupon he took care of the City himself, and committed the Country to his Brother Simon. But Demetrius passing the River, came into Mesopotamia, with a design to make himself Master of Babylon, intending to make that the Seat of the Empire, when he should have subdu'd the other Provinces. For the Greeks and Macedonians who inhabited that Country, had solicited him often by Ambassadors to come unto them, promising him to submit to his Authority, and to serve him in the War against Arfaces King of the Parthians. Demetrius flattering himself with those hopes, march'd towards them with great speed, presuming that if he could overcome the Parthians, he might easily vanquish Tryphon, and drive him out of the Kingdom of Syria. Being therefore entertain'd by those of the Country with great joy, he levied a great Army, and made War against Arfaces, but he lost the day, and was himself taken Prisoner, as we have elsewhere declar'd.

CHAP. X.

Tryphon seeing Demetrius ruined, contrives how he might quit himself of Antiochus, that he might Reign in his stead, and likewise how he may destroy Jonathan. He deceives him, causeth a thousand of his Men to be put to death at Ptolomais, and keepeth him Prisoner.

When Tryphon understood that Demetrius was utterly ruined, he forsook Antiochus, and contrived how he might kill him, and make himself King. But the fear that he had of Jonathan Antiochus's friend, hindred his design; whereupon he resolv'd first of all to deliver himself of Jonathan, and afterwards to kill the young King Antiochus. Having therefore resolv'd to kill Jonathan by some Treason, he came from Antioch to Bothsan, (which the Greeks call Scythopolis) whither Jonathan came to meet him with 40000 chosen Men, supposing that Tryphon came thither to make War upon him. But he knowing that Jonathan came thither with so great a strength, and imagining that he could not prevail upon him by force, he had recourse to Fraud; he made him rich Presents, and accompanied them with a great deal of civility; and that he might free him from all distrust, and ruin him when he should least suspect it, he commanded the Officers of his Army to obey him in all things. After this, he invited Jonathan to come to Ptolomais, and to bring with him some few of his Soldiers, promising to deliver the City into his hands, and resign all the Fortresses that were in the Country into his possession; assuring him, That he came into that Country to no other purpose. Jonathan suspecting no sinister dealing, and believing that Tryphon spake what he intended, disbanded his Forces, and took only 3000 Men with him, whereof he left two in Galilee, and with 1000 he came to Tryphon at Ptolomais. But the Inhabitants of the City shutting the Gates as soon as he was entr'd, (according as Tryphon had commanded them) took Jonathan Prisoner, and slew all those that attended upon him. Hereupon Tryphon pretent fell part of his Army unto the 2000 that were left in Galilee, to the intent to put them all to the Sword; but they having notice of that which had befallen their Chieftain, took up their Arms,

H Arms, and departed out of Galilee, without any loss. And although the Soldiers of Tryphon exceeded them far in the number, yet were they not so hardy to attack them; because they knew that the Jews were ready to expose themselves to all Dangers, to defend their Lives: And so they returned back to him that sent them, without doing any thing.

CHAP. XI.

The Jews make choice of Simon Machabees for their General, in the place of Jonathan his Brother, who was kept Prisoner by Tryphon; who, after he had received an hundred and two Talents of his Children for his ransom, breaks his Promise, and puts him to death. Simon erects a stately Monument for his Father, and his other Brethren. He is created Prince and High Priest of the Jews. His admirable Conduct; he delivers his Nation from the Macedonian Yoke; takes by storm the Fortresses of Jerusalem, and despoils it, levelling both the Citadel and the Hill whereon it stood, even with the ground.

When the Inhabitants of Jerusalem heard of the surprisal of Jonathan, and the loss of his Soldiers, they were much troubled, that so great a man was taken from them, for they feared, (and that not without cause) that being depriv'd of his Valour and Conduct, the neighbouring Nations would invade them with all manner of Hostility, which till then they durst not attempt, standing so much in awe of Jonathan. Neither did their Expectation deceive them: For they understanding Jonathan's Death, began presently to invade the Jews on all sides, as those who had no longer any Captain under whose Conduct they might make War, and shew their Valour. And Tryphon having likewise gather'd Forces, was resolv'd to march into Judea, to make War against the Inhabitants thereof. Simon perceiving that the Citizens of Jerusalem were alarm'd with the fear which they apprehended of those Rumours and new Tumults of War; and being desirous to animate them against all Incursions and Attempts intended by Tryphon, assembled the People in the Temple, and began to exhort them after this manner:

You are not ignorant (Men and Brethren) how both I, my Father, and Brethren, have voluntarily expos'd our selves to all Dangers for your Liberty. Since therefore I have abundance of such-like Examples, and that it is the ordinary course of our Family to die for our Law and Religion, there is no fear so great as to binder me to prefer my Honour and Duty to my Life. Wherefore since you have a Commander who despiseth all danger, to procure and maintain your safety, you ought to follow me congruously to what place soever I shall conduct you. For I am of no better account than my Brethren, to value my Life more than others; neither am I less than they, to be backward and cowardly to follow their footsteps, but I shall rather glory to imitate them in dying for the defence of our Country, Law, and Religion. I will make manifest therefore by all the Testimonies that I can, that I am their true and lawful Brother; for I trust in God, that he will give me power to take Vengeance of our Enemies; and deliver not only all of you, but your Wives and Children from the Injury which they intended against you: And, by the Grace of God, I will preserve the Holy Temple, that it may not be ruin'd by their profane hands: For I already perceive, that the profane Nations despise us, and condemn you, as if you had no Leader; and I know already that they are marching forward to fight you.

By these Words Simon heartned the People, who were distracted with fear, so that they revived their Spirits, and conceived better hope. Whereupon all of them cried with a loud voice, That Simon was their General, and that he was to succeed his two valiant Brethren, Jonathan and Jonathan, in the Government; and that as touching themselves, they would be obedient in all things that he should command them. He therefore assembled in one instant all the Men at Arms in that Country, and hastened to repair the City-Walls, fortifying them with high and strong Towers, and sent a certain Friend of his, called Jonathan the Son of Alsdos, with an Army to Joppa, commanding him to turn out the Inhabitants of that City therefrom, fearing they would submit themselves to Tryphon: As for himself, he remained in Jerusalem to secure the same.

Tryphon departing from Ptolomais with a great Army, came into Judea, leading his Prisoner Jonathan with him. Whereupon Simon and his Army, went out against him as far as Adidas, (a City situate upon a Mountain, at the foot whereof beginneth the Champain Country of Judea.) Tryphon knowing that Simon was made Governour of the Jews, sent Messengers unto him, intending to circumvent him by Treason and Policy, giving him to understand. That if he were desirous of his Brethren's enlargement, he should send him one hundred Talents of Silver, and two of Jonathan's Children for Hostages, to assure him, That being set at liberty, he should not withdraw Judea from the Obedience of the King. (For, till that present, he was held and kept Prisoner, by reason of the money which he ow'd the King.)

Simon was no ways ignorant of this cunning intent of Tryphon's, but knew well enough that he should both lose his money, if he should deliver the same; and that his Brother should not be enlarged, no, though his Children were deliver'd for Hostages: On the other side, he feared, lest the People should judge sinisterly of him, as if he had been the cause of his Brother's Death, both by not delivering the Money, neither yet the Children. Having therefore assembled the Army, he declared unto them what Tryphon demanded, telling them, That the whole scope of his Actions were nothing else but treacherous Stratagems and Subtilties: Yet notwithstanding he told them, That he had rather send both the Money and the Children to Tryphon, than by refusing his Conditions and Demands, to be accus'd to have neglected the life of his Brother. Simon sent therefore both the Money and Children of Jonathan; but Tryphon having receiv'd both, kept not his Promise, but detain'd Jonathan; and leading his Army thorow the Country, intended to pass by Idumaea to repair to Jerusalem. He came therefore to Dora, a City in Idumaea; and thitherward march'd Simon to encounter with him, encamping always right over-against him. They that were in the Castle of Jerusalem, hearing news hereof, sent Tryphon word that he should hasten and come unto them, and send them munition: Whereupon he address'd his Horsemen, pretending that very night to ride unto Jerusalem; but the Snow in that time fell in such abundance, that it cover'd the way in such sort, and was so thick, as the Horses could not travel, which hindred his repair to Jerusalem. For which cause he departed from thence, and came into Celosyria, and speedily invading the Country of Galaad, he put Jonathan to death in that place; and after he had buried him there, he return'd to Antioch. But Simon sent unto Basca, and transported his Brother's Bones, and interred them in his Country Modin, in his Father's Sepulchre, and all the People mourned and lamented for him many Days. Simon also built a great Monument of white and polished Marble for his Father and Brethren, and rais'd it to a great height, and garnish'd it round about with Galleries and Pillars all of one piece, which was an admirable Work to behold. Besides that, he erected seven Pyramids for his Father, Mother, and Brethren, for each of them one, so great and so fair, as they caus'd admiration in those that beheld them, and are as yet to be seen at this present Day. So great was Simon's care, that Jonathan and the rest of his Family should be honour'd with so magnificent a Sepulchre; which Jonathan died, after he had exercis'd the place of High-Priest, and possess'd the Government for four years. Thus much as touching his Death.

As soon as Simon had taken possession of the High-Priesthood, by the election of the People; the very first year of his Government, he acquitt'd the People of the Tribute which they were wont to pay to the Macedonians. This liberty and exemption from Tribute, happen'd amongst the Jews, one hundred and seventy years since the time that Seleucus, surnam'd Nicanor, obtain'd the Kingdom of Syria. And in so great Honour was Simon amongst the People, that in their private Contracts and publick Letters, the Date began, From the First Year of Simon the Benefactor and Governour of the Jewish Nation. For they prosper'd greatly under his Government, and had the Victory of all their Neighbouring Enemies round about them. For he destroy'd the Cities of Gaza, Joppa, and Jamnia: He demolish'd or slighted also the Cittadel of Jerusalem, and level'd it with the ground, to the intent the Enemies might never seize on it any more, nor retreat thither to endanger the City, as they had done before. Which when he had brought to pass, he thought it not amiss, but very profitable, to level the Hill whereon the Castle stood, to the intent the Temple might be the eminentest place. All this he perswaded the People to do in a common Assembly, representing to them how much they had suffer'd by the Garrisons, and how much they were like to suffer hereafter, if a Stranger should once more be Master of the Kingdom, and build a Cittadel in that place. By these Exhortations he perswaded the People to finish these Works, and all of them began to work without intermission both day and night, so that in the space of three years, they levelled the Mountain; and from that time forward, there was nothing but the Temple that commanded the City. See here what Simon perform'd hitherto.

CHAP. XII.

The year of the World, 3822. before Christ's Nativity, 135.

Tryphon caus'd Antiochus, Alexander Ballez's Son, to be put to death, and is made King's Vice; rendred him so odious to his Soldiers, that they offer'd themselves up to Cleopatra, Demetrius's Relict. She married Antiochus Sother, Demetrius's Brother, and made him be crowned King; he overcame Tryphon, who fled to Dora, and from thence to Apamea, where he was taken by force, and killed. Antiochus took a great liking to Simon the great Sacrificer or High-Priest.

Not long after the Captivity of Demetrius, Tryphon killed Antiochus the Son of Alexander, surnam'd Good, notwithstanding he had the care and charge of his Education for four years that he reigned; and spreading abroad a certain report, That the young King in exercising himself, fortun'd to die; he sent his Friends and Familiars to the Souldiers, promising them, That if they would chuse him King, he would give them a great Summ of Money; giving them to understand, that Demetrius was a Prisoner among the Parthians; and that if Antiochus his Brother should obtain the Kingdom, he would punish them divers ways, and revenge the Revolt and Rebellion which they were guilty of by forsaking him. The Army hoping that if they bestow'd the Kingdom on Tryphon, it would redound highly to their profit, they proclaim'd him King. But after he had attained the fulness of his Desires, he shew'd how malicious and wicked his Nature was: For when he was a private Man, he flatter'd the People, and made a shew of moderation; and, by such Allurements, he drew them to do what he pleas'd: But after he had taken possession of the Kingdom, he discover'd his Hypocrisie, and shew'd plainly, that he was not unaptly call'd Tryphon, that is to say, Tryphler, or Mocker. By which means he lost the Hearts of the better sort; and as for his Army, it became so averse from him, that it submitted it self to Cleopatra, Demetrius's Wife, who had, at that time, confin'd both her self and her Children in Selencia. And whereas Antiochus, surnam'd the Devout, and Brother to Demetrius, was driven from place to place, and had not any City that would entertain him, for fear of Tryphon; Cleopatra sent unto him, inviting him both to be her Husband, and to take possession of the Kingdom. And hereunto did the rather draw him, partly for that she was therunto perswaded by her Friends, and partly for the fear he had, lest some one of Selencia should betray the City to Tryphon. As soon as Antiochus was arriv'd in Selencia, and that from Day to Day his Forces encreas'd, he march'd forth into the Field, and fought with Tryphon, and overcame him in Battel, and drove him out of the higher Syria, and pursu'd him as far as Phœnicia; where after he had retir'd himself into Dora, a strong and impregnable Castle, he besieg'd him therein, and sent Ambassadors to Simon the High-Priest of the Jews, to confirm a Friendship and Confederacy with him. Simon very courteously accepted his Demands, and presently sent Antiochus both Money and Victuals, sufficient to furnish his Army at the Siege of Dora; so that in short space he was accepted amongst the number of his entire Friends. Tryphon flying from Dora to Apamea, was in that place besieg'd, taken, and slain, after he had reigned three years.

CHAP. XIII.

Antiochus Sother's Ingratitude to Simon Machabeus. They come to make War; Simon gets always the better, and renews his alliance with the Romans.

But the innate Avarice that was in Antiochus, and the malignity of his Nature, made him forgetful of those Offices and Services that Simon had done him; so that he sent Seleucus, his great Friend, with a mighty Army to invade Jewry, and to surprize Simon. But he having some privy Intelligence of Antiochus's Treachery, notwithstanding that at this time he was very old, was so provoked with the Injuries that Antiochus had done him, that animated with courage more than became his age, he went himself to the War, as if as yet he had been but youthful: He therefore caus'd his Son to march before, with the best Soldiers of his Army; and having left a number of his Soldiers in ambush, in the hollow retreats of the Mountains, he execut'd all his Designs, without failing in any one of them: So that after he had every way obtained the upper hand of his Enemies, he ever after enjoy'd his Government in peace, during the remainder of his life, and renew'd likewise the Confederacy with the Romans.

Simon Machabeus, Prince of the Jews, and High-Priest, is betrayed and killed by his Son-in-Law Ptolomy, who, at the same time, makes his Relick and his two Sons Prisoners.

HE governed Judaea for the space of eight years, and was at last slain at a Banquet, by the Treachery of Ptolomy his Son-in-Law; who seizing on Simon's Wife, and his two Children; and detaining them in Prison, sent out certain of his Train besides, to kill John the third Son, surnamed Hircanus of Jerusalem. But the young Man having some inkling of their drift, retired himself speedily into the City, and avoided the danger that they plotted against him, assuring himself of the Good-will of the People, in consideration of the Benefits they had received at his Father's hands, and the Hatred that they bare unto Ptolomy; who intending to enter the City-Gates, was sharply repulsed by the Citizens, for they had already entertained Hircanus.

CHAP. XV.

Hircanus, Simon's Son, besiegeth Ptolomy in Dagon-Castle; but his great Love towards his Mother and his Brothers, (whom Ptolomy threatens to put to death, if he storm'd the Castle) made him forbear to assault it, and rais'd the Siege; after which, Ptolomy nevertheless put them to death.

WHENUPON Ptolomy retired into a certain Castle, situate beyond Jericho, called Dagon; but Hircanus was made High-Priest in his Father's stead; who, after he had recommended himself to God, by the firstling Sacrifices that he offer'd, march'd out against Ptolomy his Brother-in-Law, to make War upon him. Now when he was fully resolv'd to besiege the place whither Ptolomy was retired, he had the advantage in all other things; but only by the Affection that he bare unto his Mother and his Brethren, he was overcome. For Ptolomy having taken them, and whipt them upon the Walls in all Men's presence, threaten'd Hircanus, That unless he levied his Siege, he would cast them down headlong from the top of the Castle. Now whereas one way Hircanus had a great desire to force and surprize the place, so also on the other side he was wholly dilheartened, through the desire that he had to redeem those whom he loved, from the Enemies Tyranny. True it is, That his Mother stretching out her hands, besought him, That for her sake he would not give over valiantly to assault the place, but that he should be the more encouraged to surprize the Fortrefs, and to lay hold upon his Enemy, and to be revenged of the wrong that was offer'd unto his dearest Friends; alledging, That she thought it better to die in the midst of a thousand Torments, than that the Enemy should escape unpunished, who had been so manifest an occasion of their misery. When Hircanus heard his Mother speak thus, he was more furiously incensed to give the Assault; but as soon as he saw his Mother so beaten and sore wounded, his Heart melted within him; and the fervent Desire which he before had to batter and beat down the City, was presently allay'd and cooled: And so the pitiful Compassion of his Mother, surmounted and overcame his wrathful Desire of Revenge. Whilst thus the Siege was continued and prolonged, the year of Repose celebrated amongst the Jews; was come: For they observed the seventh Year, as the seventh Day is observed in the Week; so that by this occasion, Ptolomy was deliver'd of this Siege, who afterwards slew both Hircanus's Mother and Brethren; which done, he fled unto Zeno, surnamed Cotyla, who at that time tyrannized in the City of the Philadelphians.

CHAP. XVI.

The year of the World, 353.
before Christ's
Nativity, 133.

King Antiochus Sother besiegeth Hircanus in the Castle of Jerusalem, and raiseth the Siege after a Treaty. Hircanus accompanieth him in the War against the Parthians, where Antiochus is killed; and his brother Demetrius (whom Attaces King of the Parthians had set at liberty) taketh possession of the Kingdom of Syria.

ANTIOCHUS calling to mind the manifold losses he had receiv'd by Simon's means, invaded Jewry in the fourth year of his Reign, and in the first of Hircanus's Government, which was in the 162 Olympiade. And after he had spoil'd all the Country, he blockt up Hircanus within the City of Jerusalem, which he had belieg'd with seven Camps; yet with no advantage at all, both in regard of the strength of the Walls, and the Valour of the Citizens, besides the want of Water which he had in his Camp; which was notwithstanding remedied by a great fall of Rain, which fell about the setting of the Pleiades in the beginning of April. On the North-side also where there is a great Plain, Antiochus caus'd 100 Towers to be erect'd, every one three stories high, on which he plant'd certain Companies of Armed Soldiers, who daily fought with the besieged, and who, by the means of a double and deep Trench, depriv'd them of all conveniences. They on the other side made often Sallies, and if they chanc'd at any time to charge the Enemy on a sudden, they made a great slaughter; but if they were discover'd, they march'd back in order. But Hircanus considering the great number of People that were in the City, who rather consumed Soldiers Victuals, than performed any service, he divid'd those that were unfit for War, and sent them out of the City, retaining only those with him who were Vallant and Warlike. But Antiochus permitted them not to have free liberty to depart; so that wandering here and there between the Walls and the Camp, they were consumed with Famine, and died miserably. When as therefore the Feast of Tabernacles was to be celebrated during these affairs, they that were within, had compassion of their Country-men, and drew them within the Walls, and entertain'd them within the City. At this time Hircanus sent a messenger to beseech Antiochus to grant him Truce for seven days, by reason of the solemnity of the Feast; which he granted, for the honour, which he bare unto God. Furthermore, he sent a magnificent Sacrifice into Jerusalem of Bulls with gilded Horns, and vessels full of divers Perfumes, with other vessels of Gold and Silver. Those that had the charge of the Gates, receiv'd the Sacrifices at their hands that brought the same, and offer'd them in the Temple. Antiochus himself also gave the Soldiers certain Meats to grace their Festival, shewing himself herein to be of a fairer disposition than Antiochus Epiphanes, who, after he had taken the City, caus'd Swines flesh to be sacrific'd upon the Altar, and besprinkled the Temple with the Hogs Blood, making a confusion of the Ordinances of the Law of God, which was the cause that this Nation rebelled, and conceived a deadly hatred against him: But Antiochus, of whom we speak at this present, was by all Men call'd Devout, because of the incredible affection that he had to the service of God. Hircanus acknowledging the bounty and affection he had towards God and his Sacrifices, sent Ambassadors unto him, requiring him, That he would permit them to live according to the ancient Laws and Customs of their Forefathers, Whereupon the good King rejected their Counsel who advis'd him to destroy the Jewish Nation, for being contrary to the customs of all other People. And understanding that all the conversation of the Jews was conformable unto Piety, he answer'd the Ambassadors, That if the besieged would yield up their Arms; and pay the Tributes of Joppa, and the other Cities that were out of Judaea, and would receive a Garrison, such as he should appoint, he would discharge them of this War. They accepted all other his conditions, but they consented not to receive a Garrison, lest they should be forced to entertain such with whom they could not converse; but instead of the Garrison they gave Pledges, and paid 500 Talents of Silver, of which the King receiv'd 300 in hand, with the Pledges; amongst which, was Hircanus's Brother: and after he had beaten down the Cope and Panes of the Walls, with the other Fortifications, he rais'd the Siege, and depart'd. But Hircanus opening David's Monument, (who surpass'd all other Kings in riches, during his time) drew 3000 Talents out of the same, whereby he took occasion first of all among the Jews to entertain a Foreign Army. There was also a Friendship and Alliance betwixt him and Antiochus, whom he entertain'd in the City with all his Army, and furnish'd him largely and magnificently with all that which was necessary for the same; and that which is more, Antiochus having undertaken an Expedition against the Parthians, Hircanus march'd also in his company. Nicholas Damascene beareth witness herof, writing after this manner in his History: Antiochus erect'd a Pageant near the flood Lycus, after he had overcome In-dates General of the Army of the Parthians, and abode there two days, at Hircanus the Jews A request, by reason of a solemn Feast at that time, in which it was not lawful for the Jews to Travel, wherein he is no ways mistaken. For the Feast of Pentecost was at that present the next day after the Sabbath, and it is not lawful for us neither in our Sabbaths nor Feasts, to journey any ways. Antiochus fighting against Artabes King of the Parthians, lost the greater part of his Army, and was himself slain. His brother Demetrius succeeded him in the Kingdom of Syria, whom Artabes had set at liberty, at such time as Antiochus came into the Kingdom of the Parthians, as we have declared heretofore in another place.

CHAP. XVII.

Hircanus, after King Antiochus's death, took back again many places in Syria, and reneweth his Alliance with the Romans. King Demetrius is overcome by Alexander Zebinus, who was descended of King Seleucus; is taken afterwards in Tyre, and dieth miserably. Antiochus Grypus, being his Son, overcometh Alexander, who is killed in the Battel. Antiochus Syzichus, who was his Brother on the Mother's side, being Antiochus Sotter's Son, maketh War against him, and Hircanus in the mean time reigns peaceably in Judæa.

Hircanus hearing news of Antiochus's death, led forth his Army with all expedition against the Cities of Syria, hoping to find them unprovided both of Garisons and means of Defence, as in effect it came to pass. He therefore took the City of Medaba at the end of six Months, after that his Army had suffer'd many Calamities. Afterwards he seized Samega, and the Cities thereof; the Cities of Sichim, and Garizim also, where the Cutheans dwelt, who had a Temple there made according to the model of the Temple of Jerusalem (which Alexander the Great permitted Sanballath to build, in favour of his Son-in-law Manasse, brother to the High-Priest Jaddas, as we have heretofore declar'd) which Temple was laid desolate 200 years after it was built. Hircanus also took certain Fortresses and Cities of Idumæa, as Adora and Marissa; and after he had subdu'd all the Idumæans, he permitted them to inhabit the Country, under this condition, That they should consent to be Circumcised, and to live according to the Laws and Religion of the Jews. They, through the desire they had to live in the place where they were born, submitted themselves to be Circumcised, and to live according to the Customs and Ordinances of the Jews; and from that day forward they were comprehended within the number of the Jews. Whilst thus Hircanus was High-Priest, he thought good to renew the amity betwixt the Jews and the Romans, and to this effect he sent an Ambassage with Letters unto the Senate. As soon as the Senate had receiv'd his Letters, they made alliance with him, to this effect ensuing. Fanius M. F. Pr. assembled the Senate in the field of Mars the eighth day of February, in the presence of L. Manlius, L. F. Mentina, and C. Sempronius, C. F. Falerna; concerning that which Simon the Son of Dositheus, Apollonius the Son of Alexander, Diodorus the Son of Jason, Men of good reputation and honour, and sent Ambassadors by the People of the Jews, have propos'd; who have dealt with us as touching the confederation and amity that this Nation had with the Romans, and have likewise confer'd as touching the affairs of State, namely, that Joppa and the Ports thereof, Gazara and the Fountains thereunto belonging, and those other Cities of the Country, which Antiochus took from them, contrary to the Decree of the Senate, should be restor'd unto them; and that it may not be lawful for the King's Soldiers to pass through their Country, neither any of those Provinces that are under their Government: And that those things which were attempted by Antiochus during this War, contrary to the arrest and decree of the Senate, should be declar'd void, to the end that the Ambassadors sent in the Senates behalf, may provide for the restitution of those things which Antiochus had spoil'd them of, and may rate and set down the damages which the Country hath receiv'd by this War. Item, That Letters of recommendation should be written in the behalf of the Jewish Ambassadors, to the Kings and free People, for their secure and safe return into their Country. It hath been hold convenient, to make and ratify this Ordinance, to the end to renew friendship and alliance with Men of so good respect, sent unto them by a Nation so good and faithful towards them. And as touching the Letters, the answer was, That they should be written at such time as the affairs of the Senate would permit them any leisure; and that from this time forward they would have care that no injury should be offer'd them. And the Prætor Fanius was commanded also to deliver the Ambassadors Money out of the common Purse, to bear their charges home into their Country. And thus did Fanius dismiss the Ambassadors of the Jews, after he had given them Money out of the common Treasury, with the Decree of the Senate address'd to those that should conduct them, and give them a fire convoy, or safeguard to return into their Country. And this was the state of the affairs during Hircanus's Priesthood.

But

H But King Demetrius being sharply whetted to make War against Hircanus, could have neither time nor opportunity to fulfil his desire, by reason that both the Syrians and the Soldiers were become his Enemies, because of his wickedness of Life. For they sent Ambassadors to Ptolomey, surnam'd Physcon, to require him to send some one of Seleucus's Race unto them, to be establish'd King. Whereupon Ptolomey sent them Alexander, surnam'd Zebina, accompanied with an Army; who giving Battle to Demetrius, worsted him, and constrain'd him to flee to his Wife Cleopatra, to Ptolomeis; who neither accepting, nor entertaining him, he was constrain'd to retire from thence unto Tyre, where he was taken; and after he had suffer'd many miseries by the hands of his Enemies, he finally died. Alexander having by this means obtained the Kingdom, made a League of Amity with Hircanus. And whereas it fell out, that Antiochus, surnam'd Gryphus, the Son of Demetrius, made War against him, he was overcome and slain in the Battel. When Antiochus had taken possession of the Kingdom of Syria, he forbore to make War against the Jews, for that he had intelligence that his Brother, by the Mother's side, (who was in like sort nam'd Antiochus) assembled an Army against him at Cysicus. Remaining therefore in his Country, he resolv'd to make preparation against his Brother's coming, who was call'd Cysicenus, because he was brought up in that City, and was the Son of Antiochus, call'd the Conserver, who died in the Country of the Parthians, and who was brother to Demetrius, the Father of Gryphus; and it fell out, that both these Brothers were married to one and the same Cleopatra, as we have heretofore express'd. When Antiochus the Cysicenus was arriv'd in Syria, he made War against his Brother, which continued many years: during all which time, Hircanus lived in peace, (for presently after Antiochus's death, he revolted from the subjection of the Macedonians) and from that time forward gave them no succors, neither as Subject or Friend; but his Fortunes both augmented and flourish'd greatly, during the time of Alexander Zebina; and principally during the Reign of these two Brothers. For the War, wherein they consum'd one another, gave Hircanus an opportunity to levy all the Revenues of Judæa, without any contradiction, so that by the same means he gathered infinite sums of Money. For whilst the Cysicenus destroy'd his Brother's Country, Hircanus also made known his inclination and disposition; and seeing likewise that Antiochus was destitute of those Succors he expected out of Egypt, and that both himself and his Brother also (through their natural discords) weakened one another's Estates, he despised them both.

CHAP. XVIII.

Hircanus taketh Samaria, and ruins it totally. How much this High-Priest was in God Almighties favour. He leaveth the Pharisees, and betakes him to the Sadduces. His happy Death.

Hircanus seeing himself so powerful, resolv'd to besiege Samaria, (which was a strong City) and is at this day call'd Sebaste, because it was re-edify'd by Herod, as we will make manifest in time and place convenient. He therefore began to besiege and batter the same with all diligence; animated thereunto, because of the extreme hatred he bare the Samaritans, who, on purpose, to please the King of Syria, had offer'd many grievous affronts to the Marissens, who were defend'd from, and allied with the Jews. He therefore made a Trench round about the City, with a double Wall of 80 Furlongs, and committed the general Command of this Siege to his Sons, Antigonus and Aristobulus, who so diligently and valiantly behaved themselves, that the Samaritans being over-prefed with extreme Famine, were constrained to eat such things as were unusual and unaccustomed amongst Men, and to call Antiochus the Cysicenus to their aid: who readily repaired thither, but was repulsed by Aristobulus's Soldiers; and being pursu'd by the two Brethren as far as Scythopolis, he hardly escap'd; and they returning to their Siege, freshly assailed and besieg'd the Samaritans within their own Walls: so that once more they were constrained to send Ambassadors to Antioch for aid, who was their Ally; who sent unto Ptolomey Lathyrus, for about some 6000 Men, who furnish'd him with them, contrary to his Mother's mind, who therefore had almost thrust him out of his Dominion. As soon as he had receiv'd them, he made a road into Hircanus's Country, and spoil'd and forag'd the same as far as Egypt. For he durst not give him Battel hand to hand, because he had not competent Forces; but thought, that in spoiling the Country, he might cause them to raise the Siege, and forsake Samaria: but after he had lost a great number of his Men by divers snares of his Enemies, he went unto Tripoly, committing the general charge of that War to Callimander and Epicrates, two of his Captains. Callimander, more rashly than wisely, attempting to set upon the Enemy, was himself slain, and his Soldiers routed.

roured. And Epirates given over to covetousness, did openly yield up Scythopolis, and A other Cities, into the hands of the Jews: so that it was impossible for either of them to raise the Siege. At last, after that Hircanus had continued his Siege before the City for the space of one whole year, he became Master of it: and not contenting himself with the taking hereof, he utterly destroy'd it, enforcing the Rivers through the midst thereof; yea, he ruined the fame in such fort, that the Mud and Soil both of the Water and Earth took away all the appearance of the City, so that it seem'd as if it had never been. Of this Hircanus, there is a certain incredible matter committed to Memory; namely, how during his High-Priesthood, God had conference with him. For it is reported, That the very same day wherein his Sons fought against Antiochus the Cyzrenian, whilst being himself alone, he offer'd Incense in the Temple, he heard a voice, saying, That his two Sons had at that present overcome Antiochus: All which he incontinently signify'd unto the People at the Gate of the Temple; and according as he had said, so it came to pass. See here what occurrences hapned in Hircanus's Time.

About this very instant likewise, the affairs of the Jews prospered not only in Jerusalem and Judea, but also amongst the Inhabitants of Alexandria; and finally, in Egypt and Cyprus: For Queen Cleopatra rebelling against her Son Ptolemy Lathyrus, appointed Cleclias and Ananias, the Sons of that Onias who had built the Temple in Helopolis (according to the pattern of that in Jerusalem) her Generals. And having committed her Army unto their hands, he acted nothing without their Advice, according as Strabo the Capadocian witnesseth, speaking after this manner: Divers of those who came with us, and of those who had been sent into Cyprus from Cleopatra, suddenly revolted to Ptolemy: only the Jews, that were of Onias's Faction, remained constant in their duty, because the Queen made great account and reckoning of Chelcias and Ananias their Country-men. Thus far Strabo. This great felicity and prosperity of Hircanus, moved the Jews to conceive a hatred against him, and especially the Pharisees oppos'd themselves against him. These Pharisees were one of the Sects of the Jews, (whereof we have heretofore Treated) which Sect was so great in credit with the common People, that when they dispers'd any thing, were it against the King, or the Priest, they were presently believed. Hircanus had been one of their Disciples, and therefore was easily believed. He invited them to a Feast, and entertain'd them with all Humanity: and seeing them in a merry vein, he began to tell them, D That they knew his mind, how that he desired nothing more than to be just, and to square all his actions according to Gods will and direction, according as they themselves taught. He therefore requir'd them, that if they perceiv'd that he mistook himself in any thing, or that he wandered from the right way, they would by admonition redress the same. Whereupon all of them gave testimony of his perfect virtue, wherewith he was highly contented. But one of the company, called Elezazar, a Man of a malicious Nature, and such a one as delighted in Mutiny, said unto him, Since you desire to hear the Truth, if so be, you affect the estimation of a good Man, give over the place of Priesthood, and content your self with the Government of the People. Hircanus demanded of him the cause, wherefore he should forsake the Priesthood? Because (saith he) that we have heard say by our Ancestors, that your Mother was a Captive during the Reign of Antiochus the famous (which notwithstanding was a false report.) Hircanus hearing this, was fore moved against him, and also all other of the Pharisees, who were present. Amongst the rest there was a certain Man called Jonathan, of the Order of the Sadducees, (who maintain a contrary Opinion against the Pharisees) who was an intimate and dear friend to Hircanus, with whom he communicated the injurious Speeches that Elezazar had spoken by him, who told him, That (as he thought) Elezazar had spoken these words by the publick consent of the Pharisees; and that he might discover the same most manifestly, if he enquir'd of them what punishment Elezazar had deserved for speaking after this sort. Hircanus therefore talk'd with the Pharisees concerning his punishment, telling them, That he should very well perceive, that this injury had not been pronounced by the common consent of them all, if they condemn'd the Offender to suffer a Punishment proportionable to his Offence. Whereupon they decreed, That he ought to be punished by Imprisonment and Scourging; for (said they) an injury done in word, required no capital Punishment: And, to speak uprightly, they in their thinking censured severely enough of this fault, for that the Pharisees are naturally inclin'd to Mercy in matter of Punishment. But Hircanus was fore offended with this their answer, and imagin'd that this Elezazar had spoken after this manner, by the common instigation of the rest. This displeasure, and conceived dislike of his, Jonathan aggravated to the uttermost, and handled the matter in such sort, that he drew Hircanus to forsake the Pharisees, and to subscribe to the opinions of the Sadducees, abolishing their Ordinances, and causing them to be sharply punish'd that observe the same. These practices of Hircanus incens'd the People against him and his Sons; but we will treat of this in another place. At present I will declare how the

Pharisees

H Pharisees have made many Ordinances among the People, according to the Tradition of their Fathers, whereof there is nothing written in the Laws of Moses: For which cause, the Sect of the Sadducees rejecteth them, affirming, That they ought to keep the written Ordinances, and not to observe those that are grounded upon the Tradition of the Fathers. And great dispute and dissensions have been raised among them upon this occasion, because the richer sort only, and not the baser sort of People, adhered to the Sadducees; but the Pharisees had the Commonalty on their sides. But of these two sorts, and of the Effects, I have more exactly treated in my Second Book of the Wars of the Jews. But Hircanus finally appeas'd this mutiny, and lived afterwards in much peace and happiness; and after he had most discreetly govern'd his Princedom for the space of 31 years, he died, leaving five Sons behind him. This Man was honoured by God with three great Gifts; the Gift of Government, the Gift of Priesthood, and the Gift of Prophecy. For God spake unto him divers times by Oracles and Revelations, and gave him the knowledge of things to come; which he in such sort fore-told, That he declared that his two eldest Sons should not possess the Principality any long time: Whose end it shall not be awils to set down in what manner it was, to the intent that the Prophecy of their Father may be the better known.

CHAP. XIX.

Aristobulus, eldest Son of Hircanus, Prince of the Jews, makes himself be crown'd King; maketh his Brother Antigonus, his associate of the Crown: He imprisoneth the rest, and his Mother also, whom he caused to die for hunger. He becometh jealous of Antigonus; he maketh him be killed, and he himself afterwards dieth for Grief.

A Ristobulus, Hircanus's eldest Son, resolv'd after his Father's Death, to exchange the Principality into an absolute Kingdom; and the better to attain thereunto, he first of all set the Crown upon his Head, 481 years and three months after the People of the Jews were deliver'd from the Bondage of Babylon, and led again unto their Country. And for that Aristobulus, amongst all his other Brethren, loved Antigonus best of all, who was the nearest unto him in Age, he accepted him as a Companion in the Government of the Kingdom; but as for the rest, he shut them up in Prison. He lock'd up his Mother likewise, who had contended with him concerning the Government, (for that Hircanus had committed all things to her Disposition) and so far extended his Cruelty, that he famish'd her to Death in Prison. After he had thus us'd his Mother, he slew his Brother Antigonus also, whom he pretended to love above all the rest, and whom (as he made them) he had made Partner of his Kingdom. From whom he estranged himself, by reason of some slanders and false accusations rais'd up against him; which at the first he gave no credit to, both for that the friendship which he bare unto him, made him not regard the same, as also for that he imagin'd he was enviously slandered. It came to pass that Antigonus, returning upon a certain time from the Army with great magnificence; about the time of the Feast of Tabernacles, chanced to repair thither at that very time wherein Aristobulus hapned to fall sick. Antigonus intending to celebrate the Solemnity, ascended the Temple in great state, attended by some of his Army, to pray for his Brother's Health. Whereupon certain malicious Wretches, desirous to break the Concord that was between them, came unto the King, amplifying unto him in malicious Words, what Pomp and Majesty he had shew'd in that Solemnity; telling him, That in his actions he demean'd himself no ways like a private Man, but that all his actions were levelled at Royalty: Finally, that his intent was to enter the Kingdom by force, and to kill him; for he made account, that since he might be King alone, it was a great simplicity for him to have a Companion. But Aristobulus, although he would very hardly be induced to believe these Reports; yet notwithstanding being desirous both to extinguish the Suspicion, and to provide for his own security, he dispos'd certain of his Guard in a dark and privy place under ground, and lodged himself in a certain Tower called Antonia, commanding that no man should offer violence, except to those who entred armed; giving a further charge to his Guard, That if Antigonus entred armed he should be slain. Which done, he sent for his Brother, desiring him to repair unto him without Weapons. Which when the Queen, and they that conspired the murder of Antigonus, understood, they perswaded the Messenger to tell him the contrary, namely, That his Brother expected (in regard he prepared for War) that in that state and pomp he should come and visit him, to the end he might be an Eye-witness of his brave Figure and Preparation. But Antigonus suspecting no harm, and relying on the Good-will of his Brother, march'd all armed on foot towards Aristobulus, to shew himself in that Bravery; and when he came right over-against the Tower, that is called Straton, where the

HE afterwards set upon Sefhor, a City near unto Azob, from whence he departed with the loss of many men, with an intent to fight with Alexander, who came forth to encounter him, and met with him near unto Jordan, in a place called Asofbon, and encamped right over against the Enemy. He had in his Van-guard 8000 men, but the rest of his Forces not finding themselves so well armed, were fearful to engage, who carried brazen Bucklers. Ptolemy's Vanguard also had Bucklers after the same fashion. Philo-phanus, the Camp-master did not a little encourage them: For he caused them to pass the River which separated the two Camps, which Alexander would not oppose, promising himself the victory, if his Enemies could not retreat. In the beginning of the skirmish, each one of them fought with answerable valour; so that a great number of them fell on both sides. But Philo-phanus perceiving that Alexander's Army had the better, he took a part of his followers, and speedily seconded those who were ready to fly. The Wing of the Jews Vanguard seeing themselves freshly charged, and not succoured by any means, began to fly; and so far were those that marched next them from yielding them assistance, that all of them became partners in one shameful flight. But they of Ptolemy's side, behaved themselves far otherwise; for they pursued and slew them: and after they had put them in disorder, they charged them so hotly, that they blunted their Weapons, and wearied their Arms with killing them. It is reported that 30000 were slain in the Battel, (Timagenes saith, 50000.) As for the rest, some of them were taken Prisoners, and other some fled into their houses. After that Ptolemy had obtained this victory, he over-run and spoiled the whole Country, and in the evening, he quartered himself in certain Villages of Judea, which he found full of Women and Children, and commanded his Soldiers, without respect of person, to cut their Throats, and to chop them into pieces, and afterwards to cast the morsels into a boyling Cauldron, and when they were well boyled, to eat the same: All which he acted, to the intent that they that were fled from the Battel, and retired to their own Habitations, should know that their Enemies would eat Man's Flesh; that by this means they might be more afraid of them. Strabo and Nicholas report, that they demeaned themselves after this manner, as I have declared. And Ptolemy took Ptolemais also by force, as I have mentioned elsewhere.

But Cleopatra perceiving how her Son prospered, and how he had spoil'd Jewry, without any prejudice, and subdued the City of Gaza, she concluded with her self, that she ought not to suffer him to go on after that manner; considering it was upon the borders of Egypt, whose Sovereignty he affected. For which cause, she suddenly marched out against him with an Army, both by Sea and Land, committing the Command of her whole Forces to Chelcias and Ananias, both Jews; and sent the greater part of her Riches into the Isle of Cboos, with her Nephews, and her Will, to be reserved, and kept there in safety. And after she had commanded her Son Alexander to set sail towards Phenicia, with a great Navy, because the Inhabitants of that Country were revolted, she herself came to Ptolemais, and besieged it; when she perceived that they refused to grant her entry; Ptolemy made haste to depart out of Syria, and to enter Egypt, hoping to be Master thereof, when he should find the Country unarmed; but he was deceived: At that time it fortuned, that Chelcias, one of the two Generals of Cleopatra's Army, died in Calolyria, being in pursuit of Ptolemy. Cleopatra having Tidings of her Son's Enterprize, and that the success and fortune he expected in Egypt, had failed him, she sent part of her Army to drive him out of the Country; so that he was enforced to return back again out of Egypt, and to go and spend his Winter at Gaza. Mean-while, Cleopatra besieged and took the City of Ptolemais, whither Alexander resorted unto her with great Presents: She received him very kindly, in regard Ptolemy had used him so ill, he having now no other recourse left him but to her favour & assistance. Upon his Arrival, certain of her Familiars counselled her to lay hands on him, and to seize the Country; and not to permit that so great number of Jews, and so valiant Men, should become Subjects unto one Man. But Ananias gave her Counsel to the contrary; G alleging, That he should commit an Act of great Injustice, if he should depose him, who was her Allie, from the Government; who was, beside that, very nearly allied

H allied unto her. For (said he) I would you should know, that by committing this wrong, you shall raise in all the rest of the Jews a heinous hatred against you. Cleopatra conforming her self to Ananias's counsel, resolved with her self to offer Alexander no injury; but instead thereof, the entertain'd him as her Allie and Friend, at Scythopolis, a City of Calolyria. Now when Alexander perceived that he was freed from the fear which he had conceived of Ptolemy, he incontinently drew his Army into Calolyria, and after six months siege, took Gadara; he took shortly after Amath also (which is a great Fortrelle belonging to the Inhabitants about Jordan) where Theodore, the Son of Zenon, had hoarded up the richest and best part of his Substance; who, surprizing the Jews unawares, slew about 10000 of them and pillaged Alexander's Baggage.

I This did not any ways astonish Alexander, but notwithstanding the disaster, he marched forward toward the Cities Raphia and Antbedon, which Herod afterwards called Agrippias, situate on the Sea-coasts, and took them by force; and seeing that Ptolemy was retired from Gaza into Cyprus, and that Cleopatra, his Mother, was in Egypt, he besieged the City of Gaza, and spoilt all the Country round about it, by reason of the displeasure which he had conceived against the Citizens, for that they had sought Ptolemy's assistance against him. Apollodorus, Captain of the Gazans, made a Salley by night, and entered the Camp of the Jews, having only with him 2000 foreign Soldiers, and 1000 of his own Followers. And as long as the night lasted, the Gazans had the upper hand, because that they made their Enemies believe that Ptolemy was come to their rescue; and as soon as the day appeared, and this opinion was found false, as soon as the Jews were assured of the Truth, they turned back upon them, and charging the Gazans, they slew about 1000 of them.

Notwithstanding all this, the besieged stood out still, being neither daunted with loss of Men, nor lack of Provision whatsoever, resolving rather to endure any misery, than yield to their Enemies; and that which made them more confident, was the hope of help which they expected from Aretas, King of Arabia, who had promised no less. But it came to pass, that Apollodorus was slain before his arrival, and the City taken. For Lyfmacus his Brother, conceiv'd a jealousy against him, by reason of the good opinion which the Inhabitants had of him, and having slain him, and gather'd those fighting Men that he might, he yielded up the City unto Alexander, who at the first made a peaceable entry; but afterwards dispersed his Soldiers, and gave them licence to execute all hostility against the Citizens; so that they acted their cruelty in every place, and slew many of the Gazans. Neither did these Citizens unrevenged; but so manfully behaved themselves, that they butchered no less number of Jews, than they murdered Citizens among them. Some of them likewise perceiving themselves to be alone, set their Houses on fire, taking away first that which was therein, that the Enemy might not be enriched with their Spoils. Others killed their Wives and Children with their own hands, to deliver them from the Enemies cruelty. But the Senators, to the number of 500, fled into the Temple of Apollo, for to save themselves, but that did not secure them (for when the Enemy entered the Town, they were by chance assembled in Council) Alexander put them all to the Sword, and instantly razed and levelled that City with the ground; which done, he returned to Jerusalem, after he had spent one whole year at the Siege before Gaza.

About this time Antiochus, surnamed Gryphus, died by the Treason of Heracleon, in the 45th year of his age, & in the 29 of his Reign. His Son Seleucus had the Kingdom after him, who made War against his Uncle Antiochus, surnamed Cysicenus, and having overcome him, he slew him. Not long after, Antiochus, the son of Cysicenus, and Antoninus surnamed, the Devout, came to Arade, and crowned them, and made War against Seleucus, whom they overcame in one conflict, and drove him out of all Syria; who flying into Cilicia, and arriving again in the City of the Moscatres, he exacted a sum of Money from the Citizens. But the People were so incensed, that they set his Palace on fire, whereby it came to pass, that both he and his Friends were burnt to Dust. During the time that Antiochus the Son of Cysicenus, reigned in Syria, another Antiochus, Seleucus's Brother, made War against him; but he was not only overcome, but both he and his Army were put to the Sword. After him, Philip his Son took the Crown, and governed in certain places of Syria.

Mean while Ptolemy Lathyrus sent to Gnidus for his fourth Brother Demetrius Eucerus, and made him King of Damascus. Against these two Brothers, Antiochus made a manly and valiant resistance, but died very shortly after. For repairing to Laodicea, to succour the Queen of the Galadenians, who made War against the Parthians, he was kill'd fighting valiantly; and his two Brothers, Demetrius and Philip possessed Syria, as hereafter shall be declared. As for Alexander, his own Subjects rebelled against him; for the People arose and mutinied at such time as he assisted at the Altar to solemnize the Feast of Tabernacles;

bernales, and during the time that he intended the Sacrifice, they cast Citrons at him: A for (as we have declared elsewhere) the Jews have this Custom, that on the Feast of the Tabernacles, each one bringeth a Branch of Palm, and of Citrons. They upbraided him also with many injurious Speeches, reproaching him, that he had been Prisoner in War; and that he was also unworthy of the honour of the Priesthood. Whereupon, he being moved by these Disgraces, put to death about 6000 Men; and having made an inclosure of Wood about the Temple and the Altar (as far as the place whereto it was lawful for none to enter but the Priest;) he kept there, to the intent the People might not apprehend him; he entertained also certain foreign Souldiers, Pisidians and Cilicians. For being at odds with the Syrians, he made no use of them.

After this, having overcome the Arabians, he constrained the Moabites & Galaadites to pay him Tribute, and destroyed the City of Amath, whilst Theodore for fear gave over to resist him. But encountering with Obed King of Arabia, and being surprized and betrayed by an Ambuscado in certain miry places, he was thrust by the Crowd of Camels into a deep Trench (near unto Gadara, a Village of Galaad), from whence he almost despair'd to escape: notwithstanding, having overcome that Danger, he came to Jerusalem. And besides this, the People hated him, against whom he made War for the space of six years, and slew at the least 50000 of them: and the more he entreated them to be quiet, they grew worse against him, for what they had suffered: so that when he demanded of them, What they would have him do to please them? They all of them with one voice cried out, That he should kill himself. And thereupon they presently sent Messengers to Demetrius Eucerus, requesting him of his Favour and Assistance.

C H A P. XXII.

Demetrius Eucerus, King of Syria, comes to assist the Jews against their King Alexander, whom he defeats in a Battel, and retireth. The Jews prosecute the War alone against him; he overcomes them in several Battels, and proves extreme cruel to them. Demetrius besiegeth his Brother Philip in Beroea. Mithridates Synaces, King of the Parthians, sends an Army against him, taketh him Prisoner; he dieth shortly after.

Demetrius coming onward with his Army, and taking with him those who had invited him to the Enterprize, came and encamped near unto the City of Sichem. But Alexander gathering together some 20000 Jews (whom he knew to be well-affected towards him) with 6200 mercenary souldiers & strangers, marched forward against Demetrius, who led with him 3000 Horsemen, and 40000 Footmen. Both on the one and the other side there fell out many subtil stratagems; the one of them striving on the one side to inveigle and withdraw the foreign Souldiers, who were Grecians; and the other intorcing himself to reconcile those Jews that were of Demetrius's followers, to his Faction; but neither the one nor other prevailed at all by these devices, so that at length they were driven to decide their quarrel by the Sword; in which encounter Demetrius had the upper hand: For all the strangers that were on Alexander's side, were every one hew'd in pieces, after they had made sufficient proof both of their Fidelity and Valour. There fell also many of Demetrius's Souldiers. But after that Alexander had fled unto the Mountains, divers Jews (to the number of 6000) in commiseration of his desperate estate, and through the fear they had of Demetrius, resorted unto him; which, when the Conqueror heard, he retired himself. After this, the Jews made War against Alexander, and in divers Losses which they received, there fell a great number of them in divers combats: At length, after he had shut up the best amongst them in the City of Be-thom, he beseged them; and after he had taken the City, and brought them under his subjection, he carried them to Jerusalem, where he committed an unpeakeable and cruel Murder. For whilst he banquetted with his Concubines, in the sight of them all, he commanded 800 of them, or thereabout, to be crucified, and before their eyes whilst they yet lived, he caused their Wives and Children's Throats to be cut. All which he did to be revenged of those wrongs which he had received; but he exceeded the bounds of Humanity herein, notwithstanding they had rebell'd against him, and reduc'd him into a most pitiful estate, and put him in danger both of his Life and Kingdom. For being not content to assail and make War upon him with their Forces, they drew strangers also into his Country against him; and at length, they overpower'd him, so that he was constrained to yield up into the King of Arabia's hands, the Countries and Cities that he had conquered from the Moabites and Galaadites, for fear they should joyn with the Jews, and make War against him; besides other innumerable injuries and outrages which they committed against him. All this cannot hinder, but that he ought to be abhorred for Six thousand Men resort unto Alexander. Alexander being assailed by the Jews, beseged the mightiest of them in Be-thom.

H his cruelty, so that he was justly called Thraidas, that is to say, as cruel as a Thracian; and this Title continued amongst the Jews. The Souldiers of the contrary party, who amounted to the number of 8000; fled by night into strong and fure holds; and as long as Alexander lived, they were in exile. But at last, he was deliver'd of all these Troubles, he lived in quiet, and governed his Kingdom peaceably all the rest of his Life-time. But Demetrius marching from Judea to Beroea, beseged his Brother Philip with 10000 Foot, and 1000 Horse. But Straton Lord of Beroea, allied to Philip, called Zizus Duke of the Arabians; and Mithridates Synaces, Governour of the Parthians; unto his help; who repairing unto him with greater Forces, beseged Demetrius in his own Trenches, in which they so enclosed him, by continual shooting of Darts, and want of Water, that they constrained him, and those that were with him, to submit themselves to their Mercy. When they had spoilt the whole Countrey; and had seized on Demetrius, they sent him prisoner to Mithridates, who at that time was King of Parthia. And as for the Antiochians, as many of them as were found in the Camp, were suffered to be gone with the safety of their Lives and Baggage, and to return to Antioch. But Mithridates, King of Parthia, honour'd Demetrius by all means possible, until he was surprized with a Sickness, whereof he died. Immediately after the Battel, Philip came into Antioch, and having obtained the Kingdom, ruled over Syria.

C H A P. XXIII.

R Drivers Wars of the Kings of Syria. Alexander, King of the Jews, takes many Places. His Death, and his Advice to his Queen Alexandra, to insinuate her self in the favour of the Pharisees, for to gain the Love of the People.

A After this, Antiochus called Dionysius (who was Philip's Brother) came into Damascus to make himself Master of it, which he did quickly, in his Brother's absence, who was gone against the Arabians. When his Brother Philip (who had an Army in a readiness to invade the Arabians) had tidings hereof, he came to Damascus with great speed, and made him surrender up the City, both by the means of Milesus, whom Antiochus had left Governor in the Castle, & also by the Consent of the Citizens themselves. But Philip shew'd himself ungrateful towards Milesus, performing nothing of that which he had promised him, at the recovery of the City; that the World might think that the fear of his Power, and not Milesus's Favour, was the cause of the Surrender of Damascus. Which Act of his made Milesus suspect him, and was the cause that he lost the City again. For departing from thence, to exercise himself at Tilt, Milesus lock'd the Gates against him, and kept the City for Antiochus. Who having Intelligence of that which had befallen Philip, returned out of Arabia, and at that very instant led his Army into Judea, in which were 8000 Foot, and 800 Horse. Alexander fearing his approach, made a deep Trench from Carpasaba, (which is called at this day Antipatris) as far as the Sea of Toppa, (which was the only Streight whereby he might be assailed) and made a Wall fortified with wooden Towers, with their Courts of Guard, distant the one from the other 150 Furlongs, to keep back Antiochus. But he fired all his Fortifications, and made his Army pass into Arabia through this Streight. The King of Arabia retired upon the first assault; but afterwards he presently came into the Field with 10000 Horsemen, whom Antiochus charged very valiantly, and in the onset lost his Life, (yet with victory) whilst he fought to succour a company of his Men that were hard put to it. After Antiochus's death, his Army retir'd to the Borough of Cana, where divers of them died for hunger.

After him Aretas reign'd in Calofyria, who was call'd unto that Kingdom by those that held Damascus, and hated Protomy the Son of Menneus. Aretas led his Army into Jewry, and got a victory against Alexander, near to Addia; which done, he retired out of Judea upon a composition made between them. Moreover, once more Alexander march'd towards the City of Dion, and took it. And afterwards he led his Army against Essa, Certain Cities where Zeno had hoarded up his chiefest Riches; and before he assailed the Fortres, he inviron'd the place with three huge Walls, which he built round about it, and having taken it by force, he marched to Gaulana and Seleucia; which having overcome, he made himself Master of a valley, called the Valley of Antiochus, with the Fortres of Gamala. And objecting many crimes against Demetrius, the Lord of those places, he dispossessed him of his government. Then after he had made War for the space of three whole years, he returned into his Countrey; where the Jews entertained him willingly, by reason of the happy Exploits which he had achieved.

About the same time the Jews were already possessed of the Cities of Syria, Idumaea, and Phoenicia; of the Tower of Straton, Apollonia, Toppa, Jammia, Aza, Goza, Antbedon, Raphia,

This last City was destroyed by them, because the Inhabitants would not promise to be converted to the Religion of the Jews, with divers others of the principal Cities of Syria also, which were conquer'd by them.

After this, King Alexander fell sick, by the means of a Surfeit and Drunkenness; and for the space of three years, he was sick of a Quartan Ague. Nevertheless he continued for the space of three years, until such time that being wearied with Toil, he died on the borders of the Country of the Gerasens, as he besieged Regaba (which is a Castle situate on the other side of Jordan.) The Queen perceiving that he was at death's door, & that there remained neither hope of Life, nor Recovery, she began to weep and lament, and rebote her Breasts, because both she and her Children were likely now to be left desolate, and in these words she bemoaned her self unto him: To whom wilt thou leave both me and thy Children, in the state wherein we are? Or why should we survive or live one after another, considering that thou assuredly knowest that the hearts of thy people are averse from us? Hereupon the King comforted her, and gave her this counsel, That if she would assure the Kingdom both unto her self and her Children, she should behave her self according to his direction; which was, first to conceal his death, and not to suffer his Soldiers to have notice thereof until she had taken this Castle. Which done, he advised her to repair unto Jerusalem in pomp and triumph; and that being there, she should bestow some authority upon the Pharisees, who would sound her praise, and obtain her the peoples favour. For (said he) these kind of Men are in great esteem and credit with the people, and can do much hurt unto those they hate, and benefit them very mightily towards whom they are well affected: For the people easily believe them, when they find fault with any Man, notwithstanding it be of envy; and that himself also had incurred the displeasure of the people for their sakes, in that he had offended them.

When as therefore (said he) thou shalt arrive in Jerusalem, send thou for the chiefest amongst them, and pray them to come unto thee; and after you have shewed them my dead Body, use the most plausible Speech that you can, and give them permission to dispose of my Body as they please, whether it be their pleasure to interdict and deny my Funeral, (in that they have received many indignities by me) or whether to be revenged, they will of their own Manners and Discourse towards them, it will come to pass, that I shall be buried by them with great magnificence (which otherwise I could not be by any other means) because they will offer no outrage to my body, no although you shall permit them: And besides that, you shall reign in more assurance and quiet.

Having given his Wife these Advancements, he gave up the Ghost, after he had reigned 27 years, and lived 49.

C H A P. XXIV.

King Alexander leaveth two Sons, Hircanus, who was High-Priest, and Aristobulus. Their Mother, Queen Alexandra, gaineth the favour of the People through the Pharisees means; having given them great authority, she consents, through their persuasion, to put the most faithful of the King her Husband's Servants to death; and to please the rest of them, she giveth them the Government of the most considerable Places. Tygranes, King of Armenia, invades into Syria. Aristobulus endeavourereth to make himself King. The Death of Queen Alexandra.

After that Alexander had taken the Castle of Regaba, he conferreth with the Pharisees, according to her Husband's Counsel, and committed unto their discretion not only that which concerned her Husband's Funeral, but also the government of the Kingdom, whereby the not only appeased the displeasure which formerly they had conceived against Alexander, but also obtained their good will and friendship. They came and deigned amongst the People, making an oration of the Actions and Deeds of Alexander, lamenting every where that they had lost a good King, and by praising him, they incited the People to great grief and lamentation; so that they buried him with more magnificence than any King that reigned before him. This Alexander left two Sons behind him, the one called Hircanus, the other Aristobulus, and by his Testament committed the government of the Kingdom to Alexandra his Wife. For Hircanus was incapable to manage affairs, and rather delighted in peace and quiet; and Aristobulus, who was the younger, was both active and fit for Government. The People were well affected towards Alexandra, because she had manifestly expressed how greatly she milked her Husband's Milkgovernment.

She appointed Hircanus High-Priest, (both in regard of his age, as also for that by nature he was addicted to peace and quiet;) and committed all things to the disposing of the Pharisees, commanding the People to obey and serve them. She also renewed and confirmed that which Hircanus had disannulled, and the Pharisees (according to the Customs of their Forefathers) had introduced; so that she bare the Name, and the Pharisees the Authority Royal. For they restored such as were banished, to their Estates, and delivered Prisoners; and in all things they demeaned themselves like great Lords. Alexandra also for her part, undertook the care of the Common-wealth, and kept a great number of Soldiers in pay, and increased her power in such sort, that the Tyrants round about feared her, and deliver'd the Hostages and Pledges of Peace. All the Country was at quiet, only the Pharisees troubled the Queen, persuading her to put those to death who had counselled King Alexander to put those 800 to death (of whom we have spoken before,) and they themselves afterwards slew one that was called Diogenes, and after him, divers others, one after another; until such time as those in authority came unto the Royal Palace, accompanied with Aristobulus, (who seemed to be displeased with that which had been done, and who, if the occasion were offered, made shew that he would not permit his Mother to govern after that manner,) and told her that which had happened, and in what dangers they had been, to express their duty and loyalty which they owed to their deceased Master, and how for that cause they had been greatly honoured by him; requiring of her, that she would not utterly frustrate them of their hopes, which they expected for their service; that now they that had escaped from the danger of their foreign Enemies, were in their Houses murdered like Beasts by their private Foes, without any relief or succors from any one. They furthermore urged, that if their Adversaries would content themselves with those they had slain, they would endure their Misfortune patiently; by reason of the sincere affection they bare unto their Lords; but if they must needs as yet suffer the like, they required that they might have liberty to retire. For that they would not procure their safety otherwise than by her consent; and would rather suffer a voluntary death near unto her Royal Palace, if they might not be spared; for that it would be a shame both for themselves, and for the Queen, if by her toleration, those who had been her deceased husband's friends, should be thus abused by them which were his enemies.

That Arctas, King of Arabia, and other Princes, would be glad of this news; to hear that she should deprive her self of those whose names have been dreadful even amongst those neighbouring Kings who have but heard of them. And if she had resolved to make more account of the Pharisees favour, than of their service, they intreated her that she would at least distribute them in several Castles; that rather than any ill should fall upon their Sovereign Alexander's House, they were content to lead their Lives in that contemptible and despicable condition. Whilst thus they spake, directing their supplications to Alexander's Soul, praying him to have compassion as well of those that were already dead, as of those who were in danger of their lives, the tears ran from the eyes of all the Assistants, and Aristobulus above the rest, was heartily discontent, and expressed the same, by finding fault with his Mother. But they themselves were the cause of their own calamity, because that against all right and reason, they had permitted a head-strong and ambitious Woman to reign over them, as if the King had no Heirs refer'd to succeed him in the Kingdom. The Queen, uncertain how to determine the matter at that instant, committed the charge of all her Castles into their hands, reserving only Hircanus, Alexandrian, and Macchabon, wherein the Prince's Moveables and Wealth was kept.

Not long after, the sent her son Aristobulus with a strong Army, commanding him to draw his Forces towards Damascus, against Ptolemy, called Mennæus, who was an ill Neighbour unto that City; but he returned thence, without doing any memorable action. About the same time news was brought, that Tygranes, King of Armenia, invaded Syria with 50000 Men of War, intending shortly to set upon Jewry. This rumour affrighted the Queen, and all the Commonalty, (and not without cause.) Whereupon, she sent Ambassadors with many Princely Presents unto Tygranes, who besieged the City of Ptolemais, (For Queen Seleua, otherwise called Cleopatra, reigned in Syria, and persuaded the Syrians to deny Tygranes passage.) But Alexandra's Ambassadors met with the King of Armenia, and pray'd him to conceive a good opinion of their Queen, and of all the whole Nation of the Jews; who received them willingly, commending them for that they had sought him out so fast to do him honour, and put them in good hope. After the taking in of Ptolemais, it was told Tygranes, that Lucullus pursued Mithridates (who was not as yet apprehended, for that he was fled into Iberia, which was the cause that Lucullus had entered Armenia, and plunder'd it. Tigranes hearing this News, returned back into A his own Country.

After this, Queen Alexandra fell sick of a dangerous Disease, whereby Aristobulus took occasion to intermeddle with the affairs of State. Walking therefore abroad one night attended by a trusty Servant, he repaired into those Castles which were committed to the custody of his Father's Friends; for he had disliked his Mother's government long, and feared more than ever, that if he should die, all her posterity should be made subject to the power of the Pharisees: For he perceived how unfit his elder Brother was to govern the Kingdom, unto whom notwithstanding, the Succession appertained: only his Wife, whom (accompanied with his Children) he had left with Alexandra, had an inkling of his intent. He therefore went first of all to Agaba, where Galestes, one of the chiefest Potentates, commanded, who entertained him with great joy.

The next day, the Queen heard that Aristobulus was departed from Court, the little suspected at first, that he was retired to work some alteration in the State. But when Messengers came flocking one after another, and told her, that after the first Castle, the second; and after the second, all the rest had consequently been surprized by Aristobulus; at that time both the Queen and the whole Nation were alarm'd, fearing lest he should presently usurp the Sovereignty: But above all, they feared lest he should revenge himself on those who had abused his Servants: and it was thought fit, that both his Wife and Children should be committed to the Castle that adjoined to the Temple. But from all parts round about there resorted Souldiers to Aristobulus, so that he was attended like a King: For in the space of some 15 days, he took 22 Forts, whither he made his Retreats, and assembled an Army of Souldiers, and levied them amongst the Lords that inhabited Libanus and Trachonitis: For the multitude had always resort to the stronger side, supposing that if they submit thereunto willingly, and maintain and authorize the same, that they shall draw some profit thereby, as being those that were the occasion of the confirmation of his Monarchy.

Hereupon, the ancient Jews and Hircanus repair'd unto the Queen, humbly intreating her to take some mature counsel and good advice concerning the present affairs, because that Aristobulus her Son was already very near Lord of the whole Countrey, since he had so many Forts under his command: Besides, that it was inconvenient and undecent for them to consult without her express order, notwithstanding she were grievously sick, but that the present danger compelled them. The Queen desired them to do that which they thought should be most profitable for the Common-weal; telling them, That they had many means for that their Nation was mighty, great, and strong, and had great store both of money and riches in the common Treasury; shewing them, that because she knew that she had not long to live, she had no more reason to take care of those affairs. Having spoken thus, she died, after she had reigned nine years, and lived in all 73. This Woman was endued with greater excellency than could be expected from one of her Sex, and express'd both in her Actions and Ordinances how fit she was to govern a Kingdom, and how unworthy some Princes are of the Dignities they have amongst Men. For making more Account of the present than future Occurrences, and neglecting all other things in respect of those which are requisite in a moderate Government, she never, upon any instigation whatsoever, perverted Justice; notwithstanding her family fell into such inconveniences, that the same Sovereignty which she had obtained by divers Dangers and Labours, was not long after that, ruin'd and lost for her scarce effeminate desires. For she gave ear unto those who were ill-affected towards her posterity, and left the Kingdom destitute of such as were fit to govern; so that the Government which she enjoyed during her Life-time, was after her Death distracted with infinite Troubles and Calamities, wherewith her Family was involved: And notwithstanding her Government after this manner, yet during her Life-time, she kept the Kingdom in Peace. And thus died Alexandra.

CHAP. I.

After the death of Queen Alexandra, Hircanus and Aristobulus, her two Sons, come to battel, Aristobulus gets the Victory; and afterwards, in a Treaty, Aristobulus, though youngest, is to have the Crown, and Hircanus is contented to live privately.

also to beautifie the same with Ornaments of Eloquence, that the Reader may peruse their A Writings with the more Delectation. But, aboveall things, they must have an especial care to set down the Truth exactly, that they who know not how these things came to pass, may be the more duly and fully informed.

When as therefore Hircanus had taken upon him the High-Priesthood, in the third Year of the Hundred seventy and seven Olympiad, and in the Year that Q. Hortensius and Q.
Metellus (called the Cretensian) were Consuls at Rome, Aristobolus suddenly undertook the War against Hircanus, and fought with him near unto Jericho; where a great number of Hircanus's Followers submitted themselves of their own accord to Aristobolus. Through which accident, Hircanus was forced to flee to the Fortrefs of the higher City, where Alexander, Aristobolus's Mother, had imprisoned both his Wife and Children (as before is explained.) The rest of the Faction, for fear of his Brother who had gotten the Victory, returned themselves within the Precincts of the Temple, where they were besieged and taken.

After this, a Peace was treated of betwixt both the Brethren, and their Difference was decided in this manner: That Hircanus should pass the rest of his Life without meddling with State Affairs, and Aristobolus should reign. This League was ratified between them in the Temple, and confirmed with Oaths, conjunction of Hands and Embraces, in the sight of all the People: Which being finished, Aristobolus retired himself into the Palace, and Hircanus to Aristobolus's Lodging, to lead a private and quiet Life.

C H A P. II.

Antipater an Idumean; persuades Hircanus to flee, and to retire himself to Aretas, King of the Arabians, who promiseth to re-establish him in the Kingdom of Judea.

But a certain Friend of Hircanus, (by Nation an Idumean, and by Name Antipater) being very rich, and by Nature both factions and industrious, was as much Aristobolus's Enemy, as Hircanus's Friend. True it is, that Nicholas Damascene writeth of this Man,
That he was defended of the noblest amongst those Jews who returned from Babylon to Jewry: But this he did on purpose to gratifie Herod. Antipater's Son, who, by a casualty, became afterwards King of the Jews (as we will express hereafter in time and place convenient.) This Antipater was at the first called Antipas, according to his Father's Name, who (as it is reported) was made Governour of all Idumea by King Alexander and his Wife; and afterwards made a League with the Arabians, Gazacans, and Ascalonites, corrupting them, and insinuating himself into their Favours, by divers great Presents bestowed upon them. This young Antipater considering with himself what Aristobolus's Power was, and fearing lest some mischief might befall him, through the hatred the young King had conceived against him, he communicated with certain of the greatest among the Jews, and secretly and cunningly incited them against Aristobolus, telling them, That they had done amiss, both to see and suffer Aristobolus to detain the Kingdom unjustly in his hands, and to dispossess his elder Brother Hircanus, to whom by rights of Inheritance it did belong. He likewise accosted and sounded Hircanus ordinarily with these Words, telling him, That he lived in danger of his Life, and would doubtless be snared, except he sought his own security, and fled his evident danger: alledging, That Aristobolus's Friends would never cease to consult how they might shorten his Life, to the end that he might live in more security. To these Insigations of his, Hircanus gave small credit (for that of his own Nature he was courteous, and could not easily be induced or seduced by Detractions) but this negligence and carelessness in him, was the cause that he was accounted a silly Man. On the contrary side, Aristobolus was of a different and more Heroick Nature, being more active in performance; and careful to prevent.

Now although Antipater saw that Hircanus made small account of his Insigations, yet he ceased not daily to invent and propose new firmises and accusations, urging Aristobolus's hatred and practice to murder him; and prevailed so by his importunity, that at last he persuaded him to flee to Aretas King of Arabia, promising him, That in so doing, he would give him both aid and assistance. Hircanus was the more easily to be induced to follow Anti-pater's Advice, for that Arabia was the more easy to be induced to follow Antipater to Aretas, to take assurance of him that he should not betray him into his Enemies hands, if he should submit himself unto him, and require his assistance. When Antipater had received his assurance from the King, he returned to Jerusalem, unto Hircanus; and not long after that, took him away with him, and departed the City by night, and afterwards with great Journeys arrived at Petra, where Aretas kept his Royal Court. And being very familiar with the King, he entreated him to re-establish him in the Kingdom of Jewry, and did so much by his importunity and the Presents which he gave him, that he

A persuaded Aretas to attempt the matter. Whereupon Hircanus promised, That if he confirmed him again in his Royal Dignity, he would, upon the recovery of his Realm, restore unto him those twelve Cities which his Father Alexander had taken from the Arabians, the names whereof are these that follow: Medaba, Nabello, Livias, Tharabasa, Agada, Atbona, Zoara, Orona, Narissa, Rydda, Lusa, Oryba.

C H A P. III.

Aristobolus is enforced to retire into the Castle of Jerusalem. The King Aretas beseegeth him. The cruelty of some Jews who stoned Onias, a just man, to death. The punishment which God inflicted upon them for it.

Aretas, induced by these promises, was content to send forth an Army against Aristobolus, and himself in person conducted in that expedition 5000 Men, Foot and Horse, and had so much the upper hand of his Enemy, that divers after this Victory, of their own accord, submitted themselves to Hircanus: and Aristobolus perceiving himself to be destitute of all his friends and followers, fled unto Jerusalem. The King of Arabia followed him with all expedition, and besieged him in the Temple: in this siege the common people assisted Hircanus, neither were there any but the Priests only that stuck to Aristobolus's side. Whereupon Aretas drew up the Forces he had, and busily set the Army both of Jews and Arabians about the siege. Whilst these things were thus, the feast of unleavened bread, which we call the Passover, was at hand, and the Princes of the Jews forsaking their Country, were fled into Egypt. About that time, a certain man called Onias (such an one who for his vertue was beloved of God, and in times past, had by his devout prayers and supplications, in a time of drought, obtained rain from God) hid himself, perceiving that this sedition would be of some continuance. This man therefore being surprized, and brought into the Camp of the Jews, they required him that as by his prayers he had obtained water, so at that time likewise he would by his imprecations incurse God against Aristobolus and his adherents. But whereas he refused and excused himself, he was at last constrained by the people to perform their request; so that standing up in the midst of them, he spake after this manner.

O God, King of the whole World, since they who are at this present here with me are thy people, and those that are besieged are thy Priests, I humbly beseech thee, that when they shall require thee to be incensed against their brethren, thou wilt not hear them: and when as likewise they shall provoke thee against the other, thou wilt not respect them.

Hereupon a certain sort of reprobate Soldiers amongst the Jews, hearing these words of his, stoned him to death: But God immediately punished this cruelty in them, and the murder of Onias so curiously perpetrated, was revenged by this means which ensueth.
Aristobolus and the Priests being besieged, the Feast of Easter or the Passover fell out, during which time it was an usual custom among the Jews to honour God with many sacrifices: Now they who were with Aristobolus, not having any beasts to offer up in sacrifice, they requested the other Jews that were without, That they might have some delivered unto them for their money. Whereunto it was answered, That if they would give one thousand drachms for every head, they should have some delivered unto them. To this demand of theirs, Aristobolus and the Priests that were with him, willingly condescended, and let down the prefixed price, and delivered the same from the wall: but the others, after they had received the money, delivered them not those beasts which they desired them to sell them to sacrifice; but they were so impious, that they falsified their oaths not only towards men, but defrauded God also, in denying that which they had promised toward the furnishing of their sacrifice. For which cause, the Priests (being defrauded in this manner, contrary to the oath and protestation of their adversaries) besought God to shew vengeance on their Country-men, that had committed this heinous and perjurous impiety: neither did God defer their punishment, but immediately after he sent a great and violent Wind, that despoiled all the fruits of the Country; so that a measure of Wheat was sold for eleven drachms.

Meanwhile Pompey sent Scaurus in Syria (himself being in person detained in Armenia, in pursuit of the War betwixt him and Tigranes.) When Scaurus came unto Damascus, he found that Metellus and Lollius had newly taken the City; for which cause he marched on towards Jewry: where being arrived, certain Ambassadors came unto him in the behalf of Aristobolus, and others also in the name of Hircanus, requiring alliance and confederacy in the behalf of them both, and offering from each of them a Tribute of 400 Talents. But Scaurus preferred Aristobolus's promises, because he was the ablest, and of the noblest spirit, and withal more moderate in his demand: where-as Hircanus was poor and covetous, notwithstanding he demanded greater things than his brother did: for it was a harder matter to subdue a City that was so strong, than to beat a company of runagate Nabatheans, and scarcely well animated to prosecute that War. For these causes therefore he, (receiving his money) raised the siege, commanded Aretas to return; which if he refused, he declared him an Enemy to Rome. This done, Scaurus returned to Damascus, and Aristobolus led forth his Army against Aretas and Hircanus; and fighting with them in a place called Papyron, he obtained the victory, and killed about some 7000 of his Enemies, amongst the number of which, was Cephalus, Antipater's Brother.

Not long after this, Pompey came unto Damascus; and as he travelled through Cælo-syria, divers Ambassadors resorted unto him from all parts of Syria, Egypt, and Jewry. For Aristobolus sent him a Present of great value, namely, a golden Vine of 500 Royal Present Talents, price. Hereof Strabo the Cappadocian maketh mention in these words:

There came an Ambassador out of Egypt, bearing a Crown of 4000 pieces of gold, and another from Jewry, with a Vine or Garden, and the Workmanship was called Terpole, that is to say, Recreation: I have seen this Vine at Rome, in the Temple of Jupiter Capitoline, having the inscription of Alexander King of the Jews; and it was esteemed and valued at 500 Talents. It is said that Aristobolus Prince of the Jews sent the same.

Straight after this, there came other fresh Ambassadors to Pompey, (Antipater from Hircanus, and Nicodemus from Aristobolus) who accused those that had taken Money, namely Gabinius, for that he first of all had received 300 Talents, besides other Presents; and secondly Scaurus, who had received 400, alleging, that by that means they had incensed them against him. He therefore gave direction, that they should repair unto him about the Spring, each of them to justify and maintain their several Rights: as for himself, he drew his Forces from their wintering places, and marched towards Damascus destroying in his way a certain Fortrefs which Antiochus the Cyprean had fortified in Apamea. He visited also the Countrey of Ptolemy Mennaues (who was a wicked and perverse man, and no ways differed from Dionysius Tripolitanus) who was punished with the loss of his head, and was united also with him in friendship and affinity; yet with the loss of the death he deserved, by the means of a 1000 Talents Ranom, which Ptolemy distributed amongst his Soldiers for their Pay. He demolished likewise the Castle of Lyfias (wherein a Jew called Syllas tyrannized) and passing by the Cities of Heliopolis and Chalcis, and having likewise ascended the mountain (which is between them) he came to Cælo-syria, and from Pella repaired to Damascus. In which place he gave audience to the Jews, and their Princes Hircanus and Aristobolus, who were at odds the one against the other, concerning their particular Interests: the Jews complained against Hircanus and Aristobolus both, and alleged, that they would not be governed by Kings, because their custom was to obey God's Priests, whom they honoured, affirming that these two brethren (who were defended of the race of Priests, endeavoured to draw their Nation under a different form of government, and to reduce them under slavery. Hircanus Aristobolus, and had only but a small portion of the Countrey allotted him, because Aristobolus had seized the rest by force. He complained likewise of those incursions that both by Land and Sea Aristobolus's followers had endangered their Frontiers with. For the people had not revolted, if he had not been a violent and turbulent man. To this accusation of his, a thousand of the principallst of the Jews (drawn out by Antipater's persuasion) subscribed. But Aristobolus answered, That Hircanus was dispossessed of the Kingdom, by reason of his incapacity, and natural defects, alledging for himself, That the government was forced on him of necessity, left it should be transported to others: he protested that he challenged no other title than that which his Father Alexander had had. He brought in also for his Witnesses certain arrogant young men, who were hated for their pomp, purple Robes, their curiosity in painting and curling their Hair, and other braveries which they presented, not like men who intended to hear a Case decided, but rather to shew their vanity. After that Pompey had heard them, he condemn'd Aristobolus's violence, but for that time he dismiss'd them (after some favorable and gracious conference) promising them that he would come into their Countrey, and determine their differences, after he had seen the Region of the Nabatheans: commanding them in the mean while to live in peace. He used Aristobolus likewise very kindly, fearing lest he should incense the people, and shut up his passage: which notwithstanding came to pass. For Aristobolus came into the City of Delion, and from thence went into Judea, without regarding what Pompey had commanded him.

C H A P. VI.

Pompey is offended at Aristobolus's retreat. He marcheth against him. Their several meetings without taking any effect.

Pompey hearing this, was very much displeased; and taking with him his Army which he had prepared against the Nabatheans (with the supplies he had in Damascus, and the rest of Syria, besides the other Roman Companies that he had) he marched forth against Aristobolus: when he had passed Pella and Scythopolis, he came to Coreas (which is the entrance into Judea) drawing toward the heart of the Countrey. There he found a strong Castle situate upon the top of a Mountain called Alexandrioh, whither Aristobolus was retired. He sent to invite him to come and parley with him: who persuaded by the counsel of many of his best friends, by no means to make War against the Romans, came down to him, and after he had debated his title with his Brother, concerning the Kingdom, Pompey permitted him to return again into his Castle. And this he did two or three times, always flattering Pompey through the hope he had of the Kingdom. Meanwhile he retired himself, and fortified the place, and made preparation for the War, lest Pompey should alot the Kingdom to Hircanus. Pompey commanded him to deliver up the Fortresses that he held, and to write with his own hand to the Captains of the Garrisons (who otherwise would not have obeyed him.) Aristobolus submitted, but was so displeased, that he repaired to Jerusalem, on purpose to make preparations for War. Immediately after, Pompey marched towards him with his Army; and a messenger coming from Pontus, brought him news of Mithridates's death, who was slain by his Son Pharnaces.

Pompey marcheth out against Aristobolus.

Aristobolus descendeth from his Fortrefs, to confer with Pompey.

Aristobulus repents, cometh to Pompey, and treateth with him: But his Soldiers refusing to deliver the money that he had promised, and to receive the Romans into Jerusalem, Pompey keepeth him Prisoner, and besiegeth the Temple where Aristobulus's men were retired.

Pompey having encamped near Jericho (where there was a number of Date-trees, and where also groweth that Balm which is the most precious of all other ointments, distilling from a little shrub, which is opened and slit by a sharp cutting stone) the next morning he marched towards Jerusalem. Aristobulus (being forry for his misbehaviour) came unto him, offering him money: and promising him to receive him into Jerusalem, he intreated him to lay aside all quarrels, and to order all as he himself thought fit, without coming to War. Whereupon Pompey pardon'd him, and ascended to his request, and sent Gabinus with his Soldiers, both to receive the money, as also to enter the City, but could do neither, for Aristobulus's Soldiers would not permit that any promise should be perform'd: which Pompey took so ill, that after he had committed Aristobulus to Prison, he went in Person against the City, which was strongly fortified on every side, except toward the quarter that extendeth Northward, which was easie to be beaten down: for this side is invironed with a large and deep Valley, compassing the Temple, which is inclosed with a very strong stone-wall.

CHAP. VIII.

Pompey, after a three Months siege, took the Temple of Jerusalem by assault, and forboreth plundering of it. He lessens the Jews power. He leaveth Scarcus to command his Army; carrieth Aristobulus Prisoner to Rome, with Alexander and Antigonus his two sons, and his two daughters. Alexander maketh his escape out of Prison.

Jerusalem partly betrayed, partly besieged by Pompey.

Pompey maketh preparation to besiege the Temple.

In the mean time the City of Jerusalem was divided, for some thought good to yield up the City to Pompey; others (that were of Aristobulus's faction) counselled that the Gates should be kept shut, and preparation for War should be made, because the Romans detained Aristobulus Prisoner. The last prevailing, seized the Temple: and breaking down the Bridge which was betwixt it and the City, resolved to stand on their defence. But the others not only deliver'd the City into Pompey's hands, but the Royal Palace also, who sent Piso his Lieutenant thither with his Forces to take possession thereof, and to plant his Garrisons therein, and to fortifie the houses near the Temple. First therefore Pompey offer'd the besieged certain Conditions of Peace, which when they refus'd, he shut them in on every side, being in all these his endeavours assisted by Hircanus. Pompey incamped with his Army on the North-side of the Temple (which was the easiest to be assaulted) on this side also there were certain high Towers, and a huge Trade, besides a deep Valley that begirt the Temple. For on the City-side there was such Precipices, that there was no passage, the bridge being broken. The Romans wrought vigorously in cutting down of Trees to make Bulwarks, which being done, they planted great Machines and Engines that Pompey had caused them to bring from Tyre; they threw great stone Bullets with them to batter the Temple. The Romans had hardly got their Works accomplished, if the strict keeping of the Sabbath had not hinder'd the besieged to make any opposition that day. For the Law permitteeth them to defend themselves against their Enemies, being assaulted, but not to assault them when they intend any other Work. Which when the Romans understood, they neither gave assault, nor proffered skirmish on those days which we call Sabbaths: But they built their Fortifications and Towers, and planted their Engines, so that the next day they were ready to put them in execution against the Jews. And hereby it is easie to conjecture, how incredible the piety of our Nation is, and how studious and industrious it is in observing the Divine Laws.

For notwithstanding any present or imminent danger, they never desisted to offer their solemn Sacrifices: twice a day, in the morning, and about the ninth hour, the Priests offered duly upon the Altar. For when the Temple was taken (in the third month, and on a fasting day, in the hundred seventy ninth Olympiad, in the year wherein Cajus Antonius, and Marcus Tullius Cicero were Consuls) the Enemy entred the Temple by force, and kill'd all they met. Yet notwithstanding all this, the Priests ceased not to offer their accustomed Sacrifice: and neither the hazard of their lives, nor the great number of those that were kill'd, could force them to it; they held it more convenient for them to endure all things that might befall them in attending upon the Altar, than to transgress or vary one jot from their ordinances. And that this may seem to be no fable, or praife

Nativity, 61.

A praise of their dissembled devotion, but the exact and perfect truth: all those that write the Histories concerning Pompey and his acts, do witness no less: amongst the number of which are Strabo, Nicholas, and Titus Livius the Roman Historiographer, the most famous among the rest. The greatest of these Towers was battered by those Engines, and fell, bearing a great Pane of the Wall to the Earth with it, which was the cause that the Enemies in multitudes brake in by the breach. The first that ascended the Wall, was Gaius Julius Faustus, the son of Sylla, with his Soldiers. After him mounted the Centurion Furius, accompanied with those that follow'd him on the other side; and through the midst of the breach did the Centurion Furius enter with a strong Squadron. The whole threat of the breach with dead Bodies, and some of the Jews died by the Romans swords, others slew one another, the rest cast themselves down headlong from the Precipices: many likewise set their houses on fire, and consumed themselves therein, lest they should behold the executions that were performed by their Enemies. There fell about 12000 Jews, and very few Romans. Abalom also, who was Aristobulus's Father-in-law and Uncle, was taken Prisoner. The holiness of the Temple likewise was not a little prophaned. For whereas before that time no prophane man either entred or beheld that which was in the Temple, Pompey, and divers others that accompanied him, entred the same, and saw that which was not lawful to be beheld by any other but the High-Priests only. But although he found a Table of gold and a sacred Candlestick, with divers other vessels and perfumes, in great quantity; and whereas besides, there was about 2000 Talents of silver in the sacred Treasury in the Temple: yet his Piety was such that he would touch none of it, neither did he any thing in this occasion but what was worthy of his singular virtue. The next day, he commanded those that had the charge of the Temple, to purifie it, and to offer Sacrifices unto God, according to the Law; committing the High-Priesthood to Hircanus, both because he had been very useful in many things; and for having hindered the Jews to join with Aristobulus. After this, he beheaded the Authors of this War, and honour'd Faustus and the rest with Gifts, suitable to their valour, for having been the first that entred the breach. As for Jerusalem, he made it tributary to the Romans, taking away from the Jews those Cities they had conquer'd in Celestria, and assigning them a proper and peculiar government. After this, he inclosed the Nation with certain Limits, whereas before-time their Dominions were of a large extent. Not long after this, he repaired Gadara, that not long before was destroyed: all which he performed in favour of Demetrius the Gadarene, his late servant and bondman. And as touching Hippodamia, Seythopolis, Dion, Samaria, Marissa, Asot, Jamnia, and Arcthisia, he restored them to the ancient Inhabitants thereof: all which were situate in the heart of the Land: Besides Gaza, Joppa, Dora, and the Tower of Straton. (Cities situate upon the Sea-coasts, and ruinated formerly with divers Wars) he set at liberty, and annex'd them unto the Province. As for the Tower of Straton, it was magnificently built by Herod, and adorned with Gates and fair Temples, and the name thereof was changed, and called Cesarea. Thus Hircanus and Aristobulus, through their dissensions and civil broils, were the cause of that servitude and misery that fell upon the Jews. For we have lost our liberty, and have been subdu'd by the Romans. Besides that we have been enforced to surrender up those Cities unto the Syrians, which we had formerly conquer'd by force of Arms. And that which is to be lamented, the Romans in a little time have drawn from us more than 20000 Talents: and the Royalty which before-time was an honour reserved for those that were of the Race of the High-Priests, hath been bestowed on men of mean extraction; whereof we will speak in place convenient. After that Pompey had given Celestria to Scarcus, from Euphrates to the Frontiers of Egypt, with two Legions of the Romans, he went into Celicia, and from thence drew towards Rome, leading with him Aristobulus in bonds, and his children (who were two sons and two daughters) one of which, called Alexander, escaped; and as for Antigonus, (who was the younger) he was led to Rome with his sisters.

SCAURUS led forth his Army against Petra a City in Arabia; and the ways being so bad that he could hardly get to it, he spoilt all the Country round about; his Army was pressed with Famine, Antipater, by the order of Hircanus, furnish'd him with Corn; and all other necessities, out of Jewry: who being sent Ambassador to Aretas from Scaurus, persuaded him to contribute a certain sum of silver to secure his Country from being pillaged, and he himself also became pledge for 300 Talents. This done Scaurus finished the War, according to his desire, and with no less contentment to Aretas and his Country.

Hedio & Rufinus, cap. 10. al. 11.

Calites fortified.

NOT long after this, Alexander, Aristobulus's son, made divers inroads into Jewry; for which cause Gabinius came from Rome into Syria, and (besides other things) worthy of memory which he achieved, he led forth his Army against Alexander, for that Hircanus had not as yet sufficient power to resist him, being otherwise exercised in building the Walls of Jerusalem that were beaten down by Pompey; notwithstanding the Romans that were in Jewry hindred him from performing the same. This Alexander travelling through the whole Country, assembled divers Jews; so that in short time having gotten together 10000 Foot, and 1500 Horse, with good Ammunition, he fortified the Castle of Alexandrion near to the City of Coresas. He fortified Macheron also in the Mountains of Arabia. Gabinius therefore came forth against him, having sent before him Marcus Antonius, accompanied with other Commanders, who recruited the Romans with their coming, and the Jews that were under their obedience, whose Captains were Pytholau and Malichus. They took also those Allies whom Antipater had hired, and in this equipage they came against Alexander. Gabinius also seconded them with his Troops. Hereupon Alexander drew nearer with his Army towards Jerusalem, where giving battel to the Romans, he lost about 3000 of his Followers, and the like number of his men were led away Prisoners. After this, Gabinius repaired to Alexandrion, and invited those that held it to yield, promising them pardon for the Rebellion they had begun. And many of his Enemies having Encamped themselves before the Fort, the Romans charged them: in which conflict Marcus Antonius behaved himself very valiantly, having killed several of the Enemy with his own hand; Gabinius left a part of his Army in that place, to the end that during the siege thereof, he might go and visit the Country of Judea: he commanded therefore all those Cities which in his Journey he found either desolate or destroyed, to be repaired: for that Samaria, Azot, Scythopolis, Antibedon, Raphia, Dora, Marissa, and Gaza, with divers others, were new built: so that through the obedience that was given to Gabinius's Command, it came to pass that the Cities were safely inhabited, which had lain long time before desart.

Gabinius causeth divers Cities in Jewry, Marissa, and other Cities, to be repaired that were desolated.

Hedio & Rufinus, cap. 11. al. 12. Alexander, and other Cities razed.

And after Gabinius had behaved himself in this manner in the Country, he returned to Alexandrion. Whilst he thus insisted about the siege, Alexander sent Ambassadors unto him, demanding pardon for his offences, and restoring into his hands the Castles of N Hircania and Macharon, and finally that of Alexandrion, which Gabinius levelled with the ground. And whereas Alexander's mother came unto him (who favoured the Roman faction, and whose husband and children were kept in Prison in Rome) she obtained all that which she requested at his hands: and after he had carefully and friendly disposed of her affairs, he led Hircanus to Jerusalem, to take charge of the Temple and Priesthood. He ordained also five Judgment-seats and places of Session, and divided the Province into answerable parts: for the one answered in Jerusalem, the second at Gadara, the third in Amathia, the fourth at Jericho, and the fifth at Saphora, which is a Town of Galilee. By this means the Jews were delivered of their Monarchy, and lived under an Aristocracy, or Government of the Nobility.

CHAP. XI.

The year of the World, 3904. before Christ's Nativity, 60.

Aristobulus being prisoner at Rome, maketh his escape with Antigonus, one of his Sons, and cometh to Judea. The Romans overcome him in Battel. He retreateth into Alexandrion, where he is besieged and taken. Gabinius sends him back prisoner to Rome. He defeats Alexander, Aristobulus's son, in a battel, returns to Rome, and leaveth Crassus in his place.

BUT Aristobulus flying from Rome, returneth from Jewry, and resolved to rebuild the Castle of Alexandrion, which not long since was ruined. Against him Gabinius sent out certain Men of War with their Captains, namely, Sisenna, Antonius, and Servilius, both to keep him from the possession of the place, and to apprehend and surprize him likewise. For many Jews resorted unto him, being drawn thereunto by the ancient reputation that he had, who desired likewise revolutions and changes. Pitholau also (who was established Lieutenant-General in Jerusalem) of his own accord came unto him, with 1000 Men well armed: but the other that were retired within, for the most part were not sufficiently furnished with Arms; for Aristobulus making his reckoning to seize Macheron, dismissed those followers of his that were disarmed, and were unfit for any execution, and retaining only 8000 well armed men, he marched thither. But the Romans pursuing and overtaking him, fought desperately with him, and overcame both him and his; notwithstanding their valiant resistance, about 5000 of them were killed, and the rest dispersed, wandering here and there, where they could best secure themselves: but Aristobulus fled to Macheron with more than 1000 followers, and fortified the place. And though his affairs had very slender Success, yet he lost not his hope; but after he had endured the siege some two days, and received many Wounds, he was taken Prisoner, and with his Son Antigonus (who fled from Rome with him) led away Captive by Gabinius. Such was Aristobulus's fortune, that he was sent Prisoner back again to Rome, and there kept in bonds after he had been King and High-Priest three years and six months.

Hedio & Rufinus, cap. 12. Aristobulus returning from Rome, seeketh to re-establish Alexandrion.

A man in that dignity both magnificent and magnanimous, yet the Senate sent back his children (according to the tenour of Gabinius's Letters) who had promised their delivery to their mother, when she surrendered the Castles into his hands: whereupon they returned into Jewry. But Gabinius, intending to make War against the Parthians, and having already past Euphrates, changed his resolution, and determined to return into Egypt; and re-establish Ptolemy, as it is declared in another place. In this expedition also he was supplied by Antipater's means, with Victuals, Money and Ammunition; and by his Advice, those Jews that inhabit Pelusium (who kept as it were the very entry into Egypt) were reconciled to him. When Gabinius returned back out of Egypt, he found all Syria full of Tumult and Rebellion. For Alexander, Aristobulus's son, taking once more possession of the Kingdom, caused divers Jews from day to day to revolt; and foraging the Country with a huge Army, he slew all those Romans whom he met withal, and besieged all those that fled into the Mount Garizim. Gabinius seeing the Affairs of Syria in that state, sent Antipater before him unto them, to appease these commotions; and to cure them of their Phrenzy, and if it were possible to reduce them to a better mind: for Antipater was really a very discreet man. He repairing unto them, moderated divers of them, and brought them under obedience: but it was impossible for him to reconcile Alexander; for he having 30000 men with him, came forth to meet with Gabinius, with whom he fought, and was overcome, with the loss of 10000 of his Men, near unto the Mount Itabyr.

Aristobulus overcome in battel by the Romans.

Aristobulus sent back again Prisoner to Rome, with his son Antigonus.

Aristobulus's sons discharged.

After that Gabinius had ordered all things in Jerusalem by Antipater's advice, he presently set forward against the Nabatheans, whom he overcame in battel. He sent back also Mithridates and Orfanes, (Men of good account among the Parthians) who had retired themselves unto him, causing a report to be spread, that they were fled with Gabinius. Now when Gabinius had performed great and magnificent exploits in War, he returned to Rome, surrendering the Government to Crassus. Nicholas Damascene, and Strabo of Cappadocia (who differeth in nothing from Nicholas) have written of these Expeditions of Pompey and Gabinius in Judea.

С Н А Р. XII.

Crassus robbeth the Temple of Jerusalem. He is defeated by the Parthians. Cassius retreateth into Syria, and defends it against the Parthians. Antipater's great credit, his marriage, and his children.

CRASSUS intending to make War against the Parthians, came into Jewry, and took away with him the sacred money (which Pompey had not touched, which amounted to the sum of 2000 Talents.) He spoiled the Temple also of all the gold that was in it, to the sum of 8000 Talents. He took away a wedge of solid gold, to the weight of 300 pounds, which pound, amongst the Jews, containeth two pounds and an half. He that deliver'd this wedge was a Priest, and the keeper of the sacred Treasure, call'd Eleazar, who gave him the same upon no malicious intent (for he was a virtuous and just man;) but whereas he had the custody of the Tapestries of the Temple committed to him, his hands (which were both admirable to behold, by reason of their beauty and worth, his hands (which were both admired and fastned to this beam) and perceiving that Crassus used all means to gather all the money he could, he fearing lest he should have seized on all the ornaments of the Temple; gave him this beam for a Ransom to redeem all the rest: binding him, upon the delivery thereof, by an oath, that he should not take any thing away that was in the Temple, but should content himself with that only piece of great esteem and value which he gave him. This beam was inclosed in another hollow beam of wood, so that no man knew thereof but only Eleazar. Crassus therefore took his beam, as if he determined to leave all other things in the Temple; yet notwithstanding he falsified his oath, and carried away whatsoever was therein. Neither is it to be wondered at, that there was so great Riches found in our Temple, since all those Jews that were dispersed thorough the face of the whole Earth, and all those that feared God (both in Asia and Europe) for a long time offered their Presents in that place. The greatness and multitude whereof wanteth no testimony: neither is it feigned in way of ostentation, but divers other Historians make mention thereof; and, amongst the rest, Syracus of Cappadocia speaketh after this manner.

Mithridates few Men into the Ille of Coos to fetch from thence, the money that Queen Cleopatra had laid up there, and 800 Talents of the Jews. But we have no publick money but that which is dedicated unto God. It is therefore a thing manifestly sheweth the Jews that which inhabits Asia, transported this money into Coos for fear of Mithridates: For it is that inhabits Asia, transported this money into Coos for fear of Mithridates: For it is not likely that they who inhabited Judea, and had a City so strong, and a Temple so well fortified, should send their money to Coos. Neither is it credible likewise, that the Jews remaining in Alexandria should do it, for that they feared not to fall into danger through this War of Mithridates.
And thus he ended his speech.
Then he came to another place. That when Sylla passed thorow Greece

The same Strabo also faith in another place, That when Sylla passed thorow Greece M to make War against Mithridates and Lucullus, he sent Menenius Cyrene, which was troubled by reason of the Mutinies of our Nation, whereby the whole World was filled. There were four sorts of people in the City of the Cyrenians: one of them were Citizens, the second were Labourers, the third were Strangers, and the fourth were Jews, who at this present were intermingled thorow all Cities; neither is there an inhabited place throughout the World, neither was there any Nation that inhabit the same, wherein these have not set foot and fortified. For both Egypt and Cyrene (being under the subjection of the same Princes, and divers other Nations, conformed themselves to their customs, and nourished assemblies of Jews, and advanced them, and more and more used the Jewish Ordinances. I apprehend therefore that there was a Colony of Jews in Egypt. A great part likewise of N the City of Alexandria is assigned to the Jewish Nation. They have likewise their peculiar Magistrate, who governeth the people, and decideth their differences, and maintaineth their contracts and ordinances, as if he governed in his own Common-wealth. By this means this Nation both fortified and established it self in Egypt, for that the Jews had their original amongst the Egyptians; and for that Judea lieth near unto Egypt, from whence the Jews are descended: And as for Cyrene, they have entered in, in that it bordereth with that Country which is under the obedience of the Egyptians, (in like manner as Judea doth) or rather for that intimes past it appertained to the same Kingdom. Thus far Strabo.

After that Crassus had disposed all things according to his own pleasure, he removed, and beyond to make War against the Parthians, where both he and all his Army and marched forward to make war against them. As for Cassius, he retired himself into Parthia, where he was destroyed (as is declared in another place.) As for Cassius, he retired himself into Syria, and took possession thereof, to the end he might affront the Parthians; who being proud

A proud of their victory lately obtain'd, made excursions so far : and coming to Tyre, he at length arriv'd in Judea, where upon his first entrance, he took the City of Taricheæ, and led away from thence 30000 Prisoners. He put Pytholus also to death, for having maintain'd Aristobolus's faction. All which he did by Antipater's procurement and persuasion, who was in great credit with him, and who also at that time was highly esteem'd amongst the Idumæans, amongst whom he married his Wife, who was descended of one of the most famous families of Arabia, his name was Cypron, by whom he had these four sons, Phaselus and Herod (who after was made King) Joseph and Phororas, and one daughter called Salome. This Antipater also made alliance with other Princes, and especially with the Arabians, to whose custody he committed his children during the time he made War against Aristobolus. But Cassius gather'd another Army, and march'd towards Euphrates, to go against the Parthians, as it is specified and recorded by other Writers.

CHAPTER XIII.

Pompey causeth Alexander to be beheaded, Aristobulus's son. Philippion, son of Ptolemy Mennæus, Prince of Chalcis, marrieth Alexandra, Aristobulus's daughter. His Father Ptolomy putteth him to death, and marrieth this Princess.

C Shortly after this, Cæſar (being Lord of Rome) Pompey and the Senate being fled on the other side of the Tonian Sea, let Arifolubus at liberty, determining to fend him into Syria with two Legions, as being a ſufficient man to govern the State-affairs in thoſe parts. Nevertheless, Arifolubus failed of his hopes and authority he expected at Cæſar's hands: For Pompey's adherents prevented and poiſon'd him, ſo that he was buried by thoſe of Cæſar's faction. His Body was kept embalm'd with Honey for a long time, until that Antonius ſet it into Jewry, to be entomb'd amongst the Kings and Princes.

Scipio, by Pompey's commandment, cauſed Alexander Arifolubus's ſon's head to be cut off, charging him with fome mifdeameours which he had committed againſt the Romans; he was executed in Antioch, Ptolemy the ſon of Mennaus, who govern'd in Chalcis (the daughter of Arifolubus's Wife, commanding her to ſend her ſon Philippion to Aſcalon to Arifolubus's Wife, commanding her to ſend her ſon Antigenus and his daughters; one of which, called Alexandra, was beloved by Philippion, and married by him: but afterwards he being ſlain, Rompey, Philippion's father, married her, and continued the careful maintenance of his brother and ſiſters-in-law.

CHAPTER XIV.

Antipater, by Hircanus's order, assisteth Cæsar mightily in the Egyptian War, and sheweth much valour.

AFTER Pompey's death, and that Victory which Cæſar had obtained againſt him, Antipater (Governor of Judea by the commandment of Hircanus) was very uſeful unto Cæſar. For whereas Mithridates the Perſegian brought him certain ſupplies, and could not bring them on, by reaſon of an Arm of Niſus paſſing through Peliſſum; he was conſtrained to ſtay at Aſcalon, Antipater came unto him, and brought with him 3000 Soldiers, and dealt with the Princes of Arabia to aſſociate them with Cæſar, that by his means, all they of Syria gave him their aſſiſtance, and never altered their affection to that bare unto Cæſar. Theſe were Jamblicus a great Lord, and Ptolemy his ſon, and Tholomæus, the ſon of Sohemus dwelling on the Mount of Libanus, and well nigh all the Cities. Mithridates being departed from Syria, came to Peliſſum, where being repulſed and excluded by the Citizens, he beſieged the City. Antipater in this War behaved himſelf valiantly; and after he had beaten down a pane of the Wall, he firſt of all ſaw forward to enter the City. Whiſt Peliſſum was in this ſtate, the Jews that inhabited Egypt in the Country of Qnia, would neither grant paſſage to Antipater, nor Mithridates, that marched towards Cæſar. But Antipater, who was of their Nation, perſuaded them to take their parts, ſhewing them the Letter of the High-Priſt, Hircanus, in which he invited them to be friends unto Cæſar, and exhorted them to furniſh his Army with whatſoever they ſtood in need of; ſo that ſeeing that Antipater and the High-Priſt were agreed together, they ſubmitted themſelves. They then dwelt round about Membis hearing that they were thus united, ſent for Mithridates alſo unto them, who came and received them into his favour.

Antipater continueth to acquire great reputation in the Egyptian War. Cæsar cometh to Syria, establisheth Hircanus in the High-Priesthood, and conferreth great honours upon Antipater, notwithstanding Antigonus Aristobulus's Sons complaints.

The conflict of the Egyptians with Mithridates at Delta.
Alix cap. 18.

When he was come to a place called Delta, he fought with the Enemies in a place which is called the Camp of the Jews: In which Battel, Mithridates led the right Wing, and Antipater the left. Being hotly engaged, the Wing that Mithridates commanded, began to give ground, and was like to have been utterly routed, had not Antipater (running with his Soldiers along the River side) obtained the upper hand of his Enemies, by putting the Egyptians that were Conquerors to flight, and restored Mithridates; and pursued them so far, that he got their Camp, and called Mithridates to take part of the prey that he had recover'd from the fugitive Enemy. Mithridates lost 800 of his Men in this Battel, but Antipater lost but 50. Mithridates wrote hereof unto Cæsar, and shew'd him that Antipater was the cause of the Victory, and of their preservation: So that Cæsar ever afterward highly commended him, and in all his War made use of Antipater in his most dangerous attempts, so that Antipater was grievously wounded in divers fights, and behav'd himself bravely.

Now after that the War was finished, Cæsar came by Sea into Syria, and bestowed great honours as well on Hircanus, to whom he confirmed the High-Priesthood, as on Antipater, whom he made a free Citizen of Rome, and granted him all other privileges belonging thereunto. Divers report that Hircanus himself was in this War, and that he came into Egypt, which Strabo the Cappadocian affirmeth, speaking after this manner, by the authority of Apianus; after that Mithridates had entred Egypt, with Hircanus the High-Priest of the Jews. The same Strabo in another place speaketh thus by the authority of Hypsicrates, That Mithridates went alone; and that Antipater was sent for into Ascalon, where he prepared 3000 Soldiers, because he was Governor of Judea, and encouraged the rest of the Governors; and Hircanus the High-Priest also had a part in this War. Thus far Strabo. At that time came Antigonus, Aristobulus's son, to Cæsar, lamenting his Father who had been poysoned in his service, and how his Brother had his head thruck off by Scipio, beseeching him to have compassion of him, being thrust out of his Kingdom. He accused Hircanus and Antipater also, for their tyrannical and violent Government over their Nation, and injuries offered to himself. Antipater being at that time present, answered for himself to those points wherein he was accused; declaring, That Antigonus and his friends were seditious and seditious men, as for himself how much he had done, and how many exploits he had executed in the late War, whereof Cæsar himself was a witness. Moreover he avowed that Aristobulus had been justly led twice into captivity to Rome, for that he had been always an Enemy, and no ways well affectioned towards the Romans. And as for his Brother, who was beheaded by Scipio, he averred that he was justly punished by him for his Robberies, and not injuriously and outrageously, as he pretended. After that Antipater had spoken to this effect, Cæsar declared Hircanus High-Priest, and gave Antipater any Government whatsoever he liked best: who, according to his choice, was appointed Governor of Judea.

The Senate's

League with the Jews.

Moreover, Cæsar permitted Hircanus to repair the Walls of Jerusalem (according to his humble suit.) For after that Pompey had beaten them down, they lay levelled with the Earth; and he commanded the Consuls at Rome, that his Degree should be Registered in the Capitol, in these words following.

Valerius the son of Lucius the Rexor, hath related to the Senate (assembled in the Temple of Concord the 13 day of Decem.) in the presence of L. Caponius, the son of Lucius, and Caius Papyrius Quirinus; the request made by Alexander the son of Jason, Numenius the son of Antiochus, and Alexander the son of Dorotheus, Ambassadors in the behalf of the Jews, Men of good Repute, and our Allies, and propoied by them for renewing the ancient favours they have received from the Romans: and in testimony of the alliance, have brought us a vial and buckler of gold of 50000 Crowns price; requiring our Letters might be given them, addressed to the free Cities and the Kings our Confederates, to grant them passage through the Countries and

A and Ports with all security, and without any offence: And we have thought good to make friendship and alliance with them, and to grant them all that which they require, in accepting the buckler brought by them. This hapned in the time that Hircanus was High-Priest and Prince, and in the ninth year of his Princedom, in the month of July.

Hircanus was in like sort honour'd by the people of Athens, for many favours that they received at his hands. They sent him also a Decree, which they ratified in his behalf, the tenour whereof ensueth.

The year wherein Dionysius the son of Asclepiades was Governor and Priest in the month of July, and on the 20 day, his Arrest or Decree of the Athenians, was delivered to the Governors by the Pretor Agathocles. Eucleas the son of Menander the Alimustian, hath written in the 11 of March in the general Assembly, and placed it in the Theatre, and the suffrages were gathered by Dorotheus the High-Priest, with the chief assistants of the people.

Dionysius the son of Dionysius published the same: Since that Hircanus, the son of Alexander, the High-Priest and Prince of the Jews, continu'd his good affection towards all the people, and in especial towards every Citizen of Athens, and hath shew'd them many friendships, receiving with all humanity those Athenians that come unto him, whether they resort thither as Ambassadors, or for any other particular occasion whatsoever, and sendeth them back after they have provided them of safe Conduct, whereas we have before now had testimony by the report of Theodotus the son of Theodorus Simicus, who hath made recital unto the people of his worthiness, and of the Will he hath in us, all that good that is possible: We have thought good to honour him, by sending him a Crown of Gold, in testimony of his courtesies, according to our custom and law; and by erecting a brazen Statue unto him in the Temple of Demus, and the Graces: Our will is also, that this be proclaimed by a Herald in the Theatre, during the Bacchanals, when the new Tragedies are played. Likewise in the solemnities Panthean, and Eleusynian, and at the publick Exercises: We will also that the Governors provide, that all that which we have advised for the honour, favour, affection and good will towards this man, as he hath well deserved, be diligently performed, to the end that thereby it may appear how our Nation reward, and entertain such men that are virtuous; and to the intent, that the honour we impart unto him, may encourage others to be the better affected towards us. It is likewise decreed, that amongst all the Athenians there be certain Ambassadors chosen, who shall bear this Decree unto him, and exhort him to do whatsoever is profitable for our common good, seeing himself so much honour'd by us. Let this suffice to express the honours bestowed on Hircanus by the People of Rome, and the Citizens of Athens.

After that Cæsar had given order for the affairs of Syria, he returned back by Sea. And as soon as Antipater had accompanied Cæsar out of Syria, he returned into Judea, and suddenly built up the Walls of Jerusalem, which Pompey had beaten down; and in riding a Circuit about the Countrey, he pacified the troubles not only by threatenings, but by good advice also, which he gave every one to live in Peace; assuring them, That if Antipater submitted themselves to Hircanus their Prince, they should live happily, and enjoy their possessions without any trouble: and that if they hoped to advance themselves by any new commotion, (supposing by that means to benefit themselves,) they should seal, that instead of a Governor, they had a Master: and instead of a King, they should find Hircanus a Tyrant; and instead of the Romans and Cæsar to be their Governors, they should find them to be their most hateful Enemies: for they would not suffer, that any thing should be altered that they had established. By these, and such like admonitions, he kept and continued all the Country in peace.

Antipater gaineth great repute by his Vertue. His eldest son, Phasaelus, is made Governor of Jerusalem; and Herod, his second son, is made Governor of Galilee. Herod causeth to be executed several Robbers. Some great men's jealousie against Antipater and his children. They made Hircanus accuse Herod for those that he had put to death. He compareth in judgment, and then retireth. He cometh to besiege Jerusalem, which he had taken, if Antipater and Phasaelus had not hindered him. Hircanus reneweth his alliance with the Romans: The Testimony of the Romans esteem and affection for Hircanus and the Jews. Caesar is murdered in the Capitol by Cassius and Brutus.

Antipater maketh Phasaelus Governor in Jerusalem, and Herod in Galilee.

Herod executeth Ezechias, and his followers for robbery.

Sextus Caesar, Governor of Syria.

The form of Phasaelus's government.

Antipater, notwithstanding his high authority, was always faithful to Hircanus.

Antipater winneth the Romans hearts by Hircanus's money, and draweth the Jews into hatred.

The Jews accuse Antipater and Herod before Hircanus.

Herod called in question, appeareth with a great train.

Sextus Caesar writeth to discharge Herod.

Antipater perceiving that Hircanus was slow and idle, he declared and appointed Phasaelus, his eldest son, Governor over Jerusalem, and the Countrey thereabout: As for Herod (who was very young, for he was not at that time above 15 years old) he committed Galilee unto his charge; who, although young in years, yet he was ripe in courage and conduct, which he witnessed in apprehending Ezechias, who was the chief of those Thieves, who ranged over all Syria; he put him to death, with divers of his Complices. Which act of his got him esteem and credit among the Syrians: for by that means he freed their Countrey of all those Robbers, according as they desired. He was therefore praised throw the Villages and Cities for this action, as he that had given them Peace, and assured possession of their Estates. For this cause he was made known to Sextus Caesar, who was Uncle to Caesar the Great. Furthermore, his brother Phasaelus was encouraged to follow his noble actions, and enforced himself to obtain no less reputation than he had; for which cause, he strove to get the good will of the common People in Jerusalem, and govern'd the City with such discretion, that he acted all things to every man's content, and abused not his power to any private man's injury: which was the cause that Antipater was honoured by the whole Nation, with no less respect than if he had been their only Lord and Sovereign. Yet did not this eminency of estate so far distract him, that he forgot the love and duty he ow'd to Hircanus (as in such like occasions it oftentimes falleth out) notwithstanding divers of the greatest amongst the Jews (seeing Antipater and his sons so highly advanced, both by the publick favour of the whole Nation, as also by the Revenues that they drew both out of Jewry, as also by the employment of Hircanus's money) were grievously incensed against them. For Antipater had made friendship with the Emperors of Rome, and having persuaded Hircanus to send them money, he had appropriated the same unto himself, sending it not in Hircanus's name, but in his own; which though Hircanus knew, yet he was not moved therewith, but rather well contented. But that which most of all terrified the Princes of the Jews, was, to behold the violent and audacious nature of Herod, who govern'd after a tyrannical manner: For this cause they address'd themselves to Hircanus, and accus'd Antipater openly. How long (said they) will you dissemble, and wink at those things that are daily practised? See you not that Antipater and his sons, possess, in effect, the Royal Power and Authority of the Kingdom, and that you have only the name? Assure your self that you are not out of danger, in contemning thus both your self and your Kingdom. For Antipater and his sons are not now your Substitutes, neither intend they your profit, or your Country's good (whatsoever your opinion is of them) they are publicly acknowledged Lords and Masters. For Herod (Antipater's son) hath already put Ezechias and his Confederates to death, and thereby transgressed our Laws, which forbid to take away any man's life (how wicked soever he be) except he be first of all condemned to death by the Council: and notwithstanding this, he hath been so bold, as to do justice without your authority. When Hircanus heard this he grew angry (for their Mothers whom Herod had slain, had incensed him by their continual Exclamations in the Temple, N exhorting the King and People to call Herod to account before the Council, of that which he had done.) So that Hircanus moved by these Women, called Herod to answer unto those accusations which were objected against him. Who made his appearance, forewarned by his father not to present himself after the manner of a private person, but well attended and accompanied to withstand all inconveniences. After he had taken order for the affairs in Galilee (according as he thought fit) and that he himself was sufficient accompanied to make his Voyage, with such a Guard as neither might terrifie Hircanus with number, nor leave himself unsecured in danger, he retired to Jerusalem. Moreover Sextus Caesar, Governor of Syria, wrote unto Hircanus to absolve him, adding threats to his persuasions, if so he should perform the contrary; which gave Hircanus occasion to deliver Herod in despite of the Council: the rather also, for that he loved him as intirely as his son. Therefore when Herod presented himself before the Council with

A with his retinue, all of them were astonished, and none of those that accused him in his absence, durst open their mouths to speak one word, but all of them kept silence, not knowing what to do. Now whilst they stood upon these terms, a certain man, called Sameas, who was of upright dealing, and for this cause was not daunted, arose and spake to this purpose: Dread King, and you honourable assistants, I could never yet remember, that ever any man which was called in question to defend his cause before us, hath appeared in this equipage; and I suppose that none of you can say, that the like hath ever happened: but whosoever cometh into this place to receive judgment, he presented himself with humility and fear, with a countenance prepared to implore mercy, having his hair long, and his garment black: but this gallant Herod, accused of murder (and for this occasion called before us) who could imagine that he should appear before us in a purple robe, having his hairs trimmed; and besides that, a guard of armed men about him; with an intent that if we condemn him according to Law, he may put us to death without Law, that after he hath violated all right, he may escape and save himself. But I blame not Herod in this action, for that he hath a more inward regard of his particular profit, than of the Law: but I accuse both you and the King, who have given him such assurance. Know therefore, that there is a Sovereign God, that will one day punish both you and the King, and him whom you will deliver by the Kings means. And so fell it out as he had said: For as soon as Herod had obtained the Kingdom, he put all those of the council to death, and Hircanus himself likewise, only Sameas was exempted: for he esteemed him mightily, because of his wisdom and justice, and because when the City was besieged by Herod and Sosius, Sameas perswaded the people to receive Herod, telling them, that by reason of their sins and offences, they could not escape from him; whereof we will speak in time and place. Hircanus perceiving that the Judges were inclined to condemn Herod, deferred the sentence flight, till the next day, and sent secretly unto Herod, counselling him to flee out of the City, assuring him, that there was no other means to save his life. Thus he posted to Damascus (as if he had fled from the King's presence) and presenting himself before Sextus Caesar, after he had assured his person, he resolved with himself, that if the council should call him once more to answer, he would not obey them. But after his departure the council was displeased with Hircanus, and endeavoured to perswade him, that all these things tended to his destruction, which he perceived, yet knew not what to do, he was so negligent and void of foresight. When Sextus had made Herod Governor of Cheliosyria (which estate he held unto him for ready money) Hircanus was afraid lest Herod should make War against him, neither passed there long time before the effect grew answerable to his fear. For Herod marched forth against him, with a great Army, supposing himself to be much wronged by the assignation he had sent him, and in that he was summoned to give a reason of his actions before the council. But his father Antipater, and his brother Phasaelus came forth against him, to hinder his approach towards Jerusalem, striving to appease his fury, and counselling him not to attempt any thing by way of action; but that he should content himself that he had threatened and affrighted Hircanus, he should not attempt any thing further against him, who had raised him to that high degree. They told him also, that it became him not only to remember that he was cited to answer, but that he was absolved also, and permitted to depart without danger or any violence. Moreover, that he ought to think, that God governeth the balance of War, and that the issues of battles are uncertain, and for that cause he ought not to expect the victory, if he made War against the King who was his familiar, and from whom he had received far more kindness, and no displeasure: who though he made some appearance and shadow of severity, touching the accusation intended against him; yet notwithstanding, it proceeded not so much from him, as from his evil counsellors. Herod in some sort pacified by these persuasions, obeyed his father, supposing that it sufficed him, in regard of his future hopes, that he had given the people so large a testimony of his power. This was the state of the Jews at that time. But Caesar arriving at Rome, prepared himself to set sail towards Africa, with an intent to make War against Scipio and Cato. Hircanus sent Ambassadors to him, beseeching him to confirm the amity and alliance that he had with him. But now I think it very convenient to declare all the Prerogatives and alliances that the Romans and their Emperors made with those of our Nation, to the end that all other people might know, that the Kings of Asia and Europe have been well affected towards us, and have made great account of our valour and fidelity. And although divers men ill affected towards us, believe not that which the Macedonians and Persians have written to us, because the same matters are not extant in all places, neither set down in publick writings, G but only amongst our selves and some Barbarians; yet it is manifest that they cannot contradict the declarations made by the Romans which are manifestly affixed in publick places in Cities; as likewise at this present they are engraven in the Capitol in brazen pillars. Julius Caesar in like manner in a brazen pillar erected by him, hath declared red unto the Jews that inhabited Alexandria, that they were free Citizens therein, H and to the intent that these things may more manifestly appear, I will propose the decrees of the Senate, and of Julius Caesar, made in the favour of Hircanus and our Nation.

Caius Julius Caesar Emperor, High-Priest, Dictator the second Time, To the Governors, Senate, and People of the Sidonians, Health. If you are well, we are in health both our selves and our Army.

I have sent you the copy of an inscription, registred in favour of Hircanus Alexander's son, High-Priest, and Prince of the Jews, to the end it may be placed among publick monuments: and my will is, that it be engraven in a table of brass, both in Greek and Latin letters; the Tenour whereof is this that followeth: Because Hircanus Alexander's son, the Jew, both at this present, as also heretofore, as well in Peace as in War, hath expressed his fidelity towards us and our estate, as divers Commanders of our Armies yield testimony of him, and for that in our last Alexandrine War, he seconded us in the battel with Fifty teen hundred Men; and having been sent by us to Mithridates, hath surmounted all those of his Company in valour. For these causes my will is, That Hircanus Alexander's son and his successors, be Princes of the Jews: and further, that they continue always in the High-Priesthood, according to the ordinance and custom of their Country; and that both he and his children be our associates; and be inrolled likewise, as our chiefest friends: and all that which appertaineth to the Priesthood, according to the ordinances of the Jews, be attributed to him and his, and if there happen any difference touching the discipline of the Jews, our pleasure is, that it be determined by him. And as for the munitions of War, and the money to be levied for the entertainment of Soldiers, we think it not fit that they should be charged. The Decrees made and granted by Caius Caesar being Consul, are these:

That the sons of Hircanus be Princes over the Nation of the Jews, and enjoy the places granted unto them. That the High-Priest and Prince of the Jews give favour and aid unto those that are offended. That Ambassadors be sent to Hircanus, the son of Alexander, High-Priest of the Jews, to treat of amity and association with us. That a brazen table be erected in the Capitol: and likewise at Sidon, at Tyre, and at Ascalon in the Temple, wherein shall be engraven the Contents hereof, in Roman and Greek letters; to the end, that all the Treasurers that are in the Cities, and all other Magistrates may by this our Decree understand, that they are our friends, and that their Ambassadors be entertained with kindness and presents, and that these Edicts be sent into all places.

Caius Caesar Emperor, Dictator, Consul, for the good of the Senate and People of Rome, hath granted to the honour, welfare, and humanity of Hircanus the son of Alexander, that both he and his children shall be High-Priests in Jerusalem, and of the whole Nation according to the Rites and Customs whereby their ancestors have enjoyed the Priesthood.

Caius Caesar, Consul the fifth time, hath ordained that they shall inhabit Jerusalem, and build again the Walls of the City; and that Hircanus (Alexander's son, the High-Priest and Prince of the Jews) shall govern as he thinks fit, and that every second year of their tribute, there be a part deducted out of the rent they owe, and that they be exempt from all other impositions and tributes.

Caius Caesar, twice Emperor, hath ordained; that the Jews shall contribute every year for their Cities, except Joppa; he acquitteth them also every seventh year (which they call the year of their rest) because that therein they neither reap nor sow, neither gather the fruit of Trees. His further pleasure is, that every second year, they bring their Tributes unto Sidon, which shall be the fourth part of that which shall be sown; and besides this, that they pay the rents to Hircanus and his sons, which they have paid unto their Predecessors unto this day. Commanding that no man, whether he be Governor, Captain, or Ambassador, or any other whatsoever be, levy Soldiers within the Country of Judea, or draw any there; hence: neither exact any Money, whether it be for Garrisons in Winter, or for any other cause, but that the Jews be exempt from all troubles in all places, and enjoy all that which they have had, bought, and possessed: It is our pleasure also, that the City of Joppa be under their government, which they have ever enjoyed since the beginning of their league with the Romans. We further grant, that Hircanus Alexander's son and his children, receive the tribute of that City, as well by them that till the land, as by the gates, entries, and customs of merchandizes that are transported unto Sidon Twenty thousand, six hundred seventy and five bushels every year, exempting the seventh year, which is called the year of rest, wherein they neither labour nor gather any fruit of the Trees. It is the Senate's pleasure also, that Hircanus and the Jews have those Villages which are in the great champaign, which he and his predecessors have possessed, and that with the like interests that they held them before this; and that the same customs continue therein, whereby they held and governed them.

A them. Their will is likewise, That the same Laws which have from the beginning been respectively observed between the Jews, and their High-Priests, be continued; and whatsoever benefits were granted them, by consent of the Senate and People of Rome. Moreover it shall before Christ's be lawful for those of Lydda, to use the same Rites and Privileges also. And as touching the demand, places, and habitations that have appertained to the Kings of Syria and Phœnicia, by the gift made unto them at such time as they were allied to the Romans: The Senate (if so) ordaineth, That Hircanus the High-Priest and Prince of the Jews possess the same. It is lawful also for Hircanus and his sons, and their Ambassadors sent by them, to behold the tiltings and gladiators, and to sit among the Senators, and that at all times, wherein they shall require to be brought into the Senate by the Dictator, or by the Master of the Horse, they may have free entrance; and that within ten days at the most they receive their answer, if there be any Decree ratified by the Senate.

Caius Caesar, Emperor, the fourth time Consul, and the fifth time Dictator for the term of Life, hath ratified these things, as touching Hircanus the son of Alexander, the High-Priest and Prince of the Jews: Because that the Generals, my Predecessors, have witnessed as well in the Provinces, as before the Senate and People of Rome, both of the good deserts of Hircanus High-Priest and Prince of the Jews, and that Nation also, towards us and our State; and whereas both the Senate and People of Rome have gratified them for the same: We think it convenient also to have the same Recorded, and to give Order, that Hircanus and his sons may be remunerated by the Senate, and People of Rome, according to the measure of their Loyalties and good Deserts.

Julius Caius Caesar, Roman Consul. To the Governors, Senate and People of Patras; Health: The Jews are come unto us to Delos, with some of the Colonies of their Countrymen, in the presence of your Ambassadors, and assure us of a Decree made by you, whereby you forbid them the practice and ancient use of their Sacrifices and Oblations: I think it not fit that you make any such Decrees against our Friends, and Associates; neither that you forbid them to live according to their Fashions and Customs; or to employ their purses together in supplying their Feasts and Sacrifices; since in Rome itself they are not interdicted or forbidden to perform the same. For at such time as Caius Caesar Consul, had prohibited by Edict, that in celebrating the Bacchanals, no one should Dance about the City; yet were the Jews alone exempted from this prohibition: and neither have they been prohibited to contribute, neither to Banquet together. My self also in like case, in the defence I have made to forbid all other Societies, have excepted the Jews therein, and have given them leave to assemble and demean themselves according to the Customs, Ceremonies, and Ordinance of their Country: If therefore you have made any such Decrees against our friends and associates, you shall do well to disannul them, by reason of the virtue of the Jews, and the forwardness they have protested in performance of our service.

After Caius Caesar's death, the Consuls, Marcus Antonius, and Publius Dolabella, assembled the Senate, and having brought in Hircanus's Ambassadors, they declared their request, and contracted amity with them: The Senate likewise ordained, that each thing should be granted them that they required. And Dolabella having received Hircanus's Letters, sent them throughout all Asia, to Ephesus (which is the Metropolitan City of Asia) in these terms: The General Dolabella to the Princes, Senate, and People of Ephesus, Health: [The General, or Emperor Dolabella; this word Emperor, was in those times a Title of honour conferred on those Generals who had obtained some great Victory.] Alexander the son of Theodorus, Ambassador to Hircanus, the High-Priest and Prince of the Jews, hath given us to understand, that his Subjects cannot go to Wars, because it is not lawful for them to bear Arms, nor Travel on the Sabbath Day; as also for that they may not seek for their Vittuals and other necessities on that Day, according to the Custom of their Country: For this cause I grant them exemption from the War, as my Predecessors have done, permitting them to use the Ceremonies and Rites of their Country, assembling themselves to make their Oblations and Sacrifices, as their Laws and Customs require, in contributing to the offering of the Sacrifices in the Temple. And my will is, That you write to this effect, to every City of the Province. See here how Dolabella honoured Hircanus, when he sent his Ambassadors unto him.

Lucius Lentulus Consul, pronounceth that the Jews, that are Citizens of Rome, and that observe and offer the Sacrifices of the Jews in Ephesus before the Tribunal, be exempt from warfare, by reason of their Religion. Given the nineteenth of October. There are besides these many other Edicts and Ordinances made to this purpose, by the same Generals, and by the Roman Senate, in favour of Hircanus and our Nation, and some other Cities. In like sort there were divers Decrees and Writs sent unto the Governors and Rulers of the Provinces, concerning our Privileges: All which may be easily believed by those that shall read our History, with no preiudicate Opinion, if they consider those that we have inferred. For we have here shewed more expressly and lively testimonies of the friendship that we have had with the Romans, as at this day are fixed to Pillars, and engraven in Tables of Brass on the Capitol; and that heretofore shall remain as fixed for ever: For which cause, I have thought it to be a frivolous and unnecessary matter to infer all in this place; and I think that there is not any Man of so slender judgment, that will not believe how much we have been esteemed by the Romans, as they have given testimonies by divers Decrees published in our behalf; neither may any Man suppose that we lie, considering the truth of that which we publish.

Cæcilius Bassus
murdereth
Sextus Cæsar.

Marcus succedeth
Sextus in Syria.
Cæsar slain by Cassius and Brutus.

Thus have we sufficiently declared the amity and league that in time past we have had with the Romans. About this time it came to pass, that the estate of Syria was troubled upon the occasion that ensueth: Cæcilius Bassus, one of Pompey's followers, laid an ambush for Sextus Cæsar, and slew him, and seizing upon his Army, usurped the Government: Whereby there arose great War near Apamea. For Cæsar's Captains marched out against Cæcilius, with great force both of Foot and Horse, to whom Antipater sent his sons with forces to second them (in remembrance of the benefits he had received at Cæsar's hands) supposing it to be an act of Justice, that the murderer should be punished for his so heinous offence. Now whereas this War continued a long time, Marcus came and succeeded Sextus. And Cæsar was slain by Cassius and Brutus, in the midst of the Senate, after he had commanded three years, and six months, as it is expressed in another place.

C H A P. XVIII.

Cassius cometh from Syria, draweth Seven hundred Talents out of Judea. Herod gains his favour. Malichus's ingratitude towards Antipater.

After Cæsar's death, the brand of Civil War began to flame, and the chiefest of Rome made it their business to raise Forces. But Cassius came into Syria, with an intent to take the Army that was near to Apamea; and having raised the Siege, he drew both Bassus and Marcus to be of his Faction, and travelling from City to City, he gathered a number of Soldiers, and much warlike Provision, and imposed huge Tributes: but especially he afflicted Jewry, and exacted of that Country Seven hundred Talents of Silver. Antipater seeing the State in so great fear and trouble, committing the exaction of a part of this Money to his sons; the rest he commanded to be assigned to Malichus, who was his Enemy. Herod first of all gathered that which was commanded him in the Country of Galilee, and for this cause was greatly beloved by Cassius: For he being prudent and discreet, thought it no small policy at that time, to win the Romans good will on other Men's expences. Under the Governors the Cities were set to sale, together with their Inhabitants: and amongst them, these four were the chiefest, namely, Gophna, Emaus, Lydda, and Thamna: for Cassius sold the People thereof to them that would give most. Besides, Cassius was so much transported with Choler, that he had slain Malichus, if Hircanus had not restrained his fury, by sending him One hundred Talents of his own Money by Antipater. But as soon as Cassius was departed out of the Country of Judea, he practised Antipater's death, supposing that this his cutting off, would assure Hircanus's state. But Antipater was not ignorant of his resolution; for having an inkling thereof, he got himself on the other side of Jordan, and assembled an Army of Soldiers, both Jews and Arabians. Hereupon, Malichus (who was a politick and subtil Fellow) denied stoutly that he had intended any Treason, clearing himself with an Oath before Antipater and his Children, that he had never any such intent, especially seeing that Phasaelus held Jerusalem, and Herod had his Army at command. And in the end, perceiving the difficulty wherein he was, he reconciled himself to Antipater, and they agreed at that time, that Marcus Governed Syria, who perceiving that Malichus began to raise Troubles in Jewry, reformed thither, and there wanted little but that he had slain him, had not Antipater by earnest request obtained his Life.

C H A P. XIX.

Cassius and Marcus leaving Syria, give Herod the Command of the Army which he had raised, promising to establish him King: Malichus causeth Antipater to be poisoned; Herod dissembleth with him.

BUT imprudent Antipater saved Malichus to his own mischief: For when Cassius and Marcus had assembled their Army, they committed all the charge into Herod's hands, and made him Governor of Cæleſyria, and delivered him great Forces, both of

A Foot and Horse, and Ships by Sea: They promised him likewise the Kingdom of Judæa, after they had finished the War, that was at that time betwixt them; and Anthony, and Cæsar the younger. Whereupon Malichus mightily fearing Antipater's power, determined to destroy him; and having corrupted Hircanus's Butler with Money (with whom both of them celebrated a Feast) he poisoned him, and afterwards assembling many Soldiers about him, he made himself Master of the City. When Herod and Phasaelus understood the traitorous conspiracy attempted against their Father, they were grievously incensed against Malichus, but he denied all, and especially abjured the intent or practice of the murder. Thus died Antipater a just and virtuous man, and such as one as dearly loved his Country. But Herod who was his younger son, immediately resolved to revenge his father's death, and came forth with an Army against Malichus: But Phasaelus, who was the elder, resolved to circumvent him by policy, lest he should raise a Civil War. He therefore accepted of Malichus's justifications, and made a shew that he supposed that he had in no manner contrived Antipater's death; and only minded his father's Monument and Funerals. Mean while, Herod resorting to Samaria, and finding it in a desperate condition, restored the same, and pacified the divisions that were amongst the Inhabitants. Not long after (by reason of a Feast) he came to Jerusalem with his Soldiers. Malichus being afraid of his access, persuaded Hircanus that he should not permit him to enter into the City: whereunto Hircanus consented, alleging, that amongst the holy People it was not lawful to intermix a Troop of polluted Men. But Herod slighted them that brought him this news, and notwithstanding his command, entered the City by night: whereat Malichus was much amazed. Whereupon, according to his ordinary dissimulation, he openly wept and bewailed the death of Antipater his especial friend; but under-hand he prepared a guard for his own safety. Notwithstanding it was thought fit by Herod's friends to take no notice of his dissimulation; but to make shew that they were well affected towards Malichus.

C H A P. XX.

Cassius at Herod's entreaty, sends orders to the Commanders of the Roman Troops, to revenge Antipater's death; they slay Malichus. Felix who commands the Roman Garrison in Jerusalem, attacketh Phasaelus, who reduceth him to captivity.

Herod having assured Cassius of Antipater his father's death, he knowing very well what a wicked man Malichus was, wrote back unto Herod that he should revenge the death of his father: besides, he sent secret Letters to the Captains that were in Tyre, commanding them to aid and assist Herod in that just execution which he intended. After that Cassius had taken Laodicea, and the Inhabitants of the Country came together, bringing with them Crowns and Silver to present him, Herod expecting that Malichus should receive his punishment there, but Malichus mistrusting their designs, when he was drawing near to Tyre in Phœnicia, he contrived a greater enterprize: For whereas his son was an hostage in Tyre, he entered the City to draw him thence, and afterwards return into Judæa; taking that opportunity by reason of Cassius's troubles (who marched to meet with Anthony) he resolved to draw the people to an insurrection, and to make himself Lord of the Country: but God disappointed his unjust purposes: for Herod being a man of a ripe judgment, immediately discovered his intention, and sent one of his servants before, under the notion to prepare a banquet because he had told him formerly that he would entertain all his followers: but in effect, he sent him to the Captains, to command them to go out with their Daggers, and to meet Malichus; who marching forth, and meeting with him near the shore, he stabbed him. Which act did so much astonish Hircanus, that through amaze he grew speechless: and being much moved, he demanded of Herod's men how this accident had happened, and who it was that had killed Malichus; which having heard, and how nothing was done without Cassius's command, he answered that all was well done, Malichus being a wicked man, and a Traitor to his Country. See here how Malichus was justly punished for the wickedness he committed against Antipater.

When Cassius was gone out of Syria, there arose a new tumult in Judæa: for Felix, who was left in Jerusalem with an Army, marched forth against Phasaelus, and all the people were in arms. For which cause Herod speedily repaired to Fabius, Governor of Damascus, and intending to succour his brother, was prevented by a sickness: so that Phasaelus obtaining a victory by his own forces against Felix, enclosed him up in a Tower, whence afterwards he dismissed him under composition. Whereupon he grievously rebuked Hircanus, that being forgetful of divers good offices which he had received by him, he had given aid unto his Enemies. For Malichus's brother being at that time revolted, planted Garrisons in divers Fortresses, and namely in Maffada, which was the strongest of them all. As soon as Elerad had recovered his health, he drew forth his forces against him, and dispossessed him of divers places that he held, and after suffered him to depart with his life and goods.

CHAPTER XXI.

Antigonus, Aristobulus's son, gets an Army; Herod overcometh him, and returneth triumphing to Jerusalem. Hircanus promiseth him his Grand-daughter Mariamne, daughter of Alexander, Aristobulus's son.

Antigonus, Aristobolus's son, got an Army together, and hired Fabius, Ptolomy Micennus adopted Antigonus for being of his near relations. He was also affited by Marion, whom Cassius had made Governor of Tyre and tyrannized over Syria, having put Garrisons in several places of it, and had taken possession of three places in Galilee, which bordered with his Country. Herod also marching forth against him, disposed of him them all; and graciously dismissed those Tyrians that had the keeping thereof, bestowing Presents on some of them, for the love he bare unto their City. And that done, he came and encountered with Antigonus, and fought him, and overcame him before he had scarcely entred on the marches of Judea, and drove him from thence, K him to come in triumph to Jerusalem, Hircanus and all the People honoured him with Crowns. For Hircanus look'd upon him as one of his Family, because he was to marry Mariamne, daughter of Alexander, son of Aristobolus, and of Alexandra, Hircanus's daughter: on whom he begat three sons and two daughters. Before her also had he married a Wife of his own Nation, who was called Doris, on whom he begat Antipater his eldest son.

CHAP. XXII.

After Cassius's defeat near the City of Philippi, Antonius cometh into Asia; Herod ob-taineth his friendship by great Presents; Antonius's Edicts in favour of Hircanus and of the Jewish Nation.

Antonius and Caesar having overcome Cassius, near unto the City of Philippi; Caesar went from thence into France, and Antonius into Asha. And being in Bisbynia, Embassadors resorted to him from all parts: Thither also repaired certain principal Men among the Jews, to accuse Phasaelus and Hered; saying that Hircanus had one by the name, but he the authority of the Kingdom. But Antonius greatly honoured Hered, who came unto him, to answer those accusations that they had imposed on him: for which cause, they that were his adversaries could obtain no Audience: for Hered had bought that privilege from them with his Money. As soon as Antonius was arrived in Ephesus, Hircanus the High-Priest, and all our Nation presently sent an Embassador unto him, with a Crown of Gold; requiring him that he would write unto the Provinces, that the Jews whom Cassius had taken Prisoners (contrary to the law of Arms) might be set at liberty, and that their Country, which was taken from them in Cassius's time) might be restored. Antonius supposing that the demands which the Jews had propounded, were reasonable, wrote back presently to the High-Priest Hircanus and the Jews; and sent an Edict also to the Tyrians, to this effect:

Marcus Antonius Emperor, to Hircannus High-Priest and Prince of the Jews, Health.

Lysimachus the son of Pausanias and Joseph the son of Menneus and Alexander the son of Theodore, your Ambassadors came unto me to Ephesus, and have renewed the same Embassage which they heretofore brought to Rome, and at this present likewise they have duly and faithfully acquitted themselves of the Embassage which they present in the behalf of you, and your Nation, by giving us to understand what affection you bear towards us: so that I esteem you for our friends, since I understand how friendly you have behaved your self towards us, both in words and deeds. For when our adversaries and enemies of the Roman Nation spoiled all the Country of Asia, and without regard to their Oaths, spared neither Cities nor Temples; we have opposed our selves against them, not only for our private respect, but in the quarrel of the Commonwealth, to punish the authors of such offences committed against Men; and of such impieties perpetrated against God: for which we suppose

Book XIV.

A pose, that the Sun bath in a manner obscured himself, by beholding with unwilling eyes what an heinous offence was committed against Cæsar. But we have gotten the upper hand of their impious enterprizes, which are fallen upon Macedonia, as on the Country and Air, from whence proceed such detestable designs : and we have likewise cut off the course of their desperate rebellion, which made them encounter us near to Philippi, a City of Macedonia, where we seized their places fortified by nature, and enclosed with mountains as if it were with walls, as far as the Sea, so that the passage was barred up, as it were with a gate, had not the gods given us way by resisting their unjust exploits, and furthering ours. Brutus is likewise compelled to flee to Philippi, where being besieged by us, he suffered within his Confort Cassius, and since they have been punished as they deserved; we hope for the future to enjoy peace and tranquillity, and that Asia shall be delivered from all the miseries of War, and as for your part, you may assure your selves, that both you and your Country, shall have your share in this happiness, because we have so great a kindness for you to lose any opportunity to procure your advantage, and all the body thereof seems to be relieved from a grievous malady, by means of our victory : We have already sent Letters from City to City, to the intent that if any one among you, either captive or free-man, have been sold to the utmost by Caius Cassius, or any of that Army, they may be set at liberty. And our will is, that you reap the fruits of all the favors that we and Dolabella have granted you; forbidding the Tyrians to molest you, and commanding them to restore all that which they have taken from the Jews, in goods or possessions. As for the Crown which you sent me, I accept of it.

Marcus Antonius Emperor, to the Governors, Senate, and People of Tyre, Health. I Marcus Antonius written to the Magistrates of Tyre to restore Hircanus and the Jews their Lands, Goods, and Liberties.

have been informed in Ephesus by Hircanus's Embassadors who is High-Priest and Prince of the Jews (that you have seized on their Country, and spoiled the same, when our adversaries held that Province. But as we have undertaken the War for the Empire, and in defence of Justice and Piety, we have punished these ungrateful, disloyal and perfidious persons. Our will is, that you suffer our Allies to live in peace; and as touching that which you have obtained of our adversaries; our pleasure is, that you restore the same to those that are dispossessed. For none of them had obtained either Province or Army by the consent of the Senate; but had usurped them by force, and afterwards bestowed them on those who have been Ministers of their impieties and injustice. But since they have been punished according to their deserts, we require that our Allies enjoy their own, without any hindrance: and if you hold any places at this present, which belong to Hircanus Prince of the Jews (that were seized since the time that Caius Cassius by an unjust War invaded our Provinces) restore them unto him, without offering to hinder him from the possession of his own. And if you have, or pretend to have any right in them, when I shall repair to those places, it shall be lawful for you to debate your right, and we will so judge, that our Allies shall receive no wrong.

Marcus Antonius Emperor, to the Governors, Senate, and People, of Tyre, Health:
I have sent you my Edict, my pleasure is that you carefully consider it, and that you register
E it among your publick Records, in Roman and Greek letters, and set it up in Writing in an open place, to the end that it may be read by all Men.

Marcus Antonius Emperor and Triumvir, in the presence of the Tyrians assembled for their public affairs, hath declared, that Caius Cassius, during the troubles, by the assistance of his Souldiers, hath swarped another mans Province; and hath in like sort spoiled our Allies, and hath ranackt the Nation of the Jews, who are friends to the people of Rome: and for that by our valour, we have repressed his insolence, by our Edicts and Judgments we will correct his offences, to the end that all things may be restored to our Allies, and that all whatsoever hath been sold, and appertained to the Jews (whether they be Prisoners or Possessions) be restored to their Masters; to the end that each Man may be at liberty as he was before, and that each mans possession may be restored to his first owner. And my pleasure is, That whosoever disobeyeth this Ordinance, he may be punished accordingly. He wrote to the like effect to the Sidonians, Antiochians, and Ara-bians; all which we will infer in a convenient place, to testify what account the Romans made of our Nation.

ways advertised of his Brothers surprisal, and had also far greater suspicion of the Parthians, by the solicitation of Hircanus's Daughter, whom he had Married. And although the rest made no account of her advertisements, yet Herod gave credit unto her, for that she was a most wise Woman. Now whilst the Parthians were in deliberation what were best to be done (in that it was held no policy to make open assault upon such a Man) they delibered the whole matter until the next Morning. Whilst thus they were debating of their differences, Herod, who rather gave credit to that which he had heard as concerning his Brother (and touching the Treasons intended against him by the Parthians) than to his Adversaries; as soon as it was Night, concluded to make use of the time, and to make away, without staying any longer amongst those uncertain dangers, which his Enemies intended against him. For which cause he fled with those Forces he had with him: and mounting his Mother, his Sister, and his Brothered, whom he was to Marry (who was Alexander's Daughter the Niece of Aristobolus) and her Mother (who was Hircanus's Daughter) and her younger Brother, with all their Family and Train, he departed into Idumaea, without suspicion of the Enemy. Amongst whom there was not one so hard-hearted, who seeing such a pitiful Spectacle, could not be moved to Compassion, beholding the Mothers drag away their little Children, and abandon their Country with Tears and Complaints: and that which was worse, to leave their Friends in Bondage, without any hope of Comfort or Redress.

But Herod mastered these misfortunes by his invincible Courage, and for that he was a constant Man in all Fortunes, he exhorted every one of them whom he met in the Way, to be of good Courage; and not abandon themselves in immeasurable sorrow, for that by such means they might hinder his Retreat, on which their sole and securest conservation depended: Whereupon they for their part endeavoured themselves to digest their Griets, according to Herod's Exhortation. Mean-while he hardly refrained from laying violent Hands on himself, by reason of the Chariot wherein his Mother rode, which overturned, had almost slain her; yet, so much did this casualty terrifie him (for fear least the Enemy in pursuit should surpris him during these delays) so that he drew and prepared his Sword to kill himself, had not some assistants and followers stept in to him, and stayed the stroke, beseeching him instantly not to forsake them, and leave them subject to the Enemies violence: assuring him, that it was not the part of a Valiant Man to respect his own private interest, and neglect his Friends danger. By these persuasions he was induced to hold his hands, both by reason of the apprehension of these words, which were spoken unto him, as also for that he was over-ruled by the Multitude of those who would not permit his hand to execute his will, so that taking up his Mother, and doing her all the service that the time permitted, he followed on his way, and with the speediest and nearest means he could, he retired toward the Castle of Massada; where in the way, he oftentimes fought against the Parthians that charged and pursued him, but he always got the Victory. The Jews also pursued him during his flight; for scarcely had he travelled sixty furlongs out of the City, M

Herod seeing his Mothers Chariot overturned, is ready to murder himself.

Herod retiring towards Massada, is assisted by the Parthians.

The Parthians spoil the Citizens of Jerusalem, and the Army Marissa.

Thus

A Thus Antigonus, brought back into his Country by the King of the Parthians, received Hircanus and Phaelus that were Prisoners: yet he was vehemently displeased, because the woman was escaped, whom according to his promise he intended to have delivered with the money: and fearing lest Hircanus through the favour of the people should be re-established in his Kingdom (who then was Prisoner in the custody of the Parthians) he cut off both his ears, depriving him by that means from enjoying the Priesthood any more, by reason of that maim, because the Law commanded that they who are in that dignity should be found in all their members. But Phaelus is to be admired for his great courage at that time: for understanding that he must needs die, he was no ways disheartened with death, but that which he esteemed most miserable and dishonourable was, that he must needs die by the hands of his Enemy. Seeing therefore that he could not dispatch himself by other means, (because he was bound and chained) he knocked out his own brains against a stone, and so ended his life (with as great honour as may be imagined in such a desperate estate) depriving his Enemy of that power which he intended to practise in tyrannizing over him at his pleasure: it is said, that the Wound being very deep, Antigonus sent privily Chirurgeons to cure him; and that under colour of healing him, they should put poyson into the same, where-through he might die. But before Phaelus gave up the ghost, he understood by a certain woman that his brother Herod had escaped from his Enemies: for which cause he endured his death with far greater cheerfulness and constancy, seeing that he left behind him such a man as would revenge his death, and punish his Enemies. But Herod was no ways discomfited with the greatness of those adversities which invironed him round about, but was the more whetted on to find out new inventions, and to adventure considerable attempts. For he went unto Malchus King of the Arabians (to whom formerly he had shewed much courtesy) hoping to receive the like of him in this time of his great necessity, and to draw some money from him, either by interest or gift. For being ignorant of his brother's death, he endeavoured to redeem him speedily from his Enemies, by paying his Ransom (which amounted to Three hundred Talents) and for that cause he led with him the son of Phaelus, who was only seven years old, to leave him in pledge amongst the Arabians for the sum that was demanded. But certain messengers came to him from Malchus, who charged him in the Kings behalf to retire back again, for that the Parthians had enjoined him that he should neither receive nor retain Herod; And used this colourable pretence, because he would not pay his debts: and herunto was perswaded by the advice of the greatest in authority among the Arabians, who pretended thereby to make themselves masters of that treasure that Antipater had committed to their custody. Herod answered them that he repaired not into their Country to give them cause of any trouble, but only to consult with them about certain matters of great importance touching his own estate, and that afterwards he was resolved to depart, and withdraw himself into Egypt as secretly as might be possible. He returned therefore to a certain Temple, where he had left divers of his followers; and the next day he came to Rhimmaria, in which place he heard tidings of his brother's death. But afterwards Malchus repented himself of his ingratitude, and speedily sent after Herod, but he could not overtake him: for he had gotten far on his way, and was already arrived near to Pelafum; where being denied his passage to Alexandria, in those ships that were there, he addressed himself to the Magistrates of the place, who highly respected and honoured him, and sent him to the City where Cleopatra was; who entertained him kindly: yet notwithstanding, she could not persuade him to remain with her. Whereupon he repaired towards Rome (notwithstanding the Winter, and those grievous troubles that at the very same time afflicted Italy, as it was reported.) Embarking himself therefore to sail into Pamphylia, he was tost with a most cruel storm; so that with great danger at last he arrived in Rhodes, having been enforced in the tempest to cast into the Sea great part of his goods. There he met with Sappinas and Protemy, two of his endeared friends. He found also, the City of Rhodes had suffered much misery by Cassius's Wars: and although his means were very short, yet he helped them in what he might, and caused their Walls to be repaired, notwithstanding that by so doing, he greatly hindered himself. After that, he caused a little Fort to be built, and embarked himself with his friends to repair, unto Italy, and arrived at Brundisium, and from thence went to Rome. The first to whom he discovered his misfortunes, was Marcius Antonius: to whom he reported all the occurrences in Judea: and how his brother Phaelus was taken by the Parthians, and slain; and how Hircanus was imprisoned with him. The manner also how they had established Antigonus King, under promise to give them One thousand Talents, and Five hundred of the fairest Women, whom he intended to chuse out of his own race. Antonius hearing of all those alterations that had befallen Herod, had compassion of his misery (bethinking himself of the estate and condition of great men, who are likewise subject to no less casualties) and the rather was he induced to do him good, both in remembrance of the friendship he had with Antipater his father, and also by reason of Herod's promises of certain sums of money, if he were made King by his means, as he had been formerly declared Tetrarch. But that which most moved him hereunto, was the hatred which he bare unto Antonius, whom he accounted to be a malicious man, and an Enemy to the Romans. On the other side, Caesar was well inclined to succour him, both in regard of those Armies which Antipater had brought into Egypt in his father's service, as also because of the good hospitality and kindness that he had shewed him in all things; and especially to gratify Antonius, who was well affected towards Herod. Whereupon the Senate being assembled, Messala and Atratinus brought forth Herod, and after they had praised him, and recited the favours which the Romans had received by his father, and the great affection and good will which he bare to the people of Rome; they accused and declared Antonius the Romans Enemy, not only for his ancient crimes, but also, that in contempt of the Romans, he had received the Kingdom from the Parthians. Whilst the Senate was fore displeased at the report of these things, Antonius arose, and declared openly before them all, that in furtherance of the Parthian War, it were not amiss that Herod should be made King: which opinion of his was generally allowed, and finally ratified. The principal demonstration of the love and affection which Antonius bare unto Herod, was, that he not only obtained him the Kingdom, beyond all hope, for he never thought that the Romans would grant that dignity unto him, who were wont to reserve that honour to those of the King's blood; and therefore he intended to have demanded it for his Wife's Brother Alexander, and Nephew to Aristobolus by the father's side, and to Hircanus by the mother (which Alexander, Herod afterwards put to death, as shall be declared in time and place) but also for that, within the term of seven days, he sent him out of Italy, with the unexpected titles of his felicity.

As soon as the Senate was risen, Antonius and Caesar went forth, leading Herod between them, and being accompanied by the Consuls and other Magistrates, went up into the Capitol to do sacrifice, and to place there this Decree the Senate had made as touching this matter. The first day of Herod's Reign Antonius feasted him; and after this manner he was established King, the hundred and eighty fourth Olympiad, in the year wherein C. Domitius Calpurnius twice Consul, and Cains Asinius Pollio were Consuls. Mean while Antonius besieged those that were in the Castle of Maffada, who were plentifully furnished with all things necessary (except it were water) for which cause Joseph Herod's brother, that was within, and Two hundred of his friends, had concluded to fly unto the Arabians: for that they understood that Malchus had repented himself of that fault he had committed against Herod. But whilst they stood upon these terms, God poured down a huge rain on a certain night, that in short time filled their Cisterns, so that they had no more necessity to fly; and from that time forward they took courage; and made a sally upon their Enemies, in which they charged Antonius's Soldiers after such a manner, sometimes in open field, sometimes by surprisal, that they slew a great number of them. At that time Pentidius, a Roman Captain, was sent into Syria, to drive the Parthians from thence, and after their departure he arrived in Jewry, making shew that he would assist Joseph: but in effect all his pretence was to draw money from Antonius. Being therefore encamped near unto Jerusalem, and having drawn sufficient money from Antonius, he retired himself with the greater part of his Forces, and to the intent his deceitful dealing might not be discovered, he left Silo with a company of his Soldiers: who likewise was honoured by Antonius, lest he should be cause of some new trouble, before the Parthians, whose coming he expected, should yield him aid.

After that Herod was come from Italy by Sea to Ptolemais, and that he had assembled no small number of Soldiers, both Strangers, and his own Country-men, he marched forward against Antonius, and passed through Galilee. Silo and Pentidius also gave him assistance in this Action, having received direction by Gellius from Antonius, that they should assist Herod to recover his Country. But Pentidius was employed in appeasing the Troubles that were raised in the Cities by the Parthians; and as touching Silo, he kept in Judea, having been corrupted by Antonius. But the further that Herod daily marched into the Country, the more his Forces did encrease; and all Galilee (except a very few) submitted themselves unto him. Whilst he marched forward towards Maffada, (being moved thereunto, for to relieve his Parents that were besieged there- in) the City of Joppa would not grant him passage; for the Citizens thereof were his Enemies; so that it behoved him first of all to ruin the same, to the end he might leave no Retreat behind him for his Enemies, if he made towards Jerusalem. Upon which occasion Silo laying hold, dislodged his Army, and made thitherward; whom, when the Jews did pursue, Herod sallied out with a small Company, and put them to flight, and saved Silo, who could not resist any longer. Afterwards having seized on Joppa, he hastened forwards to deliver his Friends that were besieged in Maffada; but part of the Inhabitants submitted themselves unto him, for the Friendship they had born unto his Father, and others of them, for the honour that they bare unto him: the rest admitted his Government, in acknowledgment of those Favours they had received from them both. But the greatest part was moved thereunto by the hope they had conceived of their new elected King, and the confirmation of his Government. Thus by these means was his Army mightily encreased.

Whilst thus he marched forward, Antonius seized on those places that were fittest to lay Ambushes in, or to fight at advantages by the way (notwithstanding that by those Stratagems he did but small or no hurt at all to his Enemy; so that Herod raised the Siege, and relieved his Friends out of the Castle of Maffada: and after he had taken the Fort of Resfa, he approached Jerusalem, being attended by Silo's Army, and by divers Citizens of the City, who were afraid of his power. And when he had pitched his Camp to the Westward of the City, those that kept the Watch and Guard on that side, E threw their Arrows, and threw Stones against him: Divers likewise sallied forth, and sought hand to hand against those that were planted there: For which cause, first of all, Herod caused a Proclamation to be made round about the walls, signifying unto them, that he resorted thither for the common Good of the People, and for the Conservation of the City, without intent of Revenge, or Memory of any Wrongs that his private Enemies had offered him, promising his most free Pardon to all those whosoever had heinously offended him. Hereunto Antonius made this Answer (directing his Speech to Silo and the Roman Soldiers) that contrary to all Justice, they gave the Kingdom to Herod, who was a private Man, and an Idumean (that is to say, a half Jew) whereas it hath been a Custom to bestow the same on them that are of the Line of the Priests.

For albeit at that present they were displeased with him, for that he had seized on the Kingdom by the means of the Parthians, and had resolved with themselves to dispossess him; yet that there were divers others of that Royal Race, who might be made Kings according to the Law, who have no ways misdeemed themselves towards the Romans; and moreover there are Priests, who should not be justly and uprightly dealt withal, if they should be deprived of that Honour which appertaineth unto them. Whilst they debated the Matter after this manner between them, and grew to hot and injurious Taunts the one against the other, Antonius commanded his Men to assail those that were near unto the Wall; who shooting many Arrows with great courage against them, drove them easily from the Tower they kept.

convenient Garisons to winter in, for that the places round about the City, were desolate, because all necessaries for maintenance of Life had been taken away and waisted by Antigonus's Soldiers. Thus was the whole Army discompoled; so that each of them prepared themselves to dislodge. But Herod importuned, and cried out upon the Captains and Soldiers that were under Silon's charge, telling them, that it concerned them not to abandon him whom Cæsar, Antony, and the Senate of Rome had sent thither: That for his own part, he would give order that they should have abundance of whatsoever they demanded; and immediately after, he deprived Silon of all colour and pretext of flight; for he caused an incredible quantity of Victuals to be brought them; and commanded his Friends that inhabited the confines of Samaria; to bring them Corn, Wine, Oil, Cattel, and all other such Provision from Jericho, to the end that from that time forward the Soldiers might want nothing. Antigonus was not ignorant thereof, so that he presently sent Men throughout the Country, to intercept and surprize the Purveyors and Victuallers. Who following Antigonus's command, assembled a great number of Soldiers near unto Jericho, and encamping in the Mountains, espied, and watched those that brought the Victuals. Mean-while Herod lay still, but took with him ten Companies, five of Roman Soldiers, and five of the Jews, with whom he intermixed some foreign Soldiers, with some few Horsemen, and came to Jericho; where, being arrived, he seized on the Town, which was abandoned by the Inhabitants, of whom five hundred with their Wives and Children were retired into the top of the Mountains, whom he took, and afterwards set at liberty; but the Roman Soldiers, entering into their houses, and finding them full of all sorts of Moveables, they plundered them. And the King having lately a Garison in Jericho, dismissed the Roman Army, to go and winter in the Countries about, furnished unto him; namely in Idumæa, Galilee, and Samaria. Antigonus also purchased his Favour at Silon's hands by store of Bribes, that part of his Army was lodged in Lydda, all which he did to curry favour with Antony.

Whilst thus the Romans lived in all abundance, and bare no Arms, Herod would not be idle; but sent his Brother Joseph unto Idumæa, with a thousand Foot, and four hundred Horse; and himself retired to Samaria, where his Mother, and his other Parents kept, who were removed out of Masfada. After this, he went into Galilee, to surprize certain Castles which were held by Antigonus's Garisons, and being arrived at Sepphoris, (during a great Snow) after that Antigonus's Garisons were gone out of the foresaid Castles, he found a great abundance of all sorts of necessary Provision: And there having notice of certain Thieves, who inhabited in Caves, he sent a Troop of Horse, with three Companies of Foot, against them; whom he commanded to punish those Robbers: the place where they lay was not far from a Borough called Arbel; and forty days after, he himself with all his Army marched thither; where the Enemies charged him fiercely, that the left Wing of his Squadron retreated; but he coming on with his main Battel, put them to flight, who were already almost Masters of the Field, and made those of his Followers that fled, face about, and pursue their Enemies as far as the Flood Jordan, who fled some one way, and some another; so that he drew all Galilee under his subjection, except those that lurked in the Caves. He distributed Money also amongst his Soldiers, and gave each Soldier an hundred and fifty Drachms, and far more unto their Officers; and afterwards sent them to winter in Garisons near at hand.

About this time, Silon and his Captains, who had passed the Winter in the said Garisons, came unto him; Antigonus would no more furnish them with Victuals, for he gave them maintenance for no more than a Month, commanding those that dwelt round about them to spoil the Country, and afterwards to retire themselves into the Mountains, to the end that the Romans might be destitute of necessary maintenance, and by that means might be consumed with Famine. Herod gave Pheroras his youngest Brother the charge of that Provision, commanding him to enclose the Fort of Alexandrian with a Wall; who speedily brought to pass that the Soldiers had all sorts of Necessaries at command: re-edified also the Fort of Alexandrian which had been laid desolate. About that time Antony was in Athens, and Ventidius was in Syria, who having sent for Silon to accompany him against the Parthians, did first of all charge him to assist Herod in that War, and afterwards to excite the Provincial Confederates to further his War. But Herod dismissing Silon and his Company, to follow their destined Wars with Ventidius, did in his own person lead out his Soldiers against those Thieves that lived in Dens. These Caves were situate in the most high and inaccessible Mountains, impregnable through narrow Paths environed with sharp Rocks, wherein the Robbers inhabited secretly, with all their Families. King Herod caused a certain number of Coffers to be made fast to Iron Chains, which he caused to be let down by an Engine from the top

A hill to ascend the same from beneath, neither from above to creep downward against them.) These Chefts were filled with Soldiers, armed with great Hooks to draw these Thieves unto them, and to break their necks headlong from the height to the bottom. But the use of these Coffers was dangerous; for it was necessary to let them down an infinite depth into the Caves, especially for that the thieves had necessary provision amongst them; notwithstanding, when they had gotten down, none of the Thieves durst peep out of the mouths of their Caves; but fear constrained them to hold themselves quiet. But a certain Soldier having girt his Sword by his side, and taken hold of the Chain with both his hands whereto the Coffer was fastned, slid down as far as the entry of the Cave; and being displeased that none came out, he shot divers Arrows at those that were within, and wounded them; and after that, with his hook he drew those unto him who resisted, and tumbled them down headlong from the steep Rock; which done, he rushed in upon those that were within the Cave, and slew many of them, and afterwards returned, and refted himself in his Coffer. Divers hearing the groans of those that were wounded, were surprized with fear, and despair of their Life; but the Night's approach was the cause that the matter was not fully accomplished; and many of them getting notice of the King's free Pardon, by a Herald, submitted themselves. The next day they renewed and continued the same manner of Fight, and divers went out of their Coffers, to fight at the entrances of the Caves, throwing in Fire, which, there being much fuel in the Caves, did great execution. Within these Caves, there was a certain old man apprehended, with his wife and seven Sons; who, being desired by them, that he would suffer them to go and submit themselves to their enemies, took up the entry of the Cave, and as his Sons advanced to get out, he flew them all, and after them his Wife; and at last, when he had cast their dead Bodies down the Rocks, he threw himself down headlong after them, preferring death to slavery. Yet before his death, he reviled Herod bitterly, and upbraided him with his ignoble extraction; and although Herod (who saw all that which had happened) stretched out his hand unto him for pardon, yet he would not give ear to him; and by these means were all these Caves entered, and the Thieves taken.

Now when the King had established Ptolemy General over the Army in that Country, he retired unto Samaria, with six hundred horse, and three thousand foot, with a resolution to fight Antigonus, and to end their quarrel: But Ptolemy had but very slender success in his Government; for they that before-time had troubled the Country of Galilee, fallen out upon him, and defeated him. After which execution, they fled into the Marishes and inaccessible places, where they robbed and spoiled all the Country. But Herod returning, and setting upon them, punished them; for he slew some of them, and the rest were constrained to fly into strong places; where he besieged them, and entering their Fortresses by force, put them to the Sword, and destroy'd their fortifications; and having brought this Rebellion to an end, he condemned the Cities to pay him the sum of one hundred Talents. Mean while Pachorus was killed in the War, and the Parthians were defeated with him; which was the cause that Ventidius sent Macheras to succour

Herod with two Legions, and 1000 Horse, by Antony's order, corrupted by Antigonus's Money. But Macheras, notwithstanding Herod's disuasion, yet he went to him, alleging that he did it to look into his actions. But Antigonus suspecting his sudden approach, entertained him not, but caused him to be darts at, and driven thence, giving him to understand by his entertainment, what opinion he had of him, who at that time perceived plainly that Herod had given him good counsel, and that himself had failed in misbelieving his advice: for which cause he returned to the City Emaus, and killed all those Jews whom he met withal in the way, being much troubled at it, whether friends or enemies, he was so highly displeased at that which had happened. Herod came to Samaria, resolving with himself to go to Antony, to complain of these grievances; and to tell him that he had no need of such Associates, who did him more harm than his enemies; whereas of himself he was able to make good his War against Antigonus. But Macheras, hasted after him, entreating him to stay, and to go no further on that journey, and pray'd him to leave his Brother Joseph behind him, to go with him against Antigonus. By these persuasions and instant intreaties of Macheras, he was somewhat appeased; so that he left his Brother Joseph behind him, with an Army, charging him no way to hazard his Fortune, or to fall to odds with Macheras. As for himself, he hasted towards Antony, who at that time besieged Samofata (a City situate near unto Euphrates) having with him an Army of his Associates, both horse and foot. When Herod was arrived in Antioch, he found divers men assembled there, who were desirous to go and seek out Antony; but they durst not advance, for fear the Barbarians should set upon them in their journey. Herod encourag'd them, and offer'd himself to be their guide. When they were come two days journey off Samofata, the Barbarians laid an ambush for them, and had barred

Now when the foremost were past, the Ambush consisting of about some 500 Horsemen, they suddenly charg'd Herod, who was in the Rear; when they had broken the first Ranks whom they had met, Herod, with his Troop that was about him, immediately repuls'd them; and after he had encouraged his Followers, and whetted them on to the fight, he did so much, that he made those that fled, to face about, and fight; so that the Barbarians were put to the sword on all sides. The King also pursu'd them so long, until at last he recover'd that which had been taken by them, which was a certain number of Sumpter-horses and Slaves: But being charg'd a-fresh by others, and they in greater number than those who encountered him at first, he likewise (rallying his Forces together) charged and overcame them; and killing divers of them, he secured the way to those that follow'd after, who all of them acknowledg'd him for their Preserver.

When he drew near unto Samofata, Antionus sent out the best of his Army to meet and honour him. As soon as he came to Antionus's presence, he entertain'd him kindly; and after he had heard that which had befallen him in the way, he embrac'd him, in admiration of his virtue, and did him great honour, as to him whom a little before he had rais'd to a Royal Dignity. Not long after this, Antiochus surrendered the Fort of Samofata to Antionus, and upon this occasion the War was ended. Whereupon Antionus committed the Province with the Army to Sofus, and after he had commanded him to succour Herod, he departed into Egypt. Sofus therefore sent two Legions of Soldiers before into Judea to succour Herod, and afterwards he follow'd with the rest of his Army.

In the mean while, Joseph is killed in Jewry, on this occasion that enfeith; for forgetting his Brother Herod's command which he gave him when he repaired to Antionus, he took five Companies of Soldiers which Macheras had left him, and marching towards Jericho, to gather in the fruits of the field, he pitched his Tents upon the Mountains; and for that the Roman Troops were but newly levied, and consisted of those Men who were untrained in the Wars, and for the most part were gather'd out of the Country of Calofyria; the Enemies having advertisement hereof, assailed and surprized him in certain places of disadvantage, where there was a hot skirmish between them, in which Joseph died fighting valiantly, and all his Army was defeated. The dead Bodies being in Antionus's power, he cut off Joseph's head, notwithstanding that his Brother Pheroras proffered him 50 Talents for the whole Body. Which done, the Galileans revolting from their Governors, drowned those of Herod's party in the Lake; so that divers Commotions and Troubles were rais'd in Jewry. Macheras, he fortified the Castle of Gath. This Misfortune of Joseph's was reported to the King, in a certain Suburb of Antioch, called Daphne, who, before the tidings, had already conceived some suspicion and fear, grounded upon certain dreams, which gave him certain intelligence of his Brother's death. Departing therefore from thence with all expedition, he arrived near to the Mount Libanus, where he took about 800 Men with him, and the Roman Legion which he had, and from thence came to Ptolemais; from whence he departed with his Army by night, and M crossed Galilee with them. Whereupon, the Enemies came forth against him, and were overcome by him, and shut up in a Fort, from whence they were come out but the day before, where Herod assailed them by break of day; but being unable to do them any harm, by reason of the bad weather, he led his Men into the Villages near adjoining. But when Antionus's second Legion was come, and joyned to his Forces, they that were within the Fort, grew disheartned, and forsook the same by night. So that Herod march'd with all diligence to Jericho, with an intent to revenge his Brother's death; and being encamped near unto the same, he banqueted and entertain'd the Officers of his Army; and after the Feast was ended, and he had dismissed his company, he withdrew himself into his Lodging; in which place it appeared how much God loved the King; for the Roof of the House where he had solemniz'd his Feast, fell down, without hurt to any on whomsoever; for not one was left within it. Whence it came to pass, that each one persuaded himself that Herod was beloved by God, considering he had avoided so great and unexpected a danger.

The next day, 6000 Enemies came down from the top of the Mountains, to fight with him, who affrighted the Romans; and their forlorn Hope chafed Herod's Soldiers with darts and stones, who was himself also hurt in the Thigh with an Arrow. Antionus sent a Captain to Samaria, whose name was Pappus, with some Soldiers, intending thereby to signify unto his enemies, that he had more Forces than he needed. Pappus drew near to Macheras, the Roman Captain; and as for Herod, he took five Cities by force, and put some 2000 of them that were in garrison to the sword; and afterwards (having set the houses on fire) he went out to encounter Pappus, who was encamped in a Borough called

A led Isanias. Divers that came from Jericho and Jewry, submitted themselves to Herod; who drawing near the Enemy (who marched forward with great boldness) he fought them, and overcame them; and being inflamed with a great desire he had to revenge his Brother's death, he pursued them that fled, and killed them even within their Borough. These Houses were presently filled with Soldiers, and divers fled and hid themselves upon the tops thereof, who were at last taken; for the Roofs of the Houses were beaten down, whereby divers were killed by Stones that were thrown at them from above; the most grievous Spectacle of all those that had happened in these Wars, was, to see an infinite number of Bodies heaped up amidst the Rooms of the Houses.

This Exploit of Herod did very much abate the courage of his Enemies, who lost all hopes of any better success for the future; for a man might have seen them lie away in whole droves; and had not a sudden and violent Tempest fallen upon them, the triumphant Army of Herod had immediately entered Jerusalem with assurance of Victory, which had made an end of all that War. For Antionus had no other thoughts but to flee away, and to forsake the City. Now the Night drawing on, Herod gave order for the Soldiers to eat; and himself being weary, retired into his Chamber to bathe, where he escaped a most evident danger through God's Providence; for being naked, and having no body within but one of his Servants, three of the Enemies, who had hid themselves for fear, started out with their Swords in their hands, and ran away, without daring to attempt any thing against the King's person, so terrible was his presence to them. The next day Herod caused Pappus's Head to be cut off, and sent it to Pheroras, to comfort him for the loss of his Brother Joseph, whom this Pappus had killed. When the Tempest was over, he departed from thence, and approached near to Jerusalem, and encamped near unto the City. This was about the third year after he had been declared King at Rome; and encamping in the places which were fittest for Battery, he took up his own Quarter before the Temple, as Pompey had done formerly. Having therefore erected three Bulwarks in three places, he built Towers thereon, by means of a great quantity of Wood, which he caused to be cut down round about the place; and having put the Siege in a forwardness, he went to Samaria, to marry Marianne, who was Alexander's Daughter, and Arifobulus's Grand-daughter, with whom he had been contracted, as we D have already told you.

Herod being alone, and naked in his House, escaped unhurt among many and Enemies.

Herod sendeth Pappus's head to his Brother Pheroras.

Herod besiegeth Jerusalem. Herod repairs to Samaria to marry Alexander's Daughter.

Sosius and Herod lead a mighty Army against Jerusalem.

Herod prevented the Death.

The Jews without fear resist those that besieged them.

The outward part of the Temple, and the lower City taken.
The Jews flee to the upper City, and the Temple taken.

After this Marriage was solemniz'd, Sosius repairth thither through the Countrey of Phenicia; and having fir'd of all sent his Army through the Continent, he himself also reforted thither with many Foot and Horse; thither also repaired the King from Samaria, with a considerable Army to join with the old Bands; for he had about 30000 Men. All these assembled themselves together near unto the Walls of Jerusalem, and planted their Siege nigh unto the Wall of the City that extendeth towards the Northward. The Army consisted of eleven Legions of Foot, with 6000 Horse, besides the Auxiliaries that came from Syria. Two Generals commanded this Army; namely, Sosius, who was sent by Antonius to succour Herod; and Herod himself, who made War for himself, with an intent, that having dispossest Antigonus, (whom he had proclaimed Enemy to Rome) he himself might be King in his place, according to the Senate's decree. Those Jews that were within the Walls (that is to say, almost all the Nation) resisted the Herodians with great courage, boasting much of the Temple of the Lord, and wishing all good Success to the People; namely that God would deliver them from all dangers; and spoiling all provision without the City, that was either behoveful for the use of Man or Beast, by their secret excursions, they made the Besiegers destitute of Victuals. Which inconvenience Herod prevented, having laid Ambushes to cut them off. As for Victuals, he made much Provision be brought from remote places; so that within a very little space they had abundance of all that which was necessary in the Camp. He erected also with no less care three Bulwarks, by the diligent labour of a great number of Workmen; for it was Summer-time; and neither was the Air incommodious, or negligence of the Workmen such, but that they presently furnish'd and finish'd them. Afterwards having rais'd their Engines upon them, they batter'd the Wall, with as much violence and diligence as was possible; notwithstanding all this, they did no ways daunt those that were within, who, for their parts us'd all the cunning imaginable to defend themselves, and by divers Sallies set on fire the Enemies Engines; and burnt not only those that were half made, but those that were wholly perfected; and when necessary draw them to close Fighting, they shew'd no less valour than the Romans; but they were inferior to them in Skill and Martial Discipline. And when as the first Wall was beaten down, they built up a new, and countermined against those Mines that were made by the Enemy, so that they fought under ground hand to hand. Thus using Despair rather than Courage, they resisted to the uttermost; notwithstanding they were besieged by a great Army, and press'd by Famine and want of Victuals; for the year wherein the siege was continued was the seventh, in which the Earth was unmanur'd, which by us is call'd The year of Rest. But at last 20 chosen Soldiers first of all mounted upon the Wall, and after them one of Sosius's Centurions; for the first Wall was taken in the fortieth day after the Siege, and the second on the fiftieth, and some Galleries were burnt which were near unto the Temple; which (as Herod said) were burnt by Antigonus, to bring him into more hatred among the Jews. When the outward part of the Temple, and the lower part of the City were taken, the Jews fled into the Temple, and into the higher Town, lest the Romans should hinder them from offering their daily and ordinary Sacrifices unto God; and they sent Ambassadors to their Enemies, to require that it might be lawful for them only to bring in certain Beasts to offer them for Sacrifices. Which Herod their King granted them, hoping by this means that they would submit themselves and yield up the places. But perceiving that his opinion failed him herein, and that they obstinately resisted him, to continue the Sovereignty in Antigonus, he gave the assault, and took the City by force; where all places were presently filled with murders, in that the Romans were displeased, because they had continued the Siege so long; and the Jews that were on Herod's side, enforced them utterly to destroy all those that were of the contrary party; so that Slaughters rag'd and reign'd every where, both in Porches, and in the Houses wherein they entred: neither did the Religious Reverence of the Temple save those Suppliants that reforted thither for safety; but without compassion both old and young were put to death; neither did their murdering hand spare or refrain from Women; nay, not so much as from young Infants. And although the King requested them to forbear, yet no man gave over, but all sorts of persons were murdered by them, without respect either of Sex or Age. Antigonus inconsiderate of that estate wherein he

A had been, or the fortune and disaster that at that present attended him, came down from the Tower, and humbled himself on his knees before Sosius's feet; who having no compassion of the change of that estate wherein he saw him, outrageously mocked him, calling him Madam Antigonus: yet he left him not without Guard, after the manner of a Woman, but fast bound for his further assurance. But Herod was busied in devising how he might moderate his associates and strangers, after he had the upper hand over his Enemies; for the strangers swarmed into the City, and not only into the Temple, but also into the Sanctuary. He therefore exhorted some, and threatned others, and restrain'd the rest by force of Arms; and he was more troubled at that present in being a Conqueror, than if he had been conquered; for that those things that were not lawful to B be seen, were beheld by prophane Men. He prevented likewise the spoil of the City, as much as in him lay; beseeching Sosius most instantly, to preserve it to the utmost, asking him, If the Romans would leave him King of a Desert, after they had voided the City of Men and Goods: alledging furthermore, That he esteem'd the Government of the whole World of no value, in regard of the Life of one of his Citizens. Sosius answer'd, That it was reason that the Pillage should be given to the Soldiers, who had born the hazard of the Siege: whereunto Herod answer'd, That he would satisfy every Man out of his own Treasury; and by this means he ransom'd the rest of the City, by fulfilling those Promises; for he gave many mighty Gifts unto every one of the Soldiers, and by proportion unto the Captains; but above all, he royally rewarded Sosius: so that every one C of them departed very well satisfied.

These Calamities hapned in the City of Jerusalem, in the year wherein Marcus Agrippa and Canidius Gallus were Consuls, which was in the 185th. Olympiad, in the third Month, on the days wherein the solemn Fast was celebrated; as if this affliction had jump'd together in one instant with that of Pompey's, which had hapned that very day 27 years. Sosius offer'd a Crown of Gold unto God, and afterwards departed from Jerusalem, leading Antigonus Prisoner with him unto Antonius. But Herod fearing lest if Antigonus should be kept by Antonius, and sent to Rome, he should debate his Title with him before the Senate by Protest, that he was descended of the Royal Line; whereas Herod was but a Plebeian, and common Person; and that although he had offended the D Romans, and thereby might not deserve to be King; yet at least his Children, who were of the Princely Line, were not to be denied their Title: Herod, I say, fearing these things, prevailed so much, by force of his Money, with Antonius, that he caus'd him to put Antigonus to Death, so that at that time Herod was truly deliver'd from all his Fear. Thus ended the estate of the Asmoneans, after 126 years. This Family was famous both for their Nobility, and also by reason of their Sacredotal Dignity, and for the noble Actions and Exploits which their Ancestors had achiev'd for our Nation; but they lost their Authority through their mutual Factions: Which Sovereignty was derived to Herod, Antipater's Son, who was ignoble by Birth, and of mean Friends, who were Subjects and Vassals to Kings. See here what we have receiv'd from our Ancestors, as touching the End of the Race of the Asmoneans.

CHAP. I.

Antony causeth Antigonus, King of the Jews, to be Beheaded.

IN the former Book I have declar'd how Sosius and Herod took the City of Jerusalem by force, and with it Antigonus Prisoner: Now we will also declare that which hath subsequently followed; for after that Herod had obtained the absolute government over the whole Land of Judea, he advanced all those among the common people, who favoured his proceedings; 'as for those who were oppos'd against him, there pass'd not a day wherein some one or other of them suffered not punishment. But, amongst the rest, Pollio the Pharisee, and Sameas, his Disciple, were highly honour'd by him: For during the time of the Siege of Jerusalem, they counsel'd the Inhabitants to receive and entertain Herod; for which cause, he respect'd them accordingly. Some are of opinion that Sameas made this Prediction. This Pollio heretofore (when Herod was found guilty of Death) foretold to Hircanus, and the rest of the Judges, That being absolv'd by them, he should one day inflit punishment on them all. Which Prediction, God in process of time, approv'd by the event; no sooner therefore became he Master of Jerusalem, but he gather'd together all the rich Household-Goods that was in the Palace; and furthermore having robb'd the rich men of their Goods, and by this means rais'd a great sum of Gold & Silver, he sent great Presents to Antony & his Friends. Moreover he condemn'd 45 of Antigonus's principal and noblest Favourites to Death, setting a Watch about their doors, that none of them might be carried out under colour of being dead. The dead Bodies likewise were trodden under foot; and all the Gold, Silver, or Jewels, that was to be found amongst them, was carried to the King, and converted to his use; so that there was no end of these Miseries: For the Covetousness of the Conqueror (whose greedy and thirsty desire could hardly be quenched) laid hold on whatsoever was theirs. And because it was the 7th. year, it necessarily came to pass, that the Land was left uncultivated; for we are forbidden to sow in this year. Antony having taken Antigonus Prisoner, resolv'd to keep him Prisoner until the time of his Triumph: But after that he had heard the Jews were ready to rebel, and continued their good affection towards Antigonus, in regard of the hatred they conceiv'd against Herod, he concluded with himself to take his Head from him at Antioch; for the Jews could scarcely contain themselves. Strabo of Cappadocia testifieth no less in these Words:

Antony having brought Antigonus the Jew to Antioch, caus'd his head to be cut off and was the first among the Romans that had caus'd a King to be beheaded in this manner suppo-

Asing that the Jews might never otherwise be induc'd to change their opinions, and receive Herod; yet this opinion of his was not answerable to equity. For notwithstanding what sever violence he did devise, yet could they not be induc'd to call him King, in so high esteem and account held they their former King. But Antony suppos'd that that infamy would obscure his Renown, and lessen the general hatred they bare to Herod. See here what Strabo writeth.

As soon as the High-Priest Hircanus (who was Prisoner among the Parthians) heard that Herod had taken possession of the Kingdom, he return'd back unto him, being deliver'd after this manner following: Barzabarnes and Pachorus, Princes of the Parthians, had taken Hircanus, who was first High-Priest, and afterwards King, and with him Phasaelus, Herod's Brother, and led them away Prisoners with them into their own Country. Phasaelus, not able to endure the dishonour of imprisonment, and preferring an honourable death before a reproachful and ignominious life, murder'd himself, as I have heretofore declar'd.

CHAP. II.

Phraates, King of the Parthians, letteth his Prisoner Hircanus return into Judea; Herod, to make sure of him, contributerh heretofore, and giveth the High-Priesthood to a Man of no account. Alexandra, Herod's Mother-in-law, and Aristobolus's Mother, addresseth her self to Cleopatra, to obtain this Function for her Son, through Antony's means. C Herod discovereth it, gives that Employment to Aristobolus, and seigneth to be reconcil'd to Alexandra.
